The most prominent recent critic is Republican Sen. Gordon Smith of Oregon, a former supporter of the war and two-term senator facing re-election in 2008, who now says he has come to see it as unwinnable and derides U.S. policy in Iraq as "absurd" and "criminal."

But other centrist Republicans, apparently fearful of the war's impact on their re-election prospects, also are using the report to explain changes in war postures. New Hampshire's Republican senators, Judd Gregg and John Sununu, for instance, were once strong backers. In September 2005, Mr. Gregg called the idea of a phased withdrawal from Iraq "a policy that is firmly grounded in Birkenstocks and clearly not grounded in the reality of the world as it is."

Last week, however, Mr. Gregg hailed the report as "an important step forward in our efforts to try to resolve the morass that has become Iraq." Mr. Sununu simply said it showed "we are not winning the struggle in Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0106030

The criticism from Republican moderates represents a new political threat to Mr. Bush, whose handling of Iraq contributed to his party's losses in last month's congressional elections. With most Democrats already against the administration on Iraq, Mr. Bush needs Republican backing to stave off a Congress-led shift on the war. Moderates like Mr. Smith are key to that effort.

The rising tide also could hurt Sen. McCain. The Arizona lawmaker, currently seen as the front-runner for the party's 2008 presidential nomination, is the war's staunchest supporter outside the White House. He has called for sending tens of thousands of new U.S. troops to Iraq. Mr. Smith calls that idea "not politically possible."

Instead, the Oregon Republican wants to begin withdrawing U.S. military forces from Iraq and redeploying a smaller force to bases along the country's borders with Iran and Syria. He would have the U.S. forces that stay in Iraq focus on preventing foreign extremists from crossing into the country and pursuing al Qaeda terrorists in the country. The key, he says in an interview, would be ensuring that U.S. forces are no longer caught in "an ancient civil war that is not our fight and that we cannot fix."

Mr. Smith, who made his fortune in the frozen-food industry before entering politics, voted for the 2002 resolution that authorized Mr. Bush to use military power to oust Saddam Hussein, and he argued diplomacy alone wouldn't be enough to persuade Mr. Hussein to change his ways. In February 2003, weeks before U.S. forces invaded, Mr. Smith told a conference of Oregon Republicans, "If we walk away from this ... history will judge us badly."

In March 2005, he visited Baghdad for the first time since the invasion. Speaking to reporters after his trip, he expressed wariness about the open-ended U.S. military commitment to Iraq. He said he hoped U.S. forces could begin withdrawing that fall to avoid being seen as occupiers. The administration also hoped to begin a U.S. military withdrawal then, a move that might have boosted Republican prospects in mid-term elections.

FIGHT FOR IRAQ

See continuing coverage2 of developments in Iraq, including an interactive map of day-to-day events3 in Iraq. Plus, see a tally of military deaths4.

But the deteriorating situation in Iraq forced the White House to abandon those plans, and Mr. Smith says his pessimism deepened. He visited Iraq again last May and says he left convinced that too many American troops were in the country.

Mr. Smith says the November election underscored the need for a change in Iraq -- policy makers have an obligation to listen "when the public speaks so clearly," he says -- but he didn't decide to make the case publicly until a week ago. That morning, he says, he turned on the news to check the traffic and weather and saw a report that 10 U.S. soldiers had been killed that day in Iraq. Mr. Smith says he fumed over the fatalities during his commute, and concluded the time had come to say publicly what he had thought privately for weeks. The next night, at a lectern in a virtually empty Senate gallery, he declared in a speech, "Either we clear and hold and build, or let's go home."

Mr. Smith, who hadn't been well-known nationally, attracted a flood of television attention with his comments. The White House fielded questions on why a sitting Republican lawmaker was calling Mr. Bush's handling of the war "immoral."

Mr. Smith says a small number of fellow Republican senators gave him the cold shoulder after his speech. Others, he says, told him he had given voice to a feeling they shared but weren't yet willing to voice publicly.

"Many of my colleagues have been telling me, 'Thanks, that needed to be said,'" he says.

Bomber Kills More Than 60 In Iraq Capital (USAT/AP)

USA Today, December 13, 2006

BAGHDAD — A suicide bomber struck a crowd of mostly poor Shiites in Baghdad on Tuesday, killing at least 63 people and wounding more than 200 after luring construction workers onto a pickup by offering them jobs as they were eating breakfast.

The blast came on a day when the U.S. military reported the deaths of five troops.

The Baghdad suicide attack shattered storefront windows, dug craters in the road and set fire to several cars. People rushed to the devastated area to see whether friends or relatives were killed or wounded. Mangled bodies were piled up at the side of the road and partially covered with paper. Two men sat on the sidewalk, crying and covering their faces with their hands.

The bombing took place about 7 a.m. in Tayaran Square, where men gather daily to solicit jobs as construction workers, cleaners and painters. They buy breakfast at stands selling tea and egg sandwiches while waiting for potential employers to drive up.

High unemployment and soaring prices have driven men to hire themselves out daily to feed their families. The Iraq Study Group Report released this month by a bipartisan commission in Washington said unemployment ranges from 20%-60% of Iraq's population.

Tuesday's bombing was the second major attack in less than a month in which unemployed Shiites were lured to their deaths by a suicide bomber promising to hire them for the day.

Twenty-two people were killed and 44 were wounded Nov. 19 when a minivan driven by a man promising work exploded in the mainly Shiite southern city of Hillah.

Interior Ministry spokesman Brig. Abdul-Karim Khalaf, who gave the official police account of Tuesday's attack, said at least 63 people were killed and 236 were wounded.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite, blamed the "horrible crime" on Sunni extremists.

"Iraq's security forces will chase the criminals and bring them to justice," he said.

On Monday, police discovered a bomb hidden outside the Shiite mosque in Samarra that was targeted Feb. 22 in a bombing that destroyed the mosque's golden dome and set off a wave of sectarian violence.

The bomb discovered Monday exploded while coalition bomb disposal officials were removing it, slightly damaging the building. The blast caused no injuries.

Al-Maliki said Tuesday that there is no alternative to his national unity government. He said talks between major partners in his ruling coalition to form another bloc in the parliament did not amount to a bid to unseat him.

Vice President Tariq al-Hashemi, a Sunni who met with President Bush on Tuesday in Washington, and senior Shiite leader Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim have said the proposed bloc would include al-Hakim's Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, al-Hashemi's Iraqi Islamic Party, the two major Kurdish parties and independents.

Iraq's constitution stipulates that the largest bloc in the parliament receives a mandate from the president to form a government.

"What is going on now is positive when the aim, contrary to what has been said, is to broaden the government's political base and not an attempt to undermine its ideology or to search for alternatives," al-Maliki told reporters in his first public comments on these efforts.

"There is no alternative in Iraq for this national unity government because it is the guarantee for the political process to continue," he said.

The White House has denied that any plans were afoot to dump al-Maliki, who has been in office for seven months.

The U.S. command announced the deaths of five U.S. troops in Iraq, including three Marines killed in combat in Anbar province.

The three Marines assigned to the 3rd Marine Aircraft Wing died Monday of wounds sustained while fighting insurgents, according to a statement.

Another Marine died Monday from non-hostile causes in Anbar province, which stretches west from Baghdad to the borders of Syria, Jordan and Saudi Arabia.

A soldier died Monday of apparent natural causes near Diwaniyah, 80 miles south of Baghdad. The soldier lost consciousness and died after being transported to a troop medical clinic.

The American deaths raised to 51 the number of U.S. troops who have died this month.

Aswan Ahmed Lutfallah, 35, an Associated Press cameraman, was shot and killed while covering clashes in the northern city of Mosul. He was the third AP employee killed in the Iraq war.

71 Die In Attack On Baghdad Day Laborers (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-fiske

The Los Angeles Times, December 13, 2006

BAGHDAD — An attack on mostly Shiite day laborers waiting for work in a downtown square this morning killed at least 71 Iraqis and wounded more than 200 in the latest sectarian-tinged assault, the Interior Ministry said.

The nation's leaders condemned the attack and braced for Shiite reprisals. Witnesses said a driver approached the square before 7 a.m., loaded several workers in a pickup truck and left the area.

Soon afterward, a second driver pulled his car into the square, slammed into a group of workers and exploded the vehicle, according to witness Swadi Hussein, 28. A police patrol responded to the first blast and the truck driver reappeared, drove into the patrol and detonated his truck, Hussein said.

"As soon as the first explosion happened I wanted to run, but my legs wouldn't move," said Hussein, who sells secondhand clothes at the market. "I was too shocked to do anything."

He saw two bodies fly through the air and hit a nearby building. Police started shooting into the air to disperse the crowd, and at least one person started shooting, too, Hussein said. Rescuers shouted, "Oh, God! Oh, Father!" as black smoke filled the street and cars burned.

Ali Naji, 32, was among wounded workers taken to Baghdad's Kindi Hospital. Naji had avoided the square for a long time, he said, but returned in recent weeks out of need.

Today, one of the car bombs exploded near him and a group of fellow laborers as they ate breakfast.

DOJ_NMG_0106032

"I saw their flesh shattered and flying in the air," Naji said.

He blacked out, and came to in the hospital with glass embedded in his head.

Qasim Mohammed Jassim, 37, saw the first bomb detonate and didn't have time to pack up his tools before the second bomb sent splinters through his left hand. He, too, was sent to Kindi Hospital, to lie and wait for treatment beside victims' charred bodies.

The prime minister, who is a religious Shiite political activist, spoke out soon after the bombing, promising a thorough investigation.

"Iraq's security forces will chase the criminals and bring them to justice," he said.

Mahmoud Mashhadani, the Sunni speaker of parliament, also condemned the bombing, saying it victimized the poor, "turning them into pieces of flesh."

Khalaf, the Interior Ministry chief, suggested today's bombing was a response to raids this week by police forces, who killed 17 insurgents and detained 32 more. He promised better protection for workers in the square.

Truck Bomb Kills 70 Iraqis As The Poor Gather For Jobs (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, December 13, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 12 — A truck loaded with bags of wheat drove up to a crowd of poor Shiites early Tuesday, lured them close with a promise of work and exploded as they gathered around. Seventy people were killed and 236 were wounded, officials said.

The attack, in a square in central Baghdad, together with bodies found by Iraqi authorities, pushed the day's deaths across Iraq to at least 131, the highest total since a bombing killed more than 200 here last month. Shiite political leaders often point to such attacks, arguing that they, not the American military, should control security here.

The attack comes at a delicate time for the Bush administration. The White House is weighing proposals for major changes in its policy on the war. Months of escalating violence have drained support in the United States for the occupation, and left officials here and in Washington searching for a way out of an increasingly complicated war.

The Iraqi government, meanwhile, is pushing the American military to cede control of security in the capital, arguing that Iraqis know best how to protect themselves. American commanders, however, fear the Shiite-dominated government will use the predominantly Shiite army as a weapon against Iraq's embattled Sunni minority.

The Iraqi prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, immediately denounced the bombing, calling it the work of supporters of the former dictator, Saddam Hussein. Shiite workers, still scraping rubble out of blood-stained puddles at noon, angrily accused the United States of failing to protect them.

"The security portfolio is still being held by the Americans," said Waleed Hussein, a hardware store owner, whose two brothers and son were wounded. "We put all this on their shoulders."

The deepening war again drew the attention of Iraq's Sunni Arab neighbors. On Monday more than 30 prominent Islamic clerics from Saudi Arabia called on Sunni Muslims around the Middle East to support Sunnis in Iraq against Shiites, The Associated Press reported. The clerics, most of them from Saudi Arabia's top Islamic universities, centers of hard-line Islam, posted their statement on a Saudi news Internet site.

"After almost four years of occupation, it is clear that the aim behind this occupation is for the Crusaders and Shiites to take control of Iraq, paving the way to complete their control over the region," the statement read, the news agency said.

The bombing in Baghdad followed a grimly familiar pattern. Day laborers, whose wages average about $11 a day, gathered in the early morning chill to wait for offers of work. Shortly before 7 a.m., a small Kia truck drove up, loaded with bags of wheat.

"The owner got down and shouted, 'I need laborers to unload!' " said a worker who had been standing in the area when the blast occurred.

Just as the workers gathered, the truck exploded, scattering grain in all directions, scarring the facade of a three-story building, wounding scores of workers and gouging out a crater nearly 10 feet wide. But two hours after the blast, workers had already cleared away most of the debris.

The hardware store owner, Mr. Hussein, who was standing in front of his crumpled shop shortly before noon, piling debris into hardhats and buckets, said he thought there had been a second bomb, delivered moments later on a motorcycle, though the police did not confirm it.

The immediate aftermath was also familiar. Brothers, fathers and sons sought each other. One man, slightly wounded, repeated the name of a Shiite saint. He was grabbing at bodies in a tangled heap, looking for his brother, Maitham Ali, a 41-year-old worker who was there when the bomb went off. He found him still alive and lifted him into a car.

The wounded were taken to Kindi Hospital, which has one of the city's primary emergency rooms, but which declined badly in recent months, said the director, Flayeh Hassan. The hospital has lost large numbers of doctors and nurses, as many middle-class Iraqis have fled the country. There is not enough money to buy basic supplies, he said.

Kadhim Thijil, a 40-year-old construction worker from the southern city of Nasiriya, said he needed stitches that were costing more money than he had. He saved his small daily earnings and sent about $30 to his family each week, he said.

The American military described the startling rescue of 23 hostages from a neighborhood in west Baghdad by Iraqi Army soldiers. Some of the captives were found in car trunks.

The military also announced the deaths of five service members, while gunmen in Mosul shot and killed a cameraman for Associated Press Television News, the news agency reported.

Also on Tuesday, the military announced it had detained the head of the Kut office of Moktada al-Sadr, a Shiite cleric, on Dec. 9. The Iraqi, whom they did not identify, was suspected of smuggling weapons and attacking American and Iraqi forces, the military said.

'Death Square' Blast Kills 70 Iraqi Laborers (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, December 13, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec 12 -- They arrived Tuesday morning at a place where sudden death intersects with life. They were mostly young men from Basra, Nasiriyah, Amarah and other towns across Shiite-dominated southern Iraq. At a time when men their age were joining Shiite militias or criminal gangs, they sought something more elusive in the new Iraq: jobs.

In Tayaran Square, about a mile from the fortified Green Zone, the day laborers waited for work at the going rate of $10 a day, paltry by Baghdad standards. In recent months, there had been two bombings here, killing several people. Local residents called the place Death Square. Yet scores of men came.

"They came in order to live," said Sadiq Ali, the short, stocky owner of the Salaam Cafe, where many of the young men had their breakfast tea.

About 7 a.m., a red Chevrolet Malibu truck pulled up at the edge of the square, witnesses said. As the men gathered around, it exploded, killing 70 and injuring more than 230. Others said they heard a second blast at about the same time. The bombing was the deadliest assault since car bombs and mortar shells killed more than 200 people in the Shiite slums of Sadr City on Nov. 23.

Tuesday's attack illustrates the immense challenges that lie ahead as the United States promotes an effort to create thousands of jobs in Iraq. Many Iraqi leaders have called for such programs since U.S.-led forces invaded in Iraq in 2003.

"It's a bit late, as usual," said Mahmoud Othman, an independent Kurdish legislator. "They should have done this three years ago. In this country, they have spent so much money on security without results. If they had spent one-tenth of that on creating jobs, more projects and fighting unemployment, things would have been better now."

In today's Iraq, the violence is often directed at the economic foundations of society. Insurgents have detonated car bombs in crowded bazaars and factories and attacked minibuses carrying company employees. Criminals have kidnapped wealthy businessmen for ransom and robbed banks. Even generators that provide electricity to whole communities have been blown up.

Senior U.S. military commanders now say that a military solution alone will not stem the sectarian violence plaguing Iraq. Initiatives to boost the nation's anemic economy, they say, must become part of their arsenal.

On Tuesday, Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, the departing operational commander of the Multinational Corps in Iraq, said he was frustrated that of an initial $18.4 billion in reconstruction funds allocated by Congress, none had been spent to boost Iraq's agriculture industry.

"Not only could Iraq feed itself, but it could feed large portions of the region and have goods and services to export," Chiarelli told reporters.

He expressed pride in some efforts, specifically a U.S. date palm spraying program in which helicopters sprayed thousands of acres of trees with pesticides to eradicate insects that had caused major damage. Iraq once produced roughly 30 percent of the world's dates, its second-biggest export after oil. Today, the date industry is showing signs of recovery.

"Those are the kinds of things that are small victories, probably kind of float in under the radar, but I think over time can have a cumulative effect that can really start to see the level of the violence go down and get people thinking about something else than whether their neighbor is Sunni or Shia," Chiarelli said.

But as recently as September, date farmers in Baqubah complained that sectarian violence had driven families out of villages and that gunmen had ambushed farmers.

All 20-year-old Khalid Nasser wanted was a job. Several days ago, he traveled from the southern city of Basra to seek his fortune in Baghdad. He stayed at the Mustafa Hotel, down the road from Death Square, where dozens of day laborers resided. "They came because they were starving," said Salih Abbas, the tall, burly owner of the hotel.

Nasser's days were spent working, even though he knew of the risks of lingering in the square each morning. His 13 relatives back in Basra depended on him. "I needed the money," said Nasser, a slim, fashionable young man who wore a New York Yankees ski hat.

On Tuesday morning, as he sipped tea, he watched his foreman walk toward the square, where the pickup had pulled up.

"It was a huge explosion," said Mohammed Jabbar Yousef, 37, a shopkeeper whose store is just across the street from the blast site. " People were running in every direction. They were clutching their heads, legs and hands. There was blood everywhere."

Nasser was thrown to the ground unconscious. When he woke up, he saw a huge crater. The left side of his head was bleeding. His right leg was injured. His foreman's body, he said, was "cut into two pieces."

Two hours later, Nasser limped into the Salaam Cafe. His head was bandaged. He joined a group of men, some of whom spoke in casual tones about the bombing.

"We get used to death," said Ali, the owner. "Death is in the hands of God. What can we do?"

"They are targeting the Shia," Abbas said, shaking his head in disgust.

Outside, the sound of hammers filled the air. Shopkeepers were putting their shattered doors back into place. On the street, men washed away the blood, turning the water maroon. Women in black abayas were shopping. Minibus drivers were hailing customers.

Yousef, the shopkeeper, had picked up his tumbled wall of goods and was back in business. He expressed sympathy for the day laborers. "I have a family to feed," he said as a customer entered.

For the most part, life had returned to normal on Death Square, save for one soul sitting in a coffee shop, pondering his future. "I will take my brother and go back to Basra," Nasser said. "I will not return."

Pakistan Is Behind Taliban, Karzai Says (FT)

By Rachel Morarjee

Financial Times, December 13, 2006

President Hamid Karzai on Tuesday dismissed the idea of talks with the Taliban as useless in stemming surging violence in Afghanistan without tackling elements in the Pakistani government that he said were sponsoring terrorism.

Speaking in Kandahar, Afghanistan's main southern city and a former Taliban stronghold, Mr Karzai spoke hours after a suicide bomber killed six people in an apparent attempt to assassinate the governor of neighbouring Helmand province, who escaped unhurt.

"The problem is not Taliban; we don't see it that way. The problem is with Pakistan," he said when asked if he would consider opening talks with leaders of the Islamic militia ousted from power in 2001.

It would not be possible to open dialogue with two key leaders of the movement, the former Taliban leader Mullah Mohammed Omar or the US's most-wanted terrorist Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, unless they resolved their problems with the international community, he said.

"If we resolve the difficulty with Pakistan the question of Taliban will go away automatically. So are we talking to the Taliban? Yes, we are. We are talking to Pakistan," he said.

"The state of Pakistan was supporting the Taliban, so we presume that if there are any Taliban that they are still being supported by a state element," he said. The insurgency, he added, had to be tackled at its roots across the border.

Pakistan's foreign minister, Khurshid Mehmood Kasuri, visited Afghanistan last week to lay the groundwork for a cross-border meeting of tribal councils to discuss the violence, as the atmosphere between the two countries sours.

Mr Karzai was on a two-day visit to Kandahar in the wake of a meeting of the Policy Action Group, a war cabinet of Nato generals and ambassadors and Afghan officials set up to look at ways of stemming the growing violence and boosting development.

Mr Karzai also criticised mounting civilian casualties inflicted by Nato and US forces and said the casualties would "absolutely" erode support for the Afghan government if it carried on.

Four civilians including a teenage girl were killed in a raid on a house in south-eastern Afghanistan on Tuesday, the latest in a string of civilians caught in crossfire.

"People are angry about these killings," he said, claiming there was a rising wave of fury in Kandahar about an incident in which British troops in a military convoy fired on unarmed civilians after a suicide bomb earlier this month. He said his government was working with Nato to prevent a recurrence.

Army, Marine Corps To Ask For More Troops (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, December 13, 2006

The Army and Marine Corps are planning to ask incoming Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and Congress to approve permanent increases in personnel, as senior officials in both services assert that the nation's global military strategy has outstripped their resources.

In addition, the Army will press hard for "full access" to the 346,000-strong Army National Guard and the 196,000-strong Army Reserves by asking Gates to take the politically sensitive step of easing the Pentagon restrictions on the frequency and duration of involuntary call-ups for reservists, according to two senior Army officials.

The push for more ground troops comes as the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have sharply decreased the readiness of Army and Marine Corps units rotating back to the United States, compromising the ability of U.S. ground forces to respond to other potential conflicts around the world.

"The Army has configured itself to sustain the effort in Iraq and, to a lesser degree, in Afghanistan. Beyond that, you've got some problems," said one of the senior Army officials. "Right now, the strategy exceeds the capability of the Army and Marines." This official and others interviewed for this report spoke on the condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to talk publicly about the matter.

The Army, which has 507,000 active-duty soldiers, wants Congress to permanently fund an "end strength," or manpower, of at least 512,000 soldiers, the Army officials said. The Army wants the additional soldiers to be paid for not through wartime supplemental spending bills but in the defense budget, which now covers only 482,000 soldiers.

The Marine Corps, with 180,000 active-duty Marines, seeks to grow by several thousand, including the likely addition of three new infantry battalions. "We need to be bigger. The question is how big do we need to be and how do we get there," a senior Marine Corps official said.

At least two-thirds of Army units in the United States today are rated as not ready to deploy, as well as lacking in manpower, training and -- most critically -- equipment, according to senior U.S. officials and the Iraq Study Group report. The two ground services estimate that they will need $18 billion a year to repair, replace and upgrade destroyed and worn-out equipment.

If another crisis were to erupt requiring a large number of U.S. ground troops, the Army's plan would be to freeze its forces in Iraq and Afghanistan, and divert to the new conflict the U.S.-based combat brigade that is first in line to deploy.

Beyond that, however, the Army would have to cobble together war-depleted units to form complete ones to dispatch to the new conflict -- at the risk of lost time, unit cohesion and preparedness, senior Army officials said. Moreover, the number of Army and Marine combat units available for an emergency would be limited to about half that of four years ago, experts said, unless the difficult decision to pull forces out of Iraq were made.

"We are concerned about gross readiness . . . and ending equipment and personnel shortfalls," said a senior Marine Corps official. The official added that Marine readiness has dropped and that the Corps is unable to fulfill many planned missions for the fight against terrorism.

Senior Pentagon officials stress that the U.S. military has ample air and naval power that could respond immediately to possible contingencies in North Korea, Iran or the Taiwan Strait.

"If you had to go fight another war someplace that somebody sprung upon us, you would keep the people who are currently employed doing what they're doing, and you would use the vast part of the U.S. armed forces that is at home station, to include the enormous strength of our Air Force and our Navy, against the new threat," Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said at a briefing last month.

But if the conflict were to require a significant number of ground troops -- as in some scenarios such as the disintegration of Pakistan -- Army and Marine Corps officials made clear that they would have to scramble to provide them. "Is it the way we'd want to do it? No. Would it be ugly as hell? Yes," said one of the senior Army officials. "But," he added, "we could get it done."

According to Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top U.S. commander for the Middle East, the Army and Marine Corps today cannot sustain even a modest increase of 20,000 troops in Iraq. U.S. commanders for Afghanistan have asked for more troops but have not received them, noted the Iraq Study Group report, which called it "critical" for the United States to provide more military support for Afghanistan.

"We are facing more operational risk than we have for many, many years," said Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.), a member of the Armed Services Committee. He called it "shocking and scandalous" that two-thirds of Army units are rated "non-deployable." He said the country has not faced such a readiness crisis since the aftermath of the Vietnam War.

The U.S. military has more than 140,000 troops in Iraq and 20,000 in Afghanistan, including 17 of the Army's 36 available active-duty combat brigades. When Army and Marine Corps combat units return from the war zone, they immediately lose large numbers of experienced troops and leaders who either leave the force, go to school or other assignments, or switch to different units.

The depletion of returning units is so severe that the Marines refer to this phase as the "post-deployment death spiral." Army officials describe it as a process of breaking apart units and rebuilding them "just in time" to deploy again.

Training time for active-duty Army and Marine combat units is only half what it should be because they are spending about the same amount of time in war zones as at home -- in contrast to the desired ratio of spending twice as much time at home as on deployment. And the training tends to focus on counterinsurgency skills for Iraq and Afghanistan, causing an erosion in conventional land-warfare capabilities, which could be required for North Korea or Iran, officials say.

If a conflict with North Korea or Iran were to break out and demand a medium to large ground force, the Army would be forced to respond with whatever it had available.

The U.S. military today could cobble together two or three divisions in an emergency -- compared with as many as six in 2001 -- not enough to carry out major operations such as overthrowing the Iranian government. "That's the kind of extreme scenario that could cripple us," said Michael E. O'Hanlon, a military expert at the Brookings Institution.

Unable to count on a significant troop withdrawal from Iraq, the Army seeks to ease the manpower strain by accelerating plans to have 70 active-duty and National Guard combat brigades available for rotations by 2011. Next year, for example, the Army intends to bring two brigades on a training mission back into rotation. It is investing $36 billion in Guard equipment in anticipation of heavier use of the Guard.

DOJ:

Feds Ease Tactics On Corporate Scandals (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

AP, December 13, 2006

The Justice Department on Tuesday limited its prosecutors' ability to crack down on corporations that withhold confidential information during investigations, scaling back tough legal tactics authorized after the Enron-era scandals.

Under the new guidelines, federal prosecutors are still expected to aggressively go after companies accused of fraud and other white-collar crimes.

But they bar the government from seeking harsher penalties for businesses that won't cooperate with prosecutors — either by denying them corporate attorney-client communications or paying lawyers' fees for employees under investigation.

The policy shift aims to temper a diverse coalition of critics — from conservative former Attorney General Ed Meese to the liberal American Civil Liberties Union — who call prosecution tactics developed in 2003 unfair and, in some cases, unconstitutional.

"The whole strategy here is to strike a balance between the central concerns of those who have raised questions about the policy ... and continue our aggressive efforts against corporate criminals," Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty said in an interview with The Associated Press after announcing the changes at a speech in New York that was closed to reporters and the public.

"We still have a job to do to get the facts so we can prosecute corporate criminals," McNulty said. "And there can be no letup in that effort. That's what the taxpayers want us to do. And that's what good corporations want us to do, too."

Under the new guidelines, U.S. attorneys:

_Must obtain written approval from the Deputy Attorney General before allowing prosecutors to demand confidential information or communications between attorneys and their clients.

_Must consult with the Assistant Attorney General who oversees all Justice Department criminal cases before allowing prosecutors to seek results of corporations' internal investigations or what McNulty described as other factual information.

_Cannot penalize or otherwise consider as uncooperative any firms that pay attorneys' fees for employees. However, McNulty said that he and future Deputy Attorneys General could approve harsher penalties in rare cases where the payments result in blocking the government's investigation.

_Cannot penalize corporations that refuse to hand over the confidential and so-called "privileged" attorney-client information. Firms that do, however, will receive credit for cooperating, McNulty said.

The new rules replace guidelines that intended to coordinate prosecution tactics in the country's 94 U.S. attorneys' offices in the wake of corporate scandals at Enron Corp., WorldCom Corp. and other firms that cost investors and employees billions of dollars.

But critics charged those tactics, developed by former Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson, were too harsh on corporations trying to avoid being branded as uncooperative. They asserted that such branding could lead to indictments that, publicly, scarred even innocent businesses forever. Last week, outgoing Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., introduced legislation to bar prosecutors from demanding attorney-client information from corporations in any case.

Responding to McNulty's announcement, some critics said it was unclear whether the new guidelines would make much difference.

Stan Anderson, senior counsel at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, said he remains bothered that firms who do turn over information or refuse to pay attorneys' fees are given credit for cooperating — even if those that do not aren't penalized.

"To me, that seems inconsistent," said Anderson, one of the lead critics of in the coalition that pushed for change. However, he said, the Justice Department "clearly recognized that they had a problem, and they recognized that we had legitimate concerns, and they're trying to do something about it."

McNulty said the "changes deserve to be given a try" before Congress moves forward with Specter's plan.

U.S. Imposes Limits In Fighting Corporate Crime (WSJ)

By Evan Perez And Kara Scannell

The Wall Street Journal, December 13, 2006

Signaling a shift in tactics in the battle against corporate crime, the Justice Department revised its rules for prosecuting corporations and individuals in white-collar investigations.

Under the new guidelines, federal prosecutors face new limits on when they can seek access to communication between company attorneys and employees being investigated for wrongdoing. Prosecutors also must receive formal approval from superiors in the local U.S. Attorney's offices and from senior Justice Department officials, to request such communication, and make written requests for companies to share information obtained in internal corporate investigations.

The changes, announced by Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty yesterday and effective immediately, revamp the so-called Thompson Memo guidelines issued in 2003 by former Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson.

Alongside recent moves by the Securities and Exchange Commission, the changes shore up corporate defenses that had been eroded in recent years by prosecutors and regulators during post-Enron corporate criminal investigations. Some of the tough tactics used in those cases were criticized as depriving accused companies and executives of their fundamental legal rights.

For example, in some instances prosecutors pressured companies to waive attorney-client privilege or stop paying legal bills of executives under investigation. Companies that didn't go along were sometimes judged to be uncooperative with prosecutors, risking indictment of the company itself.

Jonathan Rosen, former Assistant U.S. Attorney for the District of Columbia and now a white-collar criminal defense attorney at Mintz, Levin, Cohn, Ferris, Glovsky and Popeo P.C., says defense attorneys might now go over evidence prosecutors are using against their clients and use the new McNulty memo guidelines to try to have evidence thrown out. "The memo today could be used as an implied admission of overreaching," Mr. Rosen said. He added, "nothing the [Justice] Department can do today can retroactively cure a constitutional violation that occurred before this date."

Mr. McNulty said the changes sought to strike a balance between "making sure we get facts" while honoring the attorney-client privilege, a long-held legal right. He said the changes "raised the bar very high" on an individual prosecutor's ability to seek waivers of the privilege.

While some business advocates said the changes didn't go far enough, other legal experts questioned whether the changes could hinder some white-collar investigations already under way.

Christopher Wray, a former senior Justice Department official involved in drafting the previous guidelines in the Thompson memo, said the new guidelines could affect pending investigations on matters such as options backdating, environmental probes and criminal antitrust cases. Mr. Wray, former criminal-division chief and now head of King & Spalding's government investigations practice, said the new guidance "reduces the risk for abuse" and that "good responsible prosecutors respect the importance of a company's attorney-client privilege."

The changes respond to criticism from an alliance including civil-liberties groups, business advocates and criminal defense attorneys. They said that prosecutors routinely overstepped their powers and violated defendants' rights. Some of the harshest criticism came from a New York federal judge, Lewis A. Kaplan, who blasted the Justice Department for pressuring the accounting firm KPMG LLP to limit the fees it paid to lawyers who were defending former partners in a white-collar case. The Justice Department is appealing Judge Kaplan's KPMG ruling, and the new guidelines won't stop that from continuing, a senior Justice Department official said yesterday.

In an interview, Mr. McNulty said "this is an adjustment to our practices. We will still be able to hold people accountable as we have in the past."

Mr. McNulty said he was most troubled by the perception that some executives under investigation have been reluctant to talk to their employers' lawyers because they feared that anything they said could end up being shared with prosecutors and used against them. "A real theme to these changes is corporate compliance," he said. "By raising the bar high on client-attorney communication we will encourage that type of compliance."

The new guidelines won support from many white-collar defense lawyers, but some business groups expressed concerns that the guidance doesn't go far enough to erode a "culture of waiver" that they say exists.

"It's a step in the right direction and it leaves all of law enforcement's tools intact," said Andrew Weissman, a former Justice Department official who at one time led the Enron Task Force. "The fundamental problem that still remains to be tackled is the scope of criminal corporate liability" -- the ability to charge a corporation because of the illegal actions of one or a few employees.

Justice Toughens Rules On Corporate Probes (USAT)

By Edward Iwata

USA Today, December 13, 2006

Facing a business and political backlash over its post-Enron policies on prosecuting companies, the Justice Department issued new guidelines Tuesday that could curb prosecutors in their fight against corporate crime.

The policies come as Congress, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and other business groups seek to rein in anti-fraud laws and the federal crackdown on accounting and securities fraud following Enron and other scandals.

Earlier policies and the crackdown have led to the convictions of 1,000 people, including 300 top executives since 2002.

But the crackdown also angered business groups and defense attorneys, who accused prosecutors of forcing companies to cooperate with federal investigations and sign deferred prosecution agreements — or risk an indictment that could put them out of business.

Now, the new guidelines, effective immediately, create a higher standard for prosecutors seeking legally privileged information from companies, executives and their lawyers.

Prosecutors' requests for companies to waive attorney-client privilege will only be sought in rare cases, says Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty. Prosecutors must show "a legitimate need" for the waiver, and their requests must be approved by McNulty.

Justice Department officials say the guidelines balance the aggressive prosecution of fraud with preserving "the sanctity of attorney-client privilege."

A closely watched case involving KPMG became a legal flashpoint on Justice Department guidelines. In that case, a federal judge ruled recently that prosecutors should not have forced KPMG to drop its legal representation of former executives.

Among other factors, the new guidelines state that prosecutors — in deciding whether to indict a company or defer prosecution — should not weigh whether the company is paying legal fees for its employees under investigation.

Some corporate attorneys say the policies don't go far enough to stop prosecutors who pressure companies to waive attorney-client privilege. Frederick Krebs, head of the Association of Corporate Counsel, says the policies "will not put an end to the 'culture of waiver' that exists within the DOJ."

Other called the change overdue.

Matthew Jacobs, a former federal prosecutor now a partner at McDermott Will & Emery, calls the guidelines "a real helpful correction. … The government has had so much power and discretion that it overplayed its hand."

Eric Holder, a partner at Covington & Burling and the former deputy attorney general who wrote the first guidelines for prosecuting companies, says that "the true test will be in how those in the field respond to this dramatic shift."

Higher Hurdles Set In Corporate Crime Cases (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, December 13, 2006

The Justice Department announced new rules yesterday that will make it harder for prosecutors to bring criminal charges against companies, bending to intense pressure from business groups that claim the government has overreached in its pursuit of financial malfeasance.

In presenting the revised rules, Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty called the changes a substantial and direct response to a lobbying drive by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the National Association of Manufacturers and the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, among others.

Since devastating bankruptcies at Enron and WorldCom prompted Congress to pass a stringent corporate accountability law four years ago, business interests increasingly have pushed back on efforts to police their operations, arguing that the government has imposed too many costs on companies with too few benefits for investors.

The new concessions focus on the sensitive issue of when prosecutors can force companies to waive their legal rights to protect e-mail messages and other internal communications, essentially instructing government lawyers that they must jump through additional hoops before winning access to information they desire. Previously, prosecutors could consider the failure to waive those rights in deciding whether to charge a company with a crime.

Under the revisions, prosecutors who seek information about suspected wrongdoing must first win approval from the top official in their home offices before asking a business to waive its attorney-client privilege. Government lawyers who want to review contacts between a company and its attorneys under a privilege waiver must go all the way to the Justice Department in Washington for permission from its second-highest-ranking official.

The issue carries profound implications for businesses that run afoul of the law. Indictments against companies, particularly financial services firms, can be a death knell, as with the obstruction of justice case four years ago against the accounting firm Arthur Andersen. As a result, former prosecutor Andrew Weissmann said, such moves should require formal consent by top Justice Department authorities.

Weissmann said the government follows a similar approach before sentencing individuals to death. "Corporations deserve the same oversight, since a corporate indictment can lead to similar dire consequences," he added.

The new rules also bar prosecutors from directing companies under investigation to stop paying employees' attorneys fees, a strategy that was declared unconstitutional last summer by a federal judge in New York who blasted the government, saying it "let its zeal get in the way of its judgment."

In practice, former government lawyer Timothy J. Coleman said, the changes likely will reduce the number of waiver requests by adding another layer of red tape, taking resources away from the investigation itself and directing often unwanted attention onto a rank-and-file prosecutor.

The revisions come just days after Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) introduced a bill that would force the Justice Department's hand. Lawmakers have held two hearings this year on the issue, spurred by a coalition of trade groups that yesterday assailed the new policy as "a day late and a dollar short," in the words of Frederick J. Krebs, president of the Association of Corporate Counsel.

At the same time, a handful of prosecutors in U.S. attorneys offices around the nation said they viewed the changes as a clear attempt to placate business interests that have been pushing back on rules in recent weeks.

The motivation among industry groups is in no small part a pocketbook issue. Waiving legal privileges to avoid criminal indictment can put scores of sensitive documents into the hands of plaintiff lawyers, driving up the costs of settling related shareholder lawsuits.

Last month, a report by a private committee, financed in part by an executive who is fighting civil charges and with support from Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr., proposed indicting companies only as a "last resort" and requiring state officials to get permission from federal authorities in Washington before filing such charges.

In an interview, Deputy Attorney General McNulty rejected the notion that the concessions would cripple ongoing fraud investigations. "Our efforts to prosecute corporate crime will continue vigorously," he said.

In the short term, however, the revisions will buy Justice additional time before Congress takes up more far-reaching legislation proposed by Specter last week. Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), who will lead the Judiciary panel come January, said the government had curtailed "its most excessive practices" but expressed reservations about how the changes would work over time.

The move carries potent symbolic value in a climate in which business has been emboldened in its efforts to return to a pre-Enron regulatory environment.

"The tide has turned," said Craig Margolis, a defense lawyer for a former executive at the audit firm KPMG, which waived its legal rights last year to help prosecutors build a case against more than a dozen former officials. "It should restore needed balance to the investigation of business entities and their employees."

Bar Raised For Prosecuting Corporate Fraud (MRKTWTCH)

By Robert Schroeder, Marketwatch

Market Watch, December 13, 2006

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) -- The Justice Department raised the bar for prosecuting corporate fraud on Tuesday, requiring prosecutors to get approval from a top Justice official before going after confidential information between companies and their lawyers.

Announced by Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty at a speech in New York, the new department guidelines also say prosecutors can't penalize companies that pay lawyers' fees for their employees.

Despite what he called the "wild excesses" of former executives Dennis Kozlowski and Bernie Ebbers, McNulty said corporate leaders recognize they have common goals with the Justice Department and that the government wants to encourage companies to prevent corruption through self-policing.

The guidance appears to make it tougher to go after corporate executives accused of wrongdoing. Read more about the guidance.

"My policy makes clear that attorney-client communications should only be sought in rare cases," McNulty said. "Before they are requested, the United States Attorney must seek approval directly from me," McNulty said in a speech to Lawyers for Civil Justice.

The guidelines revise a controversial 2003 memo from then-Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson, which some defense lawyers and business interests said chilled attorney-client communications.

"Corporate attorneys have told me that they need full and frank communications between attorney and employee if they are expected to steer conduct away from law-breaking or uncover criminal wrongdoing," McNulty said.

Speaking to reporters, a senior department official disagreed with critics' assertions about the extent of prosecutors' power, but said "to some degree here, perception is the reality."

The aim of the guidelines is to improve the ability of corporate officers to get advice from their lawyers and to comply with legal requirements, the official said.

The guidance is effective immediately and applies to ongoing investigations.

DOJ Revises Corporate Fraud Procedures (LTIMES)

By Jason McLure, Legal Times

Legal Times, December 13, 2006

Bending to pressure from Congress, a federal judge and a lobbying campaign by business and legal groups, the Justice Department announced a number of immediate changes to its corporate-fraud charging policies Tuesday.

Federal prosecutors will be required to seek approval from senior Justice Department officials in Washington, D.C., before requesting that a company turn over the results of an internal investigation or the strategic advice of the company's lawyers.

In addition, with rare exception, prosecutors will no longer be allowed to pressure companies to cut off legal fees to executives or employees under scrutiny in fraud investigations. Previously, companies could earn "cooperation credit" with the government in certain cases by cutting off those fees. Such credit was an important factor for companies seeking to avoid a potentially crippling criminal indictment.

The changes, announced in a Tuesday speech by Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty at a legal conference in New York, are a step back from the government's aggressive anti-fraud prosecution tactics outlined in the so-called Thompson memo, named for former Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson, in 2003.

In the speech, McNulty said the new guidelines were designed to address the "perception, well founded -- or not," that the Justice Department's policies were "chilling attorney-client communications" and hurting the effectiveness of corporate lawyers in conducting internal investigations into fraud and other wrongdoing.

Critics of the government's waiver practices have said they discourage corporate executives and employees from speaking honestly with company lawyers during internal fraud investigations for fear their conversations could one day be handed over to the government and disclosed in court. That disclosure, in turn, could lead to shareholder class actions.

Publicly, the Justice Department has been vague about exactly what led McNulty and other officials to change course.

In June a federal judge in Manhattan issued a strongly worded opinion criticizing the conduct of prosecutors in the Justice Department's investigation of KPMG and the accounting firm's marketing of abusive tax shelters. In his opinion, Judge Lewis Kaplan found that federal prosecutors, who pressured the accounting giant to immediately stop paying the legal fees of potentially culpable partners and employees, had violated the defendant's Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination and Sixth Amendment right to counsel.

"The tide has turned for the Thompson memo," said Craig Margolis, a former federal prosecutor who represents one of the former KPMG partners under indictment, in a statement. "DOJ essentially was compelled to make these changes in the face of judicial and Congressional scrutiny."

Still, some say that McNulty's tinkering didn't go far enough. "We're pleased that they're making an effort," says Fred Krebs, president of the Association of Corporate Counsel. "But overall, it's a day late and a dollar short."

Krebs' group and others, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the American Civil Liberties Union and the National Association of Criminal Defense Attorneys, had sought to bar the Justice Department from using a company's waiver decision as a factor in deciding whether to indict the corporation for fraud.

The apex of that lobbying campaign came in September, when McNulty appeared before the Senate Judiciary Committee and received a heavy dose of bipartisan criticism from former Justice Department officials and senators. On Tuesday, a senior Justice Department official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said that although the DOJ had been considering revisions to its policy for more than a year, the Judiciary Committee hearing "allowed [McNulty] to begin focusing his thinking on this issue and gave us the opportunity to hear in a more focused way from folks who were concerned about this."

A final nudge came last week from Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the outgoing chairman of the Judiciary Committee, who introduced a bill that would strictly limit a prosecutor's ability to request attorney-client-privileged information. On Tuesday a spokeswoman for Specter said that the senator was studying the Justice Department's changes and couldn't comment on them. Incoming Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., who had shared many of Specter's concerns, applauded the changes in a statement released Tuesday. "I am pleased the Department has heeded bipartisan criticism of its policy," said Leahy's statement.

The new guidelines, which the department has dubbed the "McNulty memo," say that "prosecutors generally should not take into account whether a corporation is advancing attorneys' fees to employees or agents under investigation and indictment." The only exception, according to a footnote in the memo, is in "extremely rare" cases where the "totality of circumstances" show advancing fees to culpable employees was done with the intention to "impede a criminal investigation."

With respect to obtaining privileged information, federal prosecutors will have to go through a more rigorous approval process, similar to the process required of prosecutors seeking electronic wiretaps or subpoenas for reporters. For certain types of sensitive attorney-client information, such as the advice a defense attorney gave to the management of a corporation facing a fraud investigation, prosecutors are now required to obtain the approval of the Justice Department's No. 2 official in Washington -- currently McNulty.

For privileged factual material a company has obtained through an internal investigation into an alleged fraud, such as transcripts of interviews with culpable employees, prosecutors will need to obtain the approval of the local U.S. Attorney in their district, who can only sign off on such a request with the approval of the head of the DOJ's Criminal Division in Washington, currently Alice Fisher.

Previously, prosecutors had wide latitude to issue such requests on their own, though how often they've formally made those requests is a matter of some debate between the Justice Department and the defense bar.

The new policy will still grant companies cooperation credit for "voluntarily" waiving their privilege over internal legal material. That still leaves defense attorneys with a strong incentive to waive the privilege, as a company's level of cooperation with criminal investigators is key to warding off a criminal indictment of the company as a whole.

"In close cases, maybe some corporations will decide that since prosecutors have to get approval for [waivers] they think they'll tough it out," says James Robinson, the former chief of the DOJ's Criminal Division. "But that's a game of chicken."

The McNulty Memo (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 13, 2006

Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty yesterday released his revision of the 2003 Thompson Memorandum on the department's charging guidelines in corporate prosecutions. Though he was shy about referring to it as the "McNulty Memo," this may simply reflect the fact that the Thompson Memo became -- with some justification -- shorthand for prosecutorial excess in the nearly four years it was Justice Department policy. Nor has that criticism been limited to "business groups." The American Bar Association and the ACLU also raised civil-rights and due-process concerns about the policy.

Mr. McNulty acknowledged that the memo had to be revised because it undermined, rather than bolstered, the credibility of the Justice Department as an effective fighter of white-collar crime. The revisions announced yesterday raise the bar for prosecutors in two of the most criticized areas of the Thompson Memo, and to that extent they are to the good. But it must be pointed out that the McNulty Memo reaffirms the underlying department presumption that the legal treatment of firms is no different than for individuals. In the language of the memo, it should be neither more lenient nor harsher than on individuals suspected of criminal activity. In an interview in our offices yesterday Mr. McNulty declined to acknowledge that indictment of a business and of an individual are different things.

What the McNulty Memo does do is tell federal prosecutors they may no longer hold it against a firm under investigation if it declines to waive attorney-client privilege or cut off the payment of legal fees for employees who are investigated or have been charged. Whether these restrictions work remains to be seen.

Mr. McNulty told us yesterday that this didn't mean prosecutors couldn't give a firm "credit" for waiving privilege. But if it counts in your favor to waive privilege, it's hard to see how it doesn't count against you not to waive. When your firm is in danger of being put out of business by a federal indictment, this is hardly the moment in which one lightly declines to answer "extra credit" questions.

That said, the new memo's movement is clearly in the right direction. U.S. Attorneys are being told they should not use the threat of indictment as a club to compel the waiver of attorney-client privilege, at least as it pertains to "legal advice and communications" between a firm and its counsel. Stan Anderson, chief counsel for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, expressed doubt yesterday that this would put an end to the "culture of waiver" that Mr. McNulty acknowledged had become the general perception of Justice.

Similarly with the payment of legal fees. Mr. McNulty was categorical that a firm would not be penalized for paying legal fees of employees under investigation or indictment if the firm was legally or contractually obligated to do so. One would hope this would go without saying. If a company is legally bound to pay its employees' legal fees, how could it count against the firm to comply? Even if a firm had no such obligation, Mr. McNulty said, prosecutors are only supposed to weigh the decision to pay legal fees if the firm engages in a "pattern of obstruction."

Citing pending litigation, Mr. McNulty declined to say whether the KPMG tax-shelter case in New York would have fit that description. That case -- involving 18 people, mostly former KPMG employees -- is currently in federal court in New York. Earlier this year, the judge in the case, Lewis Kaplan, ruled that the defendants' Sixth Amendment right to counsel had been violated by the prosecutors' pressure on the firm to cut off legal assistance. The prosecutors are appealing that ruling, and Mr. McNulty suggested that the government's brief in the appeal made the case for why cutting off fees was appropriate.

Obviously it would be a colossal admission of error for the government to climb down in this case. But let's recognize that the KPMG prosecution is fraught with precisely the sort of excesses that Justice presumably wishes to weed out now. It is hard to reconcile the professed desire to rein in overly zealous prosecution with the heavy-handedness with which that case has been pursued -- and the deferred prosecution agreement with KPMG itself that buttresses it.

The government clearly expected that the prospect of decades in prison would induce more of the KPMG defendants to cop a plea; so far, only one of the original 19 has. It is striking that in the face of long prison terms and the denial of legal and other support from their erstwhile employer, the rest have chosen to have their day in court. But KPMG itself didn't have that option, as it learned watching Arthur Andersen implode.

This returns us to the broader question of whether indicting a firm is really analogous to indicting an individual, since a firm is often sentenced to death at the time it is charged, without the benefit of trial. Mr. McNulty would not concede the need for a change in policy. "I recognize that there are unique circumstances, . . . issues and concerns" in indicting an entire firm, the Deputy AG allowed. "But I would not characterize them as 'due process' concerns." No doubt Justice wants to reserve some weapons for pursuing genuinely corrupt corporate actors. But the threat of putting a company out of business simply by charging it with a crime turns the presumption of innocence on its head.

Like the Thompson Memo, the new charging memorandum does acknowledge the explosive nature of a corporate indictment, describing it as "a unique opportunity for deterrence on a massive scale." Call it WMD for white-collar crime. But blowing up companies to send a message to others in their industry strikes us as dubious public policy.

Mr. McNulty views the new memo as "a very substantial change in how the Justice Department does business." It is that. And he deserves substantial credit for acknowledging that a big change was necessary. The book is open, though, on whether the McNulty Memo goes far enough. It may be that Justice needs to lose a high-profile case such as the KPMG prosecution before the full sea-change occurs.

Pinochet Death Renews Calls For CIA Files (WP/AP)

By Bill Cormier, The Associated Press

SANTIAGO, Chile -- The blast rocked Washington's Embassy Row on Sept. 21, 1976, ripping through the car of one of Chilean dictator Augusto Pinochet's most outspoken critics.

The assassination of Orlando Letelier and his American assistant two miles from the White House prompted demands for explanations and helped expose what President Nixon, Secretary of State Henry Kissinger and a series of CIA officials tried for years to conceal: U.S support for a military dictatorship that was killing thousands of its own citizens.

In the wake of the former leader's Sunday death, officials at the think tank where Letelier and Ronni Moffitt worked said they are sending U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales a letter asking for the release of the remaining information.

In 1998, the Clinton administration declassified more than 16,000 documents related to Chile, but withheld documents on the Letelier bombing, citing an ongoing investigation.

"With the prime suspect no longer here, there is no reason to keep those documents secret," said Sarah Anderson of the Washington-based Institute for Policy Studies.

Former Chilean secret police chief Manuel Contreras, who served seven years in a Chilean prison for the assassination, claimed his orders came directly from Pinochet.

"The documents related to the Letelier case definitely could include embarrassing information about the relationship between the U.S. government and the Pinochet dictatorship," Anderson said. "But that shouldn't outweigh the public's right to know about that history, especially if it gives consolation to the victims' families."

Congressional investigations, CIA reports and the declassified documents have already revealed much about the relationship between Pinochet and the U.S.

Declassified transcripts portray Kissinger downplaying concern over Chile's human rights record, even as the dictatorship was torturing and killing thousands of opponents. The death toll would eventually reach at least 3,197.

Meeting with Chile's ambassador in September 1975, Kissinger joked that U.S. officials focusing on human rights violations had "a vocation for the ministry." And in a June 1976 meeting with Pinochet himself, Kissinger gently encouraged the dictator to release more prisoners while stressing that "we are sympathetic with what you are trying to do here."

Peter Kornbluh, who helped win declassification of many files on Chile as a senior analyst at George Washington University's National Security Archive, said the transcripts of Kissinger's meetings "paint a pretty stunning picture of gross insensitivity to human rights atrocities."

Kornbluh believes some of the most important U.S. documents on Chile remain classified _ he's still seeking CIA cable traffic between Santiago and Washington, reports on Contreras' visits to the United States and more information about a young American, Charles Horman, who was killed shortly after the coup.

Full disclosure, Kornbluh said, would likely show how the U.S. government helped Pinochet's regime consolidate its power with overt and covert support, despite knowing of its abuses.

Documents already released indicate that U.S. officials did not directly participate in the military coup on Sept. 11, 1973 that toppled Chile's Marxist president, Salvador Allende. But the CIA said it had advance warning of the coup and had tried to foment earlier coup attempts on direct orders from Nixon and Kissinger.

A report released by the CIA in 2000 said the agency had been "aware of coup-plotting by the military, had ongoing intelligence-collection relationships with some plotters and -- because CIA did not discourage the takeover and had sought to instigate a coup in 1970 -- probably appeared to condone it."

A secret cable from the CIA deputy director of plans, Thomas Karamessines, conveyed Kissinger's orders to CIA Santiago station chief Henry Hecksher in 1970: "It is firm and continuing policy that Allende be overthrown by a coup," and that the "American hand" be hidden.

Nixon's CIA director, Richard Helms, in handwritten notes said the president, intent on saving Chile from communism, ordered covert operations to "make the economy scream" under Allende.

Even U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell, when asked about covert U.S. activities in Chile, acknowledged in 2004 that, "It is not a part of American history that we're proud of."

The CIA kept in regular contact with Contreras _ blamed for much of the torture and death under the dictatorship _ until 1977, though it said the relationship "was not cordial and smooth."

Indeed, public outrage over Chile's human rights record prompted the U.S. Congress to ban weapons sales in 1976, not long after Kissinger's meeting with Pinochet.

In Santiago, Juan Pablo Letelier recalled the violent deaths of his father and thousands of other victims of Pinochet's dirty war.

"Pinochet died as an old man at the age of 91, surrounded by his family, his kids, attended by top medical assistance," he said. "My father's legs were severed by a bomb and he bled to death on a street on Embassy Row in Washington. Others had been tortured and thrown into the ocean ... It makes one think."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Court Faults Skilling Conviction But Orders Him To Report To Prison (WSJ)

By John R. Emshwiller

The Wall Street Journal, December 13, 2006

A federal appeals court signaled that former Enron Corp. President Jeffrey Skilling might serve far less than the 24-year sentence given him earlier this year by a federal judge, even as it ordered Mr. Skilling to immediately report to prison.

The decision by the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals turned down Mr. Skilling's request for bail pending the appeal of his May conviction in a Houston federal court on 19 counts, including conspiracy and fraud. The decision came just a day after the court had temporarily delayed Mr. Skilling's scheduled report date to a federal prison in Waseca, Minn. The criminal case against Mr. Skilling arose out of Enron's December 2001 collapse into bankruptcy. Mr. Skilling has consistently maintained his innocence.

In its decision yesterday, the appellate court said that Mr. Skilling's appeal was unlikely to result in the reversal of all 19 counts of his conviction. The former Enron chief executive will face some prison term. But exactly how long that prison term will wind up being became a bigger question, as the appeals court decision criticized a large swath of the verdicts against Mr. Skilling.

"Our review has disclosed serious frailties in Skilling's conviction of conspiracy, securities fraud and insider trading," the decision said.

Those three crimes made up the bulk of the case against Mr. Skilling. If those counts are thrown out on appeal, it "would require a substantial reduction" in the former Enron president's sentence, said Daniel Petrocelli, Mr. Skilling's lead criminal defense attorney. While disappointed with the decision to order Mr. Skilling to prison, "we take great comfort in the court's conclusion that there appear to be serious frailties in the convictions," Mr. Petrocelli said.

A Justice Department spokesman said the government is "pleased" that Mr. Skilling was ordered to report to prison.

In its decision, the appeals court said part of its concern regarding the conviction stemmed from a jury instruction given by the trial judge concerning Mr. Skilling's state of knowledge about the alleged wrongdoing at Enron. A larger concern cited by the court was connected to Mr. Skilling's conviction on conspiracy and related crimes. The appeals court noted that it had vacated convictions in another Enron-related case in which it expressed concerns over the application of the conspiracy statutes.

Yesterday's appellate-court decision was the latest example of troubles that the Justice Department has had on appeal with Enron-related convictions. For example, the Supreme Court threw out a criminal conviction of Arthur Andersen LLP after Enron's former accounting firm had been found guilty of obstructing justice in connection with destroying large amounts of Enron-related documents.

Appellate Ruling Pushes Skilling Closer To Prison (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, December 13, 2006

Former Enron chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling must report to a Waseca, Minn., prison soon, an appeals court judge ruled yesterday, because Skilling's appeal will not result in the reversal of all 19 of his criminal convictions.

Skilling, 53, had prepared to begin serving his 24 1/2 -year sentence yesterday. But an eleventh-hour reprieve from the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 5th Circuit late Monday kept him from flying to Minnesota. The court said it needed more time to consider Skilling's plea to remain free pending appeal.

Yesterday, in a two-page order, Circuit Judge Patrick E. Higginbotham reversed course. The judge cited "serious frailties" with Skilling's conviction on conspiracy, securities fraud and insider-trading charges by a Houston jury in May. In another Enron case last summer, the appeals court invalidated a legal theory the government had used, casting doubt on the survivability of many of Skilling's convictions.

But the judge's order suggested that the ruling in the other case would not impact Skilling's conviction on five counts of lying to auditors. Higginbotham concluded that other likely appellate challenges by Skilling, including an instruction that allowed jurors to convict him if he turned a blind eye to fraud at the Houston energy trading company, were "less formidable."

"Skilling raises no substantial question that is likely to result in the reversal of his convictions on all of the charged counts," Higginbotham wrote.

As a result, the judge denied Skilling's motion to remain free because his prison term would likely exceed the length of time it would take to appeal the case. The order means that Skilling, who continues to assert his innocence, could be forced report to the 1,070-inmate facility 75 miles south of Minneapolis as early as today, his lawyer said.

A Justice Department spokeswoman declined to comment yesterday. Daniel M. Petrocelli, a lawyer for Skilling, said the defense team remains "hopeful" because of the judge's doubts about some of Skilling's convictions.

Enron's December 2001 bankruptcy cost investors and employees billions of dollars in lost retirement savings. The company's founder, Kenneth L. Lay, died in July of natural causes, and a judge has since erased his conviction because of longstanding legal precedent.

Court Rejects Skilling's Bid To Stay Free Pending Appeal (LAT/BLOOM)

From Bloomberg News

The Los Angeles Times, December 13, 2006

Former Enron Corp. Chief Executive Jeffrey K. Skilling, sentenced to 24 years in prison for his role in a massive fraud that destroyed the company, lost his bid to remain free on bail while he appeals his conviction.

A federal appeals court in New Orleans on Tuesday revoked a stay issued the day before so it could consider his request. The court didn't specify when Skilling, convicted in May of securities fraud and conspiracy, must report to prison. Skilling, 53, is to serve his term at the low-security Federal Correctional Institution in Waseca, Minn.

"Skilling raises no substantial question that is likely to result in the reversal of his convictions on all of the charged counts," the federal appeals court said.

In revoking its stay, the court said it found weaknesses in Skilling's conviction, citing a previous court decision that may help the former CEO overturn some of the jury's verdicts.

Skilling maintains his innocence and said he was made a scapegoat.

Defense lawyer Daniel Petrocelli said that Skilling's formal appeal of his conviction would be filed in February or March.

Petrocelli didn't say whether Tuesday's ruling would be appealed to the full U.S. Court of Appeals in New Orleans, to the U.S. Supreme Court, or both. He also didn't say whether Skilling had already entered prison. The U.S. Bureau of Prisons website said that Skilling was "in transit."

Court rules the ex-Enron CEO must appeal 'frailties' in case from behind bars

Jeff Skilling's prison postponement proved brief Tuesday as a court denied the former Enron CEO's request to stay out of prison pending his appeal.

Skilling is expected to report to the low-security prison in Waseca, Minn., sometime today, a day later than originally scheduled.

Despite what it called "serious frailties in Skilling's conviction" a three-judge panel of the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled Tuesday that Skilling must remain in custody during his appeal.

In the order, the court indicated that its decision earlier this year to overturn convictions in another Enron trial, the Nigerian barge case, created "difficulties" for Skilling's convictions of conspiracy, securities fraud and insider trading.

"Yet Skilling raises no substantial question that is likely to result in the reversal of his convictions on all of the charged counts," the order continues.

Skilling's attorney Daniel Petrocelli said in an e-mail Tuesday night that he was disappointed with the decision but " ... we are very pleased with the court's conclusion that there are serious frailties with the convictions."

Was set to start TuesdaySkilling was originally scheduled to begin serving his 24-year, four-month sentence by 2 p.m. Tuesday afternoon.

But late Monday, the court of appeals issued an order postponing his report date until it gave "careful consideration" to his request for bail while he appeals his convictions on 19 criminal counts.

"This order is entered solely to allow this court to give careful consideration to the request for bail pending appeal," the court said in Monday's filing.

Within 24 hours, however, the decision was made.

The odd timing of the court's decisions was baffling to some observers.

"I can't imagine why they did it like this," said David Berg, a Houston trial lawyer who has followed the case. "Maybe just a bad sense of humor?"

Four focus points likelySkilling's appeal has not yet been filed, but there are four main points his defense team likely will focus on, according to court filings:

·The jury shouldn't have been allowed to use the theory that Skilling denied Enron of the intangible "honest services" he owed the company.

·The jury should not have been instructed that Skilling could be found guilty if he was "deliberately indifferent" to wrongdoing.

·Jurors in the trial were biased because of unfair media coverage in Houston and the widespread impact of Enron's bankruptcy on the community.

·Prosecutors denied the defense access to witnesses and made pretrial discovery difficult.

The misuse of the "honest services" argument was supported by the 5th Circuit's decision earlier this year to throw out charges against former Merrill Lynch executives in the barge case. In that case the court determined the bankers didn't profit personally from their actions and that the Enron workers they helped were carrying out Enron's corporate goals.

Petrocelli argued the jury shouldn't have been allowed to use the "honest services" argument in Skilling's case because he, too, was carrying out the company's goals.

In its reply to Skilling's motion to remain free pending appeal, the government argues the Merrill Lynch decision shouldn't apply to him because he was part of the management that set those goals.

"In other words, he was not following corporate policy or superior orders; he set policy and gave orders," the government argued.

If his appeal is denied, he can ask that the entire 5th Circuit hear the case and that the U.S. Supreme Court hear the appeal.

Confined at homeSince his sentencing in October, Skilling has been under court order to remain confined at home. He was ordered to wear an electronic monitoring ankle bracelet at all times so authorities could track his movements, and he can leave home only for specified reasons, such as medical appointments or court hearings.

Petrocelli said his client was prepared to fly to Minnesota early Tuesday, but when he got word of the delay "he remained home."

In Waseca on Tuesday, the delay was seen as just that: a brief respite from the inevitable.

"The man escaped for a while, didn't he?" said Waseca Mayor Roy Srp. "There is no doubt in my mind that Mr. Skilling is going to prison. It's just a matter of how much money is spent to postpone the inevitable."

Smoothing The Path From Corporate Life To Prison Life (LAW)

By Janeanne Murray, New York Law Journal

Law.com, December 13, 2006

The lengthy sentence imposed on former Enron CEO Jeffrey Skilling recently is a stark reminder that the U.S. Sentencing Guidelines have made federal prison a reality for many first-time offenders.

In fact, one third of all federal inmates are first-time, nonviolent offenders. Moreover, because of the length of their sentences, many of these individuals, like Skilling and WorldCom founder Bernie Ebbers, are denied placement in camp facilities.

But whether an inmate is assigned to a camp without wires and fences or a locked two-person cell, few would disagree that prison life is a profoundly dehumanizing experience.

How then can a prospective inmate obtain the most favorable placement in federal prison? Some hire sentencing consultants, the best of whom -- if hired early enough in the case -- can position and prepare their client for the least onerous experience the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) offers. But defense lawyers can readily develop expertise in this area and exert a positive impact on the quality of prison time their clients serve.

This article will focus on the various ways before, during and after sentencing, in which attorneys can ease their client's passage through federal prison. While a defense lawyer's primary objective will always be to avoid or reduce a prison sentence, surprisingly minimal effort can substantially improve the client's experience of prison life -- from securing a coveted lower-bunk pass, to entry into a program that makes participants eligible for early release.

BEFORE THE SENTENCING

The groundwork for ameliorating a federal prison sentence is laid between the plea (or trial) and the sentence. During this time the Probation Department conducts the presentence investigation and prepares the critical presentence investigation report (PSR), a detailed portrait of the client's personal and criminal history.

Akin to an academic transcript, the PSR accompanies a federal inmate throughout her prison experience and is used by the BOP to make several critical determinations about the inmate, including:

· Designation: Generally, an inmate will be designated to a facility matching her security level, within 500 miles of the inmate's home. BOP facilities are classified into one of five security levels, ranging from minimum (dormitory-style accommodations, limited or no perimeter fence and the lowest staff to inmate ratio) to high (locked single and two-person cells, tightly controlled movement and the highest staff to inmate ratio).

An inmate's security level is calculated using an elaborate scoring system based on the inmate's current offense behavior and prior criminal conduct, age, education, substance abuse history and whether she was permitted to surrender to prison voluntarily.[FOOTNOTE 1] In this process, the BOP primarily utilizes information from the PSR, unless superseded by the sentencing court's "Judgment in a Criminal Case" and accompanying "Statement of Reasons" (collectively, the Judgment).

Critically, in scoring the inmate's current and prior criminal conduct, the BOP will look beyond the actual finding of guilt and consider the often more serious underlying description of the offense, as set forth in the PSR. Certain factors, known as Public Safety Factors -- such as a client's alien status, sex offender status or the length of the sentence -- can preclude minimum security (camp) placement.

In addition, the BOP may in its discretion apply "management variables" to increase or lower an inmate's security level, based on such factors as the inmate's program needs or a finding that the inmate's scored security level is inconsistent with her security requirements.

· Program Eligibility: The BOP will use the PSR to determine an inmate's eligibility for a variety of educational and vocational programs. Of particular note is the Residential Drug Abuse Treatment Program (RDAP), a 500-hour, six- to 12-month intensive substance abuse treatment program, which qualifies eligible graduates for a six-month halfway house placement and a sentence reduction of up to one year.[FOOTNOTE 2] Candidates for the program must volunteer for it, have a documented substance abuse disorder (i.e., usually corroborated in the PSR), and 36 months or less remaining on their sentences. The sentence reduction is not available to deportable aliens, inmates previously convicted of certain violent offenses or those whose current offense involved violence or the possession of a dangerous weapon.[FOOTNOTE 3]

· Medical Treatment: The BOP will use the PSR, as supplemented by the Judgment, to determine any medical or mental health treatment appropriate for the inmate. The BOP will generally continue to provide the inmate's medical prescriptions (or their equivalent) listed in the PSR. Documented medical issues may entitle the inmate to certain exemptions. For example, back problems may secure the client a lower-bunk pass -- a not insignificant privilege when the sleeping arrangements are dormitory-style.

· Other Issues: The PSR is also used to establish, among other items, visitation lists, religious affiliations, dietary restrictions and appropriate work assignments, as well as to assist in pre-release planning.

Given the preeminence of the PSR, it is critical that the defense lawyer play an active role during the presentence investigation stage to influence this process to the client's advantage. The investigation is an opportunity for the lawyer to frame the PSR, not merely serve witness to it.

As part of the investigation, the assigned probation officer will schedule an interview with the client. In advance of that interview, the lawyer should fully debrief the client and family members on all matters pertinent to the PSR, from allergies to prescription medications to substance abuse history, in order to select the issues that need to be emphasized (or conversely downplayed) with the probation officer. A failure to mention alcohol or drug abuse problems could ruin the client's chances of getting into RDAP; an over-emphasis on medical issues could cause the client to be designated unnecessarily to a facility with specialized medical care.

A cooperative relationship with the probation officer at this stage will usually be more productive than an adversarial one. At the interview, the lawyer should not hesitate to prompt the client to give more expansive answers or interject to provide additional relevant information. It is also helpful to provide the officer with all available corroborating documents. Detailed notes should be taken, in the event there is a dispute later about what was said.

After the PSR is issued, the lawyer should review it carefully with the client for any inaccuracies or omissions and communicate any objections to the probation officer in a timely manner. See FedRCrimP 32(f)(1) (requiring objections to be made within 14 days of receipt).

While no inaccuracy is too small or immaterial to correct, particular attention should be paid to the descriptions of the client's role in the current offense and any alleged past criminal conduct. An improper application of a firearm enhancement in the sentencing calculation for the current case could render the client ineligible for the RDAP sentence reduction; an erroneous description of a prior domestic violence incident could negatively impact the client's security classification.

AT THE SENTENCING

There are several applications that can be made to the sentencing judge, either orally or in writing, with the aim of enhancing the client's prison experience.

Most importantly, the lawyer should move for any amendments to the PSR that have not already been made by the probation department in response to the lawyer's previous objections.[FOOTNOTE 4] The lawyer may also request judicial recommendations for designation to a particular facility or class of facilities, and admittance to a particular BOP program, such as the RDAP.

While not binding on the BOP, such recommendations have persuasive power, assuming the client meets the requisite eligibility criteria. In fact, the BOP must explain in writing to the court why it rejected the court's recommendation.[FOOTNOTE 5]

Specific medical or mental health treatment may be requested for the client, mindful, of course, of the potential impact this application can have on the client's ultimate designation. If the judge imposed a fine or restitution, the lawyer can move for payment to commence after the completion of the prison sentence.[FOOTNOTE 6]

Finally, the lawyer should always request permission for the client to self-surrender (not just to spare the client the hospitality on "Con Air," but to improve the client's security score) and sufficient time for the client to get his or her affairs in order.[FOOTNOTE 7]

AFTER THE SENTENCING

By the time the sentencing is over, most of the foundations of the client's federal prison experience are already set in stone. There are, nonetheless, several constructive steps the lawyer can take at this stage.

It is important to follow up with the probation officer to make sure the PSR is corrected according to the sentencing judge's instructions and that the corrected version is forwarded to the BOP. In addition, the Judgment should be reviewed to confirm it accurately reflects the rulings made at sentencing, and the court immediately petitioned for amendments if it does not.

In certain situations, it might be helpful for the defense lawyer to write directly to the BOP on the issue of the client's designation, for example, where the lawyer believes the client's likely security level will overstate her security needs. If so, this letter should be written as soon as possible after the sentencing, as it is much harder to change a designation decision once it has been made. The lawyer should make sure the client is designated before the surrender date, or move for an adjournment of the surrender date to permit completion of the designation process.

Finally, the lawyer can help the client prepare practically and psychologically for the transition to prison life. The client can be introduced to the wealth of Internet resources[FOOTNOTE 8] and literature[FOOTNOTE 9] on the subject. A meeting with a former inmate, if it can be arranged, can also be a valuable way of dispelling unnecessary fears. The client should also be encouraged to schedule full medical and dental check-ups prior to surrender.

CONCLUSION

For many prison inmates, the quality of the time they serve is as important as the length of the sentence. Time will certainly pass faster for most, for example, if one is in the relatively freer and less volatile environment of a camp facility. Thus, in federal criminal cases, once the client has pleaded guilty or has been convicted after trial, it is in the client's interest for the defense lawyer to adopt the dual strategy of mitigating the sentencing exposure and simultaneously positioning the client for a favorable prison placement. This is true even if the likelihood of incarceration appears to be remote. Once a prison sentence has been pronounced, it is often too late to take the measures that can make that sentence more palatable.

FN4 Such amendments cannot be made after the sentencing. See, e.g., United States v. Giaimo, 880 F2d 1561, 1563 (2nd Cir.1989) (no jurisdiction under FedRCrimP 32 to correct inaccuracies in PSR after a defendant has been sentenced).

FN5 See BOP Program Statement 5070.10, Responses to Judicial Recommendations and U.S. Attorney Reports, available at www.bop.gov/policy/progstat/5070_010.pdf. In the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, the BOP might, but not necessarily will, honor recommendations that an inmate with a sentence of 12 months or less be designated to a community confinement center (halfway house), as a result of the Court's decision in Levine v. Apker, 455 F.3d 71 (2nd Cir. 2006) (holding that the BOP's rule limiting inmate's placement in a halfway house to the lesser of the last 10 percent or six months of the sentence was an improper exercise of the BOP's rulemaking authority). Such a designation would be guaranteed, however, through a sentence of probation with a condition of community confinement. In addition, the BOP might not necessarily honor recommendations of camp placement for eligible offenders with sentences of 15 months or less, since such inmates may be required to man the work cadres of pretrial detention centers.

FN6 If the court grants this application, the inmate will usually not be required to participate in the Inmate Financial Responsibility Program (the program by which the BOP assists in the collection of court-ordered financial obligations), which can result in substantial deductions from the inmate's commissary account every month.

Former Siemens Executive Under Arrest (FT)

By Richard Milne In Frankfurt

Financial Times, December 13, 2006

A former senior executive at Siemens was arrested on Tuesday as the company for the first time put its own estimate on the scale of the alleged bribery scandal.

Europe's largest engineering group said it could reach €420m ($556m), more than double previous estimates.

Thomas Ganswindt, who left the management board in September and had special responsibility for Siemens' Information and Communications businesses, was in custody in Munich and being questioned by police investigating the bribery allegations.

The arrest takes the scandal to the highest level of Siemens' management.

Coming after controversy over an executive pay rise and the disposal of its mobile phone arm, the scandal is raising questions about the competence of Siemens' management and its supervisory board chairman, Heinrich von Pierer.

At Siemens, Joe Kaeser, finance director, said €420m in payments including some to consultants, would be examined to see if they had been siphoned off into private bank accounts.

But he added that not all the money had necessarily been embezzled.

The estimate, which compares with the €200m prosecutors believe was placed in slush funds, came as the group cut €168m from its net profit in the last six years.

In its most detailed comments since the scandal broke, Siemens said there could be further restatements and probes by the US Securities and Exchange Commission and the Department of Justice.

Siemens has launched a concerted effort to stem the damage to its image.

Following news it was due to be thrown out of Transparency International, the corruption watchdog, Siemens hired Michael Hershman, a former Watergate investigator and one of the anti-corruption body's founders, as compliance adviser.

Mr von Pierer, chairman and chief executive from 1992 to 2005 when most of the siphoning is alleged to have taken place, resisted calls to resign and said he would play an active role in investigations.

Ben Uglow, analyst at Morgan Stanley, said investors were not worried about the income restatement but could become more concerned if the scandal persisted: "It is not the cash amounts that worry us but more the principle."

Siemens Grapples With Widening Corruption Probe (WSJ)

By Mike Esterl

The Wall Street Journal, December 13, 2006

FRANKFURT -- A corruption investigation at Siemens AG is growing after the German conglomerate said it found €420 million ($556 million) in suspicious transactions spanning seven years -- roughly twice the amount prosecutors had identified last month.

Europe's largest engineering company by sales disclosed the figure yesterday, one day after it restated its net income for the latest fiscal year. It also appointed new auditors Monday to comb through its books and review its business procedures as it wrestles with the widening corruption scandal and possible sanctions in the U.S. and elsewhere.

A German police official confirmed yesterday that Thomas Ganswindt, a former senior executive, has been arrested. He was a member of Siemens's corporate executive committee, where he was responsible for its telecommunications-equipment unit, before resigning in September. A spokesman at Luxembourg-based Elster Group, where Mr. Ganswindt is chief executive, said he was unavailable and declined to comment.

More than 200 police raided the offices and homes of Siemens employees in November as part of a cross-border investigation into alleged embezzlement. German prosecutors said they had found €200 million in suspicious transfers.

Prosecutors suspect the funds were used by Siemens employees to bribe potential customers abroad through a system of secret accounts and sham consulting contracts. Siemens is a witness in the investigation and has pledged to cooperate.

Siemens, which makes goods varying from high-speed trains to light bulbs, said it has been in contact with the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department to provide information on the alleged wrongdoing. The SEC and Justice Department declined to comment.

Joe Kaeser, Siemens's chief financial officer, said during a conference call that "it's kind of early to judge" whether it will face financial penalties. Siemens has attributed the alleged fraud to "individual acts" by current and former employees.

The scale of the alleged fraud raises questions about whether senior managers at the Munich-based company did enough to prevent wrongdoing, and prosecutors are trying to determine how high up the corporate ladder it traveled. Siemens has confirmed that a former chief financial officer from the unit as well as the heads of the unit's internal audit and accounting and controlling departments are among employees arrested.

Mr. Kaeser said the purpose of the questionable transactions remains unclear, and it appears confined to the money-losing telecom unit. It began dismantling the unit last year and agreed in June to merge the bulk of it into a joint venture with Nokia Corp. of Finland. A Nokia spokeswoman said it was "monitoring the situation, but integration work continues."

Klaus Kleinfeld, Siemens's chief executive, said the firm has worked hard to improve its compliance systems but acknowledged more needs to be done to stamp out improprieties. Prosecutors say Mr. Kleinfeld is a witness, not a suspect, in the inquiry.

Spitzer Suit Puts New Focus On Flat-Fee Accounts (WSJ)

By Tom Lauricella

The Wall Street Journal, December 13, 2006

New York State Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, just weeks from leaving office to become the state's governor, set off a brawl with the U.S. arm of Swiss bank UBS AG, alleging the firm put clients in unsuitable brokerage accounts -- resulting in them paying tens of millions dollars in unnecessary fees.

The accounts in question charge clients a flat percentage fee based on the amount of money in the accounts. Known as wrap accounts, they can be a good deal for frequent traders who would spend more in commissions than if they paid a flat fee. In contrast, a client who rarely trades or has high levels of cash in an account would be better off in an account that charges per transaction.

UBS isn't the only firm facing regulatory scrutiny over these accounts. The Securities and Exchange Commission is probing whether Merrill Lynch & Co. clients were inappropriately placed in these accounts, according to people familiar with the matter. Merrill said it doesn't comment on regulatory matters.

The New York Stock Exchange, meanwhile, is investigating cases related to fee-based accounts. Regulators have taken aim at wrap accounts before, but Mr. Spitzer's suit would be by far the largest action. In 2003, the NASD warned all member firms to ensure that wrap accounts were appropriate for clients by taking into account "the services provided, cost, and customer preferences."

Mr. Spitzer's office, which offered to settle with UBS for $150 million, contends in a suit filed in New York state court that UBS allowed thousands of clients who did little trading to inappropriately hold wrap accounts because they would be more profitable than commissions. UBS did this, in part, by manipulating the guidelines for what were deemed appropriate levels of trading and by encouraging brokers to do just enough trading -- or churning -- of an account to keep clients in the wrap fee, the complaint charges.

Mr. Spitzer's office also alleges that financial incentives tilted brokers toward putting clients into the accounts and clients were misled into believing they were paying for advice services that they didn't get.

UBS declined to settle the suit for $150 million, according to a person familiar with the situation, and isn't going quietly. "UBS categorically denies that the program was part of a scheme to disadvantage clients and intends to defend itself vigorously in this matter," the firm said in a statement. UBS said clients had to agree to be placed in the wrap accounts and that emails cited in Mr. Spitzer's complaint show clients asking to remain in wrap accounts while UBS tried to shift them back to commission-based accounts.

UBS spokesman Mark Arena said Mr. Spitzer's office "cherry picked" data. That is an allegation also made by H&R Block Inc., which recently won a round in court in an attempt to fend off a lawsuit by Mr. Spitzer's office, in part by saying that the New York attorney general had bypassed information that supported H&R Block's position.

The complaint also alleges that UBS misled clients into believing they would be paying for advice through the wrap fees, when in fact the firm viewed it as just another kind of account. Mr. Spitzer's office cited a UBS executive's email which said the accounts had been sold "incorrectly." UBS denies that there was any intent to mislead clients.

Spitzer Sues UBS, Claims Thousands Defrauded (AP)

By Michael Gormley

AP, December 12, 2006

ALBANY, N.Y. --

New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer accused UBS Financial Services Inc. of moving clients into a brokerage program that cost some investors as much as $23,000 per trade, according to a lawsuit filed Tuesday.

UBS denies the civil charges and defended the program it said has saved clients hundreds of millions of dollars since 1999. UBS AG, a global firm that considers itself the world's leading wealth management business, contends Spitzer didn't consider all the information available on the company's practices.

The brokerage moved thousands of clients to the InsightOne program even though it was poorly suited to their needs, Spitzer said.

InsightOne charged fees based on assets, not the number of transactions, a program that favors frequent traders rather than buy-and-hold investors who rarely trade. The effort to move some clients into the program was sweetened with financial incentives that Spitzer said created a conflict of interest.

"CONFLICT is all over this," stated one internal company document obtained in the investigation.

Spitzer contends brokers must serve their clients and that encouraging customers to act against their best interest creates a conflict.

"UBS is committed to clients' individual needs," the company responded. "The InsightOne program was designed to satisfy those clients who sought alternatives to the industry's traditional commission-based accounts.

"Fee-based brokerage, in which clients pay a fee for trading activity rather than commissions on a per trade basis, offers investors greater choice as well as a way to closely align the interests of financial advisors and clients with respect to growing the value of the brokerage account," the company said. InsightOne accounts were about 3.5 percent of company's American accounts.

The lawsuit contends that customers paid UBS tens of millions of dollars more than necessary in InsightOne fees, including:

_A 91-year-old client who paid $35,000 for four trades over two years. They would have cost her about $2,000 in a traditional brokerage program.

_Another client who was charged $24,000 for one trade.

_A couple that was charged more than $23,000 each for two trades, a sum that totaled about 20 percent of the income from their family farm.

UBS is accused of violating state antitrust laws, common law fraud and breaches of fiduciary duty, said Spitzer, who begins his new job as governor on Jan. 1.

"We are genuinely mystified and puzzled as to this entire legal claim," said UBS spokesman Mark Arena. He said UBS doesn't know who the clients are that Spitzer singled out.

Arena said clients are moved into the InsightOne accounts only after they are determined to be suitable for it and have agreed to the change. After the first year, UBS analyzes whether the account is best for the client and sometimes recommends they return to a traditional account and, in rare cases, requires the switch back, Arena said.

He said Spitzer's office has refused to cooperate with them in their attempt to defend the company against the accusations.

"It's their data," said Spitzer spokesman Mark Violette. "We negotiated for six weeks. They cut it off and at that point we filed the lawsuit."

SEC To Propose New Guidance On Internal Controls (WSJ)

By Kara Scannell

The Wall Street Journal, December 13, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Federal securities regulators said that company executives won't need to test internal processes that have a low risk of affecting financial statements, and that new regulatory guidance will be flexible for companies based on their complexity.

The Securities and Exchange Commission will formally unveil today its widely anticipated guidance to help management comply with a section of Sarbanes-Oxley dealing with internal controls on financial statements. Business groups had complained that complying with the rule was costly and burdensome, with some suggesting it is one reason why the U.S. has lost foreign stock listings.

The guidance will "fill a void," said SEC Chairman Christopher Cox. "The entire process is designed to take into account different complexities," while furthering the law's purpose, which is "to improve the quality of financial reporting" and give investors confidence in the financial statements, he said.

The SEC also will tackle other issues, including raising the bar investors must meet to invest in hedge funds to $2.5 million from $1 million, allowing for an optional electronic system to deliver proxies and annual reports to investors, and making it easier for foreign companies to terminate registration requirements once they pull their U.S. stock listings. Mr. Cox said each of the issues has the full support of the commission.

The most controversial issue is the SEC's guidance to management on how to comply with section 404 of Sarbanes-Oxley, which says management must assess its company's internal controls over financial reporting and outsider auditors need to test management's assessment. The way the rule has been interpreted has caused confusion, with small business voicing concerns that it was detracting from time spent on business development.

Conrad Hewitt, the SEC's chief accountant, said a high-risk control would include any estimates used when compiling financial statements, while a low-risk item would include petty cash. The second leg of reform, which will require SEC approval, will be announced Tuesday, when the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board unveils changes to an auditing standard that auditors rely upon when testing management's assessment of internal controls.

The SEC is also proposing to require investors to have $2.5 million in net worth and assets to invest in hedge funds, up from the 1982 standard of $1 million. Mr. Cox says that is an approximate inflation-adjusted level and will apply to investors at the time of their investment. He said if a spouse is using shared wealth to invest in a fund for his own use, only half of the couple's joint assets can be counted. That will make the $2.5 million threshold "more meaningful," said Mr. Cox.

Auditing Change Could Ease Burden On Small Firms (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, December 13, 2006

In a move designed to make it less expensive for companies to comply with the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, the Securities and Exchange Commission plans to propose a rule at today's open hearing that would allow auditing firms to adopt "principles-based" standards when reviewing their clients' internal controls.

The proposal, which wouldn't be adopted until early next year, means that small and midsize companies wouldn't necessarily have to spend millions to overhaul their internal control systems to comply with Section 404 of Sarbanes-Oxley.

Instead, public companies would be encouraged to focus on reviewing internal controls that affect significant chunks of their revenue streams, as opposed to spending equal amounts on low-risk areas of their businesses, where material changes in earnings are unlikely to develop.

"This will be accessible, understandable and relatively easy to apply so that investors can be more comforted that the internal control process is working as it's intended," SEC Chairman Christopher Cox said in a briefing with reporters Tuesday.

Section 404 of Sarbanes-Oxley — passed by Congress in 2002 after accounting frauds at Enron and WorldCom — doesn't differentiate between companies that earn billions and small firms.

Smaller public companies have complained about Section 404, saying it would force them to spend as much as $4 million each to revamp their internal accounting systems to comply with the law. In fact, small companies with annual revenue of $75 million or less have not yet been forced to comply with the law.

Auditing firms, on the other hand, have reaped gains from the law, because it forces companies to make more use of their services. The Public Company Accounting Oversight Board (PCAOB) is expected to issue comparable "principles-based" recommendations to auditing firms next week.

"The whole effort is to improve the quality of financial statements," Cox said.

At today's meeting, the SEC is also expected to:

·Endorse the use of a voluntary Internet proxy voting system. The SEC plans to let companies switch from the old-fashioned proxy voting system, by paper ballot or by phone, to a new system in which investors can vote on the Web. Companies will still have to make it easy for investors who prefer to cast ballots the old-fashioned way to continue with that method.

2 Sanctioned By SEC Over PNC Accounting (WP/AP)

DOJ_NMG_0106053

The Associated Press
The Washington Post, December 13, 2006

WASHINGTON -- An accounting executive at PNC Financial Services Group Inc. and an outside auditor were sanctioned by federal regulators for their alleged roles in the regional bank's faulty accounting in 2001, said to have inflated earnings by concealing $762 million in potential liabilities.

The Securities and Exchange Commission announced the settlements Monday with Thomas Garbe, who was PNC's director of accounting policy at the time, and Michael Joseph, a former partner with the major accounting firm Ernst & Young, which reviewed the transaction at issue. Garbe and Joseph neither admitted nor denied the SEC's allegations but agreed to refrain from future violations of the securities laws.

In addition, Joseph was barred for three years from acting as an accountant for any public company.

Garbe "failed to inquire adequately about facts and circumstances, and was a cause of PNC's violations of the ... federal securities laws," the SEC said in its order.

The agency had previously alleged that Pittsburgh-based PNC tried to conceal $762 million in sour corporate loans in 2001 by selling them to three partnerships it created expressly for that purpose with insurance giant American International Group Inc.

For a fee, AIG offered to establish special-purpose entities to which PNC could transfer the troubled assets, but there was no actual transfer of risk from the bank to the insurer, according to the SEC.

In a July 2002 settlement of the issue, PNC was not fined but agreed to give the SEC and the Federal Reserve Bank of Cleveland greater access to company records. New York-based AIG signed agreements with the SEC and the Justice Department in late 2004 in which it agreed to pay $126 million to settle allegations of aiding flawed accounting by PNC and Brightpoint Inc.

More recently, AIG agreed last February to pay a record $1.64 billion in a settlement with the SEC and New York state authorities, and apologized for having deceived investors and regulators with misleading accounting practices. AIG was alleged to have taken part in bid-rigging schemes, paid secret commissions to insurance brokers to steer business to it, used phony insurance deals to burnish its earnings and misstated the amounts of workers' compensation premiums it had collected.

Fresh Lawsuit Raises Heat At Ahold Unit (FT)

By Byian Bickerton
Financial Times, December 13, 2006

It cost Ahold, the Dutch food retailer, $1.1bn last year to compensate shareholders whose investments were shredded by a 2003 accounting scandal at its US Foodservice distribution business. Now its customers are demanding a pay-out too.

A hospital and a family-owned Italian restaurant have filed a class-action lawsuit in New Haven, Connecticut, alleging USF engaged in "racketeering" by over-charging customers "hundreds of millions of dollars" from 2000 to 2003.

The development comes as Ahold endeavours to sell US Foodservice, in a deal that could be valued at around $5bn. JPMorgan Chase is handling the sale for Ahold, and Clayton Dubilier & Rice, the private equity company, is expected to be among the interested suitors.

A fresh scandal would be catastrophic for Ahold, said Robert Jan Vos, at Fortis. But he, like other analysts, is unsure what to make of the Connecticut claim.

Ahold is confident it can see off the claim, which it considers "at most a question of contract interpretation", a person close to the affair said.

Central to the suit is the use by USF of value added service providers (vasps). These entities bought goods from suppliers and sold them to USF having added a margin and a commission. USF then sold the goods to customers having marked them up by an agreed percentage.

It was common industry practice to use vasps because of their sourcing expertise, said an industry insider.

However, the plaintiffs claim the vasps were part of a "kick-back scheme" operated by USF, involving "secret agreements" with suppliers and in-house product managers.

Vasps were "controlled and funded" by USF to generate "fraudulent invoices and [thereby] over-charge customers", the claimants allege.

James Hartley, a lawyer representing Waterbury Hospital, Connecticut, and Cason Inc, the owners of a restaurant, in Rockford, Illinois, said: "What this case is about is a system that USF put in place to artificially inflate prices."

The suit alleges that 16 to 20 per cent of USF sales between 2000 and 2003, or between $1.2bn and $3.6bn annually, passed through the vasps for the purpose of inflating USF costs and defrauding customers including the hospital and restaurant.

Peter Wakkie, an Ahold executive board member, said the claim was putative and involved "two customers complaining about certain pricing practices that had nothing to do with the accounting practices of 2003".

"We are not concerned," he said. "We have meritorious defences and we will contest this vigorously. It is definitely not on any level comparable with the [claim] we solved last year."

USF dismantled the vasps between early 2004 and 2005 "because the accounting became highly complex", a person familiar with the situation said.

There was a question over whether they should be consolidated in Ahold's books given that they had different management but were largely dependant for business on USF, that person said.

But the claimants are not alone in questioning the system. While Ahold is understood to be confident all contracts were properly enforced and executed, the civil division of the US Department of Justice is studying whether USF's use of vasps led to the US government being over-charged.

In its 2005 annual report, Ahold said that it "believes it is probable that claims will be asserted in the civil investigation but believes it may have meritorious defences to such claims".

The operation of vasps raised "mild surprise" at PwC, the accountant, during a forensic examination of Ahold's operations in the wake of the 2003 scandal, a person familiar with the accountant's investigation said.

Two years earlier Ernie Smith, then USF chief financial officer, drew the matter to Ahold's attention in a letter announcing his resignation because of his concerns over USF's internal accounting practices.

He wrote that he had ordered a review of the vasps system that "should begin in the next couple of weeks".

Mr Smith wrote: "In theory I believe the process to be understandable and logical for the industry where the creation of inside margin is normal. The concern relates to the poor procedures and the ability to manipulate income."

Mr Smith could not be reached for comment.

Ahold has maintained it properly investigated his concerns.

In regard to your Dec. 4 editorial "Global Warming Gag Order":

Sens. Olympia Snowe (R., Maine) and John D. Rockefeller IV (D., W.Va.) are threatening Exxon Mobil with congressional censure if it keeps encouraging the scientific skeptics who doubt that humans caused the earth's recent warming trend.

But more than 70% of the warming observed since the end of the Little Ice Age in 1850 occurred before 1940, and thus before much human-emitted CO2. The senators are apparently unaware of the broad and impressive evidence from hundreds of recent scientific studies that document a better explanation for the modern warming -- a moderate, natural 1,500-year global climate cycle.

The U.N.'s Intergovernmental Panel on Global Warming had already been created when researchers retrieved the first long ice cores from Greenland and Antarctic in the 1980s. The ice cores revealed 400,000 years of the planet's temperature history -- and a 1,500-year cycle that was too long and moderate to be discerned by Celtic tribes or Viking seamen. Physical evidence of the 1,500-year climate cycle has also been found by more than 100 recent peer-reviewed studies by leading research institutes -- in the bottom sediments of six oceans and hundreds of lakes, in ancient relict tree rings from around the northern hemisphere, and in the cave stalagmites and glacier movements of every continent plus New Zealand. The North American Pollen Data Base shows nine complete reorganizations of our trees and plants in the past 14,000 years, or one every 1,650 years.

Science outranks senators. Galileo was a consensus of one.

Dennis T. Avery

S. Fred Singer

Arlington, Va.

(Messrs. Avery and Singer co-authored "Unstoppable Global Warming -- Every 1,500 Years," Rowman and Littlefield, 2006.)

Sens. Rockefeller and Snowe defied every tenet of democracy when they suggested in an open letter to Exxon Mobil that it should refrain from exercising its right of free speech in supporting scientists who dare to question how much the increase in atmospheric CO2 may warm the world. The disastrous duo should withdraw their letter and apologize to Exxon Mobil. The senators say climate change is "a matter of urgency for all mankind." It is not. The U.N. is about to cut its high-end estimate of sea-level rise ino 2100 from three feet to just 17 inches. The panic is over. The senators are jumping on the climate-change bandwagon just as the wheels are falling off.

The U.K. foreign secretary recently said climate skeptics were like supporters of Islamic terror and should be denied access to the media. After a decade of socialism, freedom of speech does not figure in the U.K. constitution. But let me cite the First Amendment to yours:

"Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech . . or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances."

I call upon the two senators to live by those noble words.

Christopher Monckton

London

Your attack on Sens. Snowe and Rockefeller for their letter calling on ExxonMobil to stop supporting groups that obfuscate climate change science is misconceived on some essential points. It is not "bullying," "over-the-top" or "intimidating" to call attention to how this enormously powerful company has, over the past eight years, spent millions of dollars to fund dozens of organizations in order to carry out a disinformation campaign on the global warming problem. The actions of Exxon Mobil in this regard can reasonably be seen as an insult to the climate science community, which has been making a heroic effort to communicate the nature of the problem in the face of extraordinary impediments thrown up by industry-funded operatives. A White House official who formerly was an oil industry lobbyist edited climate science program reports to play down global warming. After being exposed, he left his position and was promptly hired to work for Exxon Mobil.

The senators are not alone in believing it is time for Exxon Mobil to stop warring against the leading climate scientists. Instead, it should be acknowledging the conclusions of the leading scientific assessments and helping to lead the way in translating this understanding into a societal response strategy. As yet we have not seen this. But perhaps CEO Rex Tillerson, in a recent speech to the Chief Executives Club of Boston, signaled a shift when he said of climate change: "The potential risks to society could prove to be significant. . . . We should take steps now to reduce emissions in effective and meaningful ways." We shall see what, if anything, follows from this. But did Mr. Tillerson say that because he feels intimidated and bullied by Olympia Snowe? I hardly think so.

Rick Piltz

Director

Climate Science Watch

Washington

Regarding your lead editorial about the letter to Exxon Mobil regarding global warming's "obvious" consequences, I suggest citing the article by Kenneth Green on page 94 in the November/December 2006 issue of The American magazine. It addresses our current knowledge about the 12 significant phenonmena identified by the U.N. Climate Panel in 2000. Of the 12 we have significant knowledge on only one. We have little or no scientific knowledge on the other 11. But on that basis we are expected to subscribe to half-baked global warming "solutions" such as the Kyoto Protocol, which promises a fraction of a degree atmospheric temperature reduction half a century in the future at the cost of perhaps a 30% reduction in current national GNP.

While we should continue to define the problem, if it exists, solutions are still sometime in the future, if they are ever needed.

Bill Allen Sr.

Placentia, Calif.

Yes, there is a chance that some aspect of our understanding of global warming is wrong. There is even a slight chance it is all wrong. But the preponderance of environmental data, theory, intuition, and direct sensory evidence suggest that it is as most of us think it is. The scientific marketplace of ideas has so ruled.

The consequences of not responding to the "prevailing wisdom" (there is anthropogenic global warming) are much worse than those of overresponding to the "null hypothesis" (there is no anthropogenic global warming).

Given the above reasoning, on balance I'm much more distressed by the allegation against Exxon Mobil that it funds numerous pseudo-scientific climate change denial front groups than by the allegation against Sens. Rockefeller and Snowe that they threatened Exxon Mobil to stop doing so "or else."

Robert Bookstein, M.D.

San Diego

By demanding that Exxon Mobil cease funding and denounce organizations that do not adhere to the senators' views on global warming because they are "deniers" engaged in an "obfuscation agenda" that undermines America's "moral clarity," Sens. Rockefeller and Snowe have taken a virtual theocratic position.

No effort is made to address the validity of the science. Instead, it is assumed that global warming theory, as envisioned by two representatives of government, is not merely viable, but is established science. Such an overt assault upon the very foundations of free scientific inquiry is chilling in its implications.

An SEC Investigation Fraught With Problems

Your Dec. 8 editorial "The Pequot 'Scandal'" leaves the impression that Gary Aguirre and I are the only two people concerned about the way the SEC handled the Pequot investigation. In fact, Mr. Aguirre's concerns have been echoed by both former and current SEC officials, who provided candid testimony to our committees.

The focus of the Senate investigation I'm conducting with Sen. Arlen Specter (R., Pa.) isn't John Mack and Pequot; rather, it is whether the SEC retaliated against one of its lawyers and whether it wields an even hand in looking out for investors big and small. Our review is evidence-based, and so far the evidence suggests the Pequot investigation was fraught with problems, Mr. Aguirre's termination is suspect, and the inspector general failed in his duty to conduct a thorough and independent inquiry.

Margin Requirements And the 1990s Bubble

Jeremy Siegel's exoneration of Fed Chairman Greenspan's policy with respect to the financial markets during the 1990s refers only to his monetary policy ("Irrational Exuberance, Reconsidered," editorial page, Dec. 6). It ignores another responsibility of the Federal Reserve, which is the setting of initial margin requirements for the purchase of securities in general, and the definition of the specific securities that are eligible for margin in particular. Initial margin requirements had been set at 50% for a decade prior to his appointment, and thus no change was a continuation of the policy of his predecessor.

However, Chairman Greenspan did oversee a significant change in the definition of securities eligible for margin purchases. The 1998 amendments to the margin rules broadened the definition of margin securities to include certain foreign securities, non-investment grade debt, and also, significantly, to all Nasdaq-traded stocks. Prior to 1998 only a small subset of Nasdaq securities was eligible for margin.

Did this vast extension of marginability to all Nasdaq securities in 1998 contribute to the subsequent bubble that ended with the Nasdaq index at 5049 in March of 2000? It seems certain that it contributed to speculation to some degree, perhaps significantly. Should all initial margin requirements have been raised by the Fed as Nasdaq valuations soared? Such action might have mitigated the size of the developing bubble. Perhaps the current Fed could investigate the consequences of changes in initial margin requirements should valuations grow excessive in coming years, despite the fact that it might lead to a more balanced view of Mr. Greenspan's tenure than Prof. Siegel presents.

There's a Moral Upside to Single Motherhood

I was disheartened that you ignored the moral upside to our nation's growing number of single mothers ("Single Mothers, Many Problems," Taste page, Dec. 1). While I strongly agree with you that fare better when raised in a home by a married father and mother, I also believe women who choose life for their babies, even when faced with less-than-ideal circumstances, have made a sacrifice deserving of, at minimum, a respectful mention.

Better yet, these mothers, who cross both racial and socioeconomic lines, should be elevated in our otherwise throw-away culture to role models for those women and, yes, men, who find themselves faced with a pregnancy they were not expecting.

You cite an ironic recommendation for addressing the rising number of unwed mothers from the Manhattan Institute's Kay Hymowitz. You quote her as having said, "We haven't appealed to people's rational self interest." It seems that 30 million American women who abort their babies each year have only too good a grasp on their self-interest. As a culture, we not only need to, as you said, educate all women about the proven costs of being a single mother. But we must also recognize those who have given up part of themselves to take on that title in the first place.

Let's Start Speaking Good

Joseph Epstein's "An Online Journal Fights for Clear, Expressive English" (Taste page, Personal Journal, Dec. 7) was right on the mark, although he left off my favorite journalistic pet peeve: the use of diva. Just when did this term get applied to every singer who's ever had one big hit or appeared in People magazine?

Larry Schneider

Buffalo Grove, Ill.

So Joseph Epstein's like, we oughta have a focus group to save the English language from, you know, going down the tubes, because we all know that bad English really sucks. Wow, I mean, this dude is so totally cool in saying we don't talk right. So I'm like, we need to speak more clearly, but then society's like, never mind, do your own thing, whatever. If a person speaks correctly they sound more educated, but then other people go, like, you are some sort of snob or bigot.

Truthful, Not Terror, Television

In response to your editorial on Al Jazeera's English-language channel ("English Terror TV," Weekend Journal Taste page, Dec. 1):

You claim that we glorified the role of Al Qaeda's Asian affiliate, Jemaah Islamiyah, in stoking unrest in southern Thailand. While we do mention the group's role in the violence, this was just a small item near the end of the story. The report's main thrust actually focused on how the Thai government was working with the separatist groups to achieve peace. You also state that Wan Kadir Che Wan quit the leadership of the now-defunct Bersatu, another separatist group, "some time ago." But the official report on english.aljazeera.net shows that Wan Kadir states the situation quite clearly: "If not me, then who is president? I want to resign, but no one wants to take my place... It still is me."

You then target your indignation at our online characterization of British Prime Minister Tony Blair's comments to us regarding the Iraq war on Nov. 17, saying "The channel's own transcript shows that the British Prime Minister never used the word 'disaster'." In fact, the official Al Jazeera English language Web site article on the interview makes clear exactly what was said: "Responding to a suggestion from Sir David Frost that the conflict had been a disaster from the start, Mr. Blair replied 'it has,' before blaming a combination of factors for the crisis." You further suggest that our channel attributed the bloodshed to the "U.S.-led invasion" and tried to hide the reasons articulated by Mr. Blair. Again, this is a misrepresentation. The channel never implied that the U.S.-led invasion was the cause of the bloodshed -- just that there was bloodshed since the invasion. And not only was Mr. Blair's explanation of the reasons behind the continued violence aired in-full on air, but online Al Jazeera English made sure to include the context of his comments, as well.

Your accusations with regard to our Burma coverage again mislead your readers. Far from "hobnobbing" with the government, it took months of negotiations before we were permitted to enter the country. In those talks, we made it clear that we would be objective and balanced in our reporting. You cite our inclusion in our reports the military junta's contention that Aung San Suu Kyi is "no longer popular with the people" but just because we report their comment does not mean that we agree with it. You appear to question the exclusivity of our report, but there has been no other openly filmed reportage from the new capital Naypidaw by an independent news organization. Since our reports aired, several exiled Burmese dissidents have thanked us for our insights on a country to which they cannot return.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Gonzales Warns Of Online Predators During Delco Visit (PHI)

The Philadelphia Inquirer, December 13, 2006

U.S. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales was in Delaware County yesterday to speak with area law enforcement officials. He toured the offices of the county's Internet Crimes Against Children Task Force in the courthouse in Media, said the number of predators was growing, and urged law enforcement to educate people to the dangers.

Part of Gonzales' address to officials was private, and reporters and the public were asked to leave for those remarks. At a news conference later, he said the Internet was a great resource, "but in the hands of a predator it is a powerful weapon."

Gonzales said parents should not only monitor their children's Internet access "very closely" but also sit and talk with them about the problems of sharing too much information on sites such as MySpace.com and YouTube.com.

Last year, the Delaware County task force handled 680 complaints of child predators on the Internet, resulting in 56 arrests.

Attorney General Praises Internet Crime Task Force (WCAU)

WCAU-TV, December 12, 2006

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales visited the Philadelphia area Tuesday to discuss the importance of protecting kids online.

Gonzales met with local law enforcement, and toured a facility in media that deals with Internet crimes against children.

He praised Delaware County's task force on their efforts to combat child exploitation.

The task force works with state and local agencies to track down criminals who use the Internet to prey on children.

"The Internet is probably the greatest innovation of our generation, but in the hands of a predator it's a powerful weapon," said Gonzales.

Gonzales said one challenge is that Internet crimes know no borders.

He stresses the need to work with the international community to make sure strong laws are in place to protect children.

AP, December 13, 2006

MEDIA, Pa. - Attorney General Alberto Gonzales met with local and state authorities Tuesday to discuss the importance of protecting children from online predators and pedophiles.

"I consider it a war," Gonzales said, noting he worries about the safety of his own children, ages 14 and 11.

Gonzales had a private briefing Tuesday with local postal inspectors, FBI agents, Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials, district attorneys and other members of law enforcement. He later visited the offices of Delaware County's task force on Internet Crimes Against Children, one of 46 such agencies nationwide.

The suburban Philadelphia task force investigates cases that include online enticement and possession and distribution of child pornography. It has handled 680 complaints this year, yielding 56 arrests.

"I know that we're winning some significant battles in this area," Gonzales said.

Gonzales came to the area to promote Project Safe Childhood, a Justice Department initiative begun in February and designed to protect children from online sexual exploitation.

Web Site Hunts Pedophiles, And TV Goes Along (NYT)

By Allen Salkin

Last month, the Web site Perverted-Justice.com posted news of the conviction of Sean Young, a Wisconsin man sentenced to 10 years in state prison for soliciting sex online from a 14-year-old girl. According to a transcript of an online chat posted on the site, at one point Mr. Young had asked the girl, identified only as Billie, what she was wearing. When she answered "sweats," Mr. Young typed back that if she were his daughter, "i'd make u wear sexy clthes."

Billie turned out to be an adult volunteer for Perverted Justice, an anti-pedophile group, and when Mr. Young drove to a house where he expected to meet the teenager for sex, he was arrested by sheriff's deputies.

The conviction was logged as the 104th that Perverted Justice says it has been responsible for since 2003, a tally that as of yesterday had reached 113. What started as one man's quest to rid his regional Yahoo chat room of lewd adults has grown into a nationwide force of cyberspace vigilantes, financed by a network television program hungry for ratings.

"It's a kind of blog that has turned into a crime-fighting resource," said Robert McCrie, a professor at John Jay College of Criminal Justice in Manhattan.

Perverted Justice is best known for putting its online volunteers at the disposal of the television newsmagazine "Dateline NBC," which has broadcast 11 highly rated programs in which would-be pedophiles are lured to "sting houses," only to be surprised by a camera crew and, usually, the police.

Despite that publicity, the inner workings of Perverted Justice and its reclusive founder remain largely a mystery, even as the group has emerged as one of the most effective unofficial law enforcement groups in the country, a kind of Neighborhood Watch of the Net. But the group is also criticized by some legal and law enforcement experts, who accuse it of entrapment, making mistakes that ruin innocent lives and, paradoxically, disseminating its own brand of child pornography.

Peter D. Greenspun, a lawyer who defended a rabbi from Rockville, Md., caught in a "Dateline" sting arranged by Perverted Justice, said that by posting online transcripts of conversations between would-be child molesters and volunteers posing as 12- and 13-year-olds, Perverted Justice was encouraging, rather than deterring, pedophiles.

"They are putting out for unfiltered, unrestricted public consumption the most graphic sexual material that they themselves say is of a perverted nature," Mr. Greenspun said.

Perverted Justice's founder, Xavier Von Erck, 27, a former tech-support worker, has a dedication to the cause bordering on obsession, his mother and associates said. Mr. Von Erck lives in an apartment in Portland, Ore., but rarely gives out his address, and he would not allow a reporter to visit because he feared retribution from men exposed by his group. In a telephone interview, he said he worked for his group seven days a week, mostly from a laptop in his bedroom.

"Every waking minute he's on that computer," said his mother, Mary Erck-Heard, 46, who raised her son after they fled his father, whom she described as alcoholic. Mr. Von Erck legally changed his name from Phillip John Eide, taking his maternal grandfather's family name, Erck, and adding the Von.

In many ways, Mr. Von Erck, who said he and his mother moved 13 times when he was in high school because they were often short of money, continues to live that messy life of deprivation. His meals often consist of ramen noodles, he said; his bed is perpetually unmade. For years, he has been trying unsuccessfully to find his father, who, he says, still owes his mother child support.

"I have a low opinion of men in general," he said. "The most heinous crimes in our society are committed by males."

Perverted Justice has 41,000 registered users of its online forums dedicated to the cause of stopping predators, 65 volunteers trained as chat room decoys and three salaried leaders: Mr. Von Erck, a woman who is a liaison with law enforcement and a business manager.

Typically, a Perverted Justice volunteer creates a false online profile, posing as, say, a 13-year-old girl on MySpace. The volunteer will wait to receive e-mail messages or will enter a chat room. If an adult contacts the volunteer, the decoy responds and sees if the conversation becomes sexual.

The group's collaboration with "Dateline" since 2004 has been lucrative. A person familiar with Perverted Justice's finances who requested anonymity because he is not authorized to discuss the matter publicly said NBC was paying the group roughly $70,000 for each hour of television produced.

"They do a lot a work for us, and they deserve to be reimbursed for that work," said David Corvo, the executive producer of "Dateline," who met with Mr. Von Erck earlier this year in New York to discuss their collaboration.

Mr. Von Erck said the NBC money had been used in part to buy computer servers that would not be overwhelmed every time the group was mentioned on television.

Ratings for the "Dateline" broadcasts, a series called "To Catch a Predator" that has become a network franchise, have averaged 9.1 million viewers, compared with 7 million viewers for other "Dateline" episodes, according to Nielsen Media Research.

Six new episodes are planned for the first half of 2007. Two were shot at a house in Long Beach, Calif.; two in Flagler Beach, Fla.; and two others in Murphy, Tex. The Texas sting drew a burst of publicity in early November, months before the episodes were scheduled to be shown, when a prosecutor implicated as a would-be predator, Louis W. Conradt Jr., shot himself to death as the police approached his home.

Supporters of the NBC broadcasts say they have helped increase awareness of online predators, allowing parents to educate children and spurring law enforcement to action. One in seven youths ages 10 to 17 who have gone online at least once a month for six months have received unwanted sexual solicitations, according to a 2005 study by the Crimes Against Children Research Center at the University of New Hampshire.

Last month, the "Dateline" correspondent Chris Hansen, who is featured on the Perverted Justice specials, addressed about 500 students at a school in Rye Brook, N.Y., about the dangers of Internet predators. One of the first questions was why the stings filmed by "Dateline" were not entrapment.

The answer, legal experts say, is that it is hard for a defendant to prove entrapment, in this context or in any other. Some states allow prosecutions as long as there was a "predisposition" to the conduct. Others require police misconduct for a defendant to claim entrapment.

One concern about Perverted Justice's nonprofessional force of vigilantes, raised by Lt. Joseph Donohue, head of the New York State Internet Crimes Against Children Task Force, is that decoys impersonating teenagers may be too aggressive, not understanding the need to let predators initiate the sexual chat and therefore not gathering chat-log evidence that will stand up in court.

Mr. Von Erck responded that so far prosecutors had not dropped charges against any man arrested in an investigation begun by Perverted Justice.

Of the 113 convictions Mr. Von Erck's group claims, some have been for misdemeanors resulting in no jail time, and others have brought stiff sentences, like the one of the Maryland rabbi, David A. Kaye, who on Dec. 1 was sentenced to six and a half years in prison on federal charges of enticement and traveling to meet a minor for illicit sexual contact.

Mr. Von Erck's most vociferous critic is Scott Morrow, a retired Canadian Air Force serviceman who runs a Web site, Corrupted-Justice.com, chronicling what he says are excesses by Perverted Justice.

“These are anonymous, unaccountable Net junkies doing this work,” Mr. Morrow said in an interview.

He said that Perverted Justice listed personal information for many men it accused of being sexual predators and had sometimes mistaken their identities and humiliated innocent people.

Mr. Von Erck said the criticisms were out-of-date; in its first years the group did post the phone numbers, employers and photographs of men it accused of being predators, and anyone could humiliate the individuals by, say, e-mailing transcripts of a man’s lewd online chats to his friends and colleagues.

But since early this year, Perverted Justice has made a policy of not immediately posting the information it gathers in most cases; instead it contacts law enforcement and encourages pursuit of an arrest.

“We are now a conviction machine,” Mr. Von Erck said.

Mr. Von Erck, who said he was not molested as a child, prefers not to analyze his own motivation for dedicating himself so fully to the effort. Asked to explain why he did it, he did so with spare emotion.

“It gets tiring,” he said, “but when you find somebody that’s already been successful doing something harmful to a child and then you get him arrested, you can’t beat that.”

Sex Offender Limits Endorsed (AP)

By Larry O'Dell, Associated Press

AP, December 13, 2006

RICHMOND -- Sex offenders would have to obtain a judge's permission to enter school or day care center property if the General Assembly passes legislation endorsed yesterday by the Virginia State Crime Commission.

Delegate Rob B. Bell III, Albemarle Republican, originally proposed prohibiting sex offenders from working or volunteering at schools and day care facilities.

The House of Delegates passed that bill unanimously, but the Senate referred it to the commission.

The commission revised the measure to ban sex offenders from setting foot on campus for any reason, except to vote, unless they obtain permission from a circuit court judge.

Sen. Thomas K. Norment Jr., James City County Republican, suggested that the measure went too far.

"We want to be as hard and onerous on these perverts as we can, but at some point practicality butts up against this," Mr. Norment said. "At some point we've got to say uncle."

Under Mr. Bell's proposal, a parent convicted of a sex offense would have to obtain court approval to drop off his child at school or attend a parent-teacher conference. Students convicted of sex offenses would be exempt from the requirement.

Steven Benjamin, counsel to the commission, said that requiring a parent to petition the court is unrealistic because people typically are averse to going to court. He also said the measure could hurt children by discouraging parental involvement.

Delegate Kenneth R. Melvin, Portsmouth Democrat, questioned whether sex offenders -- parents included -- should be allowed on school property for any reason.

"They see other children running around," Mr. Melvin said. "Aren't we trying to separate these people from children?"

The commission also wrestled with the issue of sex offenders in nursing homes and assisted-living centers.

The panel recommended that facilities be required to sign up for notification from state police when sex offenders move into the area, and that they check incoming residents' names against the state's sex-offender registry.

Two other proposals were postponed. One would toughen punishment for sex offenders who lie about their records to get jobs in nursing homes or assisted-living facilities.

The other would require managers of such facilities to inform new residents about the sex-offender registry.

G. Stewart Petoe, director of legal affairs for the commission, said federal and state studies show seven registered sex offenders living in Virginia nursing homes and 16 in assisted-living facilities.

Mary Lynne Bailey, vice president of the Virginia Healthcare Association, said many of those offenders may be harmless because of their medical conditions, but federal privacy laws would prohibit disclosure of that information to other nursing-home or assisted-living residents.

"Unnecessarily scaring people is not an answer to the problem," she said.

On another matter, the commission endorsed legislation modifying the capital murder statute's "triggerman rule," which limits the death penalty to the person who carries out the killing.

The bill, sponsored by Delegate C. Todd Gilbert, Shenandoah County Republican, would expand the capital murder law to include accomplices who share the triggerman's intent to kill.

That could include anyone who orders a killing or helps plan one.

DOJ_NMG_0106061

Mike McGinty, president of the Virginia Association of Commonwealth's Attorneys, told of a case in which a teenage robber handed a gun to his little brother and told him, "You aren't my brother unless you shoot" a convenience store clerk. Because of the triggerman rule, only the little brother was eligible for the death penalty.

Va. Proposal Would Track Sex Offenders By E-mail, IM (CNET)

By Anne Broache

CNET, December 12, 2006

Backed by MySpace, attorney general to propose law next year that would make his state first to require registration of online aliases.

Virginia's attorney general wants to make his state the first to require convicted sex offenders to submit their e-mail addresses and instant-messaging aliases to law enforcement authorities--and he has MySpace.com's enthusiastic approval.

Bob McDonnell, a Republican, said he plans to push a proposal when state legislators return early next year that would create a database containing all the electronic identifiers of registered sex offenders.

"This is not a foolproof approach, as we all fully realize how easy it is to get new e-mail addresses," McDonnell, a longtime state legislator who was sworn in as attorney general in January 2006, said in a statement released Monday. "But by requiring registration, and by making the penalties for failure to register the same as those for failure to register physical and mailing addresses, we will take another positive step towards protecting children online."

The Virginia proposal arrives just days after U.S. Sen. John McCain proposed a bill in Congress that would require a similar expansion of the sex offender registry on a national scale--and an additional step. Under the Arizona Republican's bill (click for PDF), any so-called "social-networking" site would be obligated to remove any Web page that's "associated" with a sex offender--although the proposal has drawn some concern because it does not define the term social-networking site.

The idea behind an expanded registry is to allow so-called "social networking sites" like MySpace to seamlessly cross-check their user registries against sex offender databases, enabling them to block or delete users whose information appears there. It was unclear whether the Virginia proposal would actually require such removal or merely suggest it. A copy of the legislation was not expected to be made available until next week.

McDonnell said he worked with MySpace executives and members of the state's Youth Internet Safety Task Force, which includes representatives from state government and companies like Yahoo and Microsoft, to come up with the proposal.

MySpace Chief Security Officer Hemanshu Nigam applauded the move, saying in a statement Monday that passage of such a law would be "a landmark moment in the history of Internet safety."

MySpace has been lobbying state and federal officials for such an e-mail address registry with an eye toward making its own predator-tracking initiative run more smoothly--and perhaps in an effort to stave off more onerous restrictions that have been on politicians' minds lately. The wildly popular site announced last week that it planned within 30 days to build its own national, real-time sex offender database, based on publicly available information from existing state and federal information banks.

That technology, in theory, would allow the site to monitor and remove the some 550,000 registered sex offenders nationwide from its site, based on scanning for and matching existing information like hair or eye color, name, age, and physical address. But since that data is particularly easy to omit or falsify on user profiles, MySpace has maintained that e-mail addresses and other online aliases would be a far more effective way of pinpointing registered sex offenders.

While harvesting online identities may be a useful to some extent, questions remain over its enforcement, said Leslie Harris, executive director of the Washington-based Center for Democracy and Technology.

Hospital Serial Killers Are Big Threat, Study Says (USAT)

By Liz Szabo

Hospitals and nursing homes aren't doing enough to protect patients from serial killers on staff, according to a new report that calls for major changes in the way medical centers operate.

In the first tally of its kind, researchers have linked more than 2,100 suspicious deaths worldwide to 54 doctors and nurses convicted of serial murder or lesser charges since 1970, according to an article on the Journal of Forensic Sciences' website. "The problem is bigger than anyone would like to think," says Kenneth Kizer, a co-author of the report and former head of the Veterans Health Administration.

Some murderers were able to jump from hospital to hospital to continue their killing sprees, the study shows. Nurse Charles Cullen, 46, was sent to prison in New Jersey with multiple life sentences this year after confessing to killing up to 40 patients there and in Pennsylvania over 16 years.

Kizer says it's easy to see how serial killers continue to find work: Hospitals rarely share their suspicions when their staff look for jobs elsewhere, because they fear lawsuits from former employees who say negative job references damaged their reputations.

Last year, Pennsylvania and New Jersey passed laws to shield hospitals from lawsuits if they provide truthful job references. Hospitals also are required to report criminal behavior to state licensing boards.

Kizer says the country needs a federal law to protect hospitals everywhere when they report suspicious behavior "in good faith and with good evidence."

Medical centers need to review their staff's performance long after they are hired, says Lucian Leape, adjunct professor at the Harvard School of Public Health and co-author of a 1999 report that found that up to 98,000 Americans a year die from medical errors.

Executives also should track patient deaths and illnesses, says the new study's lead author, Beatrice Yorker, a nurse and attorney. That could allow them to quickly notice telltale trends. In some cases, hospitals have taken more than a year to begin investigating strings of suspicious deaths, she says.

Hospital officials should investigate the "root causes" of all these deaths, Leape says. That could help hospitals spot ordinary safety problems in addition to crimes. They also should preserve evidence, such as syringes and the tubing used to give intravenous medications, he says. Too often, hospitals don't take the same precautions that police might at a crime scene, so vital evidence is thrown out.

Leape says medical centers should store potentially lethal drugs in single doses to make it impossible for anyone to get an overdose. "That is a pretty basic safety principle, but it is seldom applied," he says. Computerized drug-dispensing machines, used in many hospitals, reduce errors and restrict the number of people who can access dangerous medications.

Taking such precautions can prevent not only murder, but also the everyday mistakes that harm patients, says Leape, who says experts have been calling for major changes for years. "We know how to prevent this," he says. "Theoretically, this kind of stuff should be impossible from now on."

Bait Cars Help Reel In Thieves (WP)

By Jamie Stockwell

The Washington Post, December 13, 2006

Keith DuBois chalked it up to poor luck the first time someone broke into his 1996 Jeep Grand Cherokee. But the second time, about two weeks after he had spent $3,800 on repairs, DuBois realized it wasn't just misfortune.

"My car had a giant target on it," he said. Both times, it was parked beneath a light on the same Arlington County street, and both times, someone used a sharp object to pry the driver's door and rip open the steering column. It's also one of the most commonly stolen vehicles in Virginia. "I didn't want there to be a third time," DuBois said.

And so DuBois, 46, did what no other Arlington resident has done: He offered to give his sport-utility vehicle to the county, a donation that the five-member county board accepted Saturday.

DuBois had read about a police department program that uses bait cars rigged with audio and video recording equipment and engines that can be shut off with the push of a remote button to nab thieves. He figured that if the bad guys were so determined to steal his Jeep, they could do so under the watchful eye of the law.

"If it's that desirable of a car to steal, then I want for it to do some good," DuBois said.

Bait vehicles tempt thieves with unlocked doors or keys dangling in the ignitions. The second that a thief takes the bait, hidden audio and video recording devices are activated, and a silent alarm alerts the county's emergency communications center. By tracking the car's internal global positioning system unit, dispatchers monitor its location, travel and speed, and as soon as officers are in position, the dispatchers disable the engine and lock the doors.

Thief caught. Case closed. Almost every time.

Arlington police officers have responded to 73 activations and have made 56 arrests since the first car was deployed in February 2002. The activations that did not result in arrests include cases in which someone tampered with a bait vehicle but didn't drive away or in which juveniles were caught poking around inside vehicles and weren't arrested.

To date, every defendant has pleaded guilty to felony and misdemeanor theft charges because of the "indisputable video evidence," said Lt. Mark Belanger, head of the county's auto theft unit. "When we've got you on videotape breaking into a car, there's not much you or your lawyer can say about it," he said.

"By adding this Jeep to our fleet, we expect to get a few more activations and make a few more arrests. This is great for the Jeep owners out there," Belanger said, noting that Jeeps are among the top three vehicles stolen in Virginia. The bait fleet has other commonly stolen cars, such as Hondas and Dodges.

Arlington was the first county in the Washington region to adopt the program, and most area jurisdictions, including the District and Montgomery, Fairfax and Loudoun counties, have implemented it.

Aside from being a high-tech way to nab thieves, bait cars provide a rare look at the initial moments of a common crime. Most of the time, it's not that exciting, officers said, because most interceptions take place within about two minutes and most arrests within four.

But not always. In one Loudoun incident that has become infamous among area police departments, a man stole a bait vehicle and was able to drive it from Leesburg to Southeast Washington because of technical difficulties. Police eventually got the suspect, minutes after the camera caught him smoking crack and masturbating. He had spent part of his ride urinating in a soda can, then drinking his urine to try to quell a case of the hiccups. He also vomited twice.

"We still crack up about that one," said Detective Chris Dengeles, of Arlington's auto theft unit. Mostly, though, "we might have guys muttering to themselves. Nothing real exciting."

The cars are placed in high-theft neighborhoods, including those near Columbia Pike and Fairlington. In 2002, when the bait car program began, 676 cars were stolen in Arlington. The next year, the number was down to 599, before sinking to 493 in 2004 and 419 last year, the county's lowest figure since 1965. This year, Belanger said, the number should be about 350.

At least three thieves have been nabbed since Loudoun launched its program in late 2003, police spokesman Kraig Troxell said. And in Washington, officials said that more than two dozen arrests have been credited to the program.

Arlington County Board Chairman Chris Zimmerman (D) said the decision to expand the county's program to include DuBois' car was a no-brainer. "It was an easy vote," he said Monday. "This is one of our most successful programs in terms of reducing crime, and obviously we want to take maximum advantage of a citizen who wants to make this kind of donation."

By accepting DuBois' offer, the County Board also authorized expansion of the bait car program and agreed to begin accepting vehicles from Arlington residents. Police said that DuBois' Jeep will be repaired -- again -- and outfitted with about $4,000 worth of equipment.

"The more hooks you have in the water, so to speak, the more fish you're going to catch," Dengeles said.

Pellicano Co-defendant Expected To Plead Guilty (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian

The Los Angeles Times, December 13, 2006

One of indicted private eye Anthony Pellicano's co-defendants is expected to plead guilty today to charges that he and others illegally wiretapped a Beverly Hills businessman six years ago.

In an afternoon appearance before U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer, Daniel Nicherie, 46, is also expected to plead guilty in connection with a separate fraud and money laundering case.

Earlier this year, authorities announced that Nicherie, his brother, Abner, and others, including Pellicano, were indicted by a federal grand jury for a series of alleged crimes that included eavesdropping on the telephone conversations of people involved in business disputes with Pellicano's clients.

While Pellicano and several defendants in the case are alleged to have illegally spied on numerous celebrities or well-known business executives, the sweeping 110-count indictment names the Nicheries in only one count: wiretapping businessman Ami Shafrir around December 2000.

At the time, authorities have alleged, Nicherie was posing as an attorney and investment banker who defrauded Shafrir and his ex-wife out of some $40 million in cash, real estate and businesses. The fraud, according to an April 2004 indictment, occurred through an elaborate scheme where Nicherie took control of Shafrir's companies, drained their assets and put the businesses into bankruptcy.

Since his indictment, Nicherie has remained in federal custody and, serving as his own attorney, has repeatedly insisted he is innocent of the charges in both cases.

It was not immediately clear what impact today's expected change of plea by Nicherie will have on the ongoing Pellicano investigation.

If his plea occurs and is accepted by the judge, Nicherie will become the eighth person to plead guilty to criminal charges in the Pellicano investigation.

The former private eye and five others have pleaded not guilty in the case, which is scheduled for trial next summer.

Church, State And The Prisoners (5 Letters) (NYT)

The New York Times, December 13, 2006

To the Editor:

"Religion for Captive Audiences, With Taxpayers Footing the Bill" ("In God's Name" series, front page, Dec. 10) reports that prisons are offering benefits to those who undergo intensive religious education.

This blatant and offensive display of religious proliferation deserves intense scrutiny not only by the judicial system but also by any American who believes that all people have the right to equal benefits, regardless of religious beliefs.

Religious affiliation is no basis for increased government-financed benefits.

Ben Wiessmann
Hastings-on-Hudson, N.Y., Dec. 10, 2006

To the Editor:

I am a chaplain in a Midwestern women's prison. I am very much opposed to proselytizing in my private life and am legally required to curtail it in my professional life.

Yet I am in favor of religious rehabilitative programming in prisons. Those opposed to faith-based programs fail to realize the value of the act of visiting, of coming into a facility to offer something, of showing love and making a connection.

I would challenge these people not simply to tear down the few programs left in prisons, faulty though they may be, but to enter prisons themselves and build alternative programs with the love and commitment their evangelical brothers and sisters are showing.

To the Editor:

Your article raised several questions:

¶If alternative treatment plans are so effective in rehabilitating inmates and reducing recidivism, why are they not part of the regular program at prisons across the country? Why are prisons outsourcing one of their primary responsibilities?

¶If running these programs is so important to the religious groups that run them, why can't these groups raise the money to finance these programs from their own supporters? Why do they need to use taxpayers' money?

¶Is there any proof that inmates who get religion behind bars, whether it is fundamentalist Islam or evangelical Christianity, are less likely to commit crimes once they are released?

To the Editor:

The InnerChange Freedom Initiative in the Iowa prison system serves to underscore what for the last decade has become a growing problem of using taxpayers to finance the proselytizing of inmates.

Whatever the prison program's merits, the government should not be involved in promoting any particular faith. Religion already has its proper place in correctional facilities.

To grant preferential treatment to some inmates solely because they agree to engage in religious indoctrination, underwritten with taxpayer dollars, is bad public policy and, as the courts have ruled, unconstitutional.

Jeffrey Sinensky

To the Editor:

As a member of the American Civil Liberties Union and a Christian who supports the separation of church and state, I normally do not find much agreement with evangelicals. But a good friend who spent many years in prison received no education, training, alcoholism treatment or other preparation when he was unceremoniously dumped, homeless and penniless, back into the society he left in the 1970s.

The 700,000 people a year released from prisons and jails, sometimes after decades of imprisonment and long-term solitary confinement, receive by default government-sponsored training in the violence and antisocial behavior necessary to stay alive in prison.

If we don't want evangelicals to be the ones trying to change this situation, somebody else had better step up to the plate!

Religion For A Captive Audience, Paid For By Taxes (NYT)

By Diana B. Henriques And Andrew Lehren

Life was different in Unit E at the state prison outside Newton, Iowa.

The toilets and sinks — white porcelain ones, like at home — were in a separate bathroom with partitions for privacy. In many Iowa prisons, metal toilet-and-sink combinations squat beside the bunks, to be used without privacy, a few feet from cellmates.

The cells in Unit E had real wooden doors and doorknobs, with locks. More books and computers were available, and inmates were kept busy with classes, chores, music practice and discussions. There were occasional movies and events with live bands and real-world food, like pizza or sandwiches from Subway. Best of all, there were opportunities to see loved ones in an environment quieter and more intimate than the typical visiting rooms.

But the only way an inmate could qualify for this kinder mutation of prison life was to enter an intensely religious rehabilitation program and satisfy the evangelical Christians running it that he was making acceptable spiritual progress. The program — which grew from a project started in 1997 at a Texas prison with the support of George W. Bush, who was governor at the time — says on its Web site that it seeks "to 'cure' prisoners by identifying sin as the root of their problems" and showing inmates "how God can heal them permanently, if they turn from their sinful past."

One Roman Catholic inmate, Michael A. Bauer, left the program after a year, mostly because he felt the program staff and volunteers were hostile toward his faith.

"My No. 1 reason for leaving the program was that I personally felt spiritually crushed," he testified at a court hearing last year. "I just didn't feel good about where I was and what was going on."

For Robert W. Pratt, chief judge of the federal courts in the Southern District of Iowa, this all added up to an unconstitutional use of taxpayer money for religious indoctrination, as he ruled in June in a lawsuit challenging the arrangement.

The Iowa prison program is not unique. Since 2000, courts have cited more than a dozen programs for having unconstitutionally used taxpayer money to pay for religious activities or evangelism aimed at prisoners, recovering addicts, job seekers, teenagers and children.

Nevertheless, the programs are proliferating. For example, the Corrections Corporation of America, the nation's largest prison management company, with 65 facilities and 71,000 inmates under its control, is substantially expanding its religion-based curriculum and now has 22 institutions offering residential programs similar to the one in Iowa. And the federal Bureau of Prisons, which runs at least five multifaith programs at its facilities, is preparing to seek bids for a single-faith prison program as well.

Government agencies have been repeatedly cited by judges and government auditors for not doing enough to guard against taxpayer-financed evangelism. But some constitutional lawyers say new federal rules may bar the government from imposing any special requirements for how faith-based programs are audited.

And, typically, the only penalty imposed when constitutional violations are detected is the cancellation of future financing — with no requirement that money improperly used for religious purposes be repaid.

But in a move that some constitutional lawyers found surprising, Judge Pratt ordered the prison ministry in the Iowa case to repay more than $1.5 million in government money, saying the constitutional violations were serious and clearly foreseeable.

His decision has been appealed by the prison ministry to a federal appeals court and fiercely protested by the attorneys general of nine states and lawyers for a number of groups advocating greater government accommodation of religious groups. The ministry's allies in court include the Bush administration, which argued that the repayment order could derail its efforts to draw more religious groups into taxpayer-financed programs.

Officials of the Iowa program said that any anti-Catholic comments made to inmates did not reflect the program's philosophy, and are not condoned by its leadership.

Jay Hein, director of the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives, said the Iowa decision was unfair to the ministry and reflects an "overreaching" at odds with legal developments that increasingly "show favor to religion in the public square."

And while he acknowledged the need for vigilance, he said he did not think the constitutional risks outweighed the benefits of inviting "faith-infused" ministries, like the one in Iowa, to provide government-financed services to "people of faith who seek to be served in this 'full-person' concept."

Crossing a Bright Line

Over the last two decades, legislatures, government agencies and the courts have provided religious organizations with a widening range of regulatory and tax exemptions. And in the last decade religious institutions have also been granted access to public money once denied on constitutional grounds, including historic preservation grants and emergency reconstruction funds.

In 2002, the Supreme Court ruled that public money could be used for religious instruction or indoctrination, but only when the intended beneficiaries made the choice themselves between religious and secular programs — as when parents decide whether to use tuition vouchers at religious schools or secular ones. The court emphasized the difference between such "indirect" financing, in which the money flows through beneficiaries who choose that program, and "direct" funding, where the government chooses the programs that receive money.

But even in today's more accommodating environment, constitutional scholars agree that one line between church and state has remained fairly bright: The government cannot directly finance or support religious evangelism or indoctrination. That restriction typically has not loomed large when public money goes to religious charities providing essentially secular services, like job training, after-school tutoring, child care or food banks. In such cases, the beneficiaries need not accept the charity's religious beliefs to get the secular benefits the government is financing.

The courts have taken a different view, however, when public money goes directly to groups, like the Iowa ministry, whose method of helping others is to introduce them to a specific set of religious beliefs — and whose success depends on the beneficiary accepting those core beliefs. In those cases, most of the challenged grants have been struck down as unconstitutional.

Those who see faith-based groups as exceptionally effective allies in the battle against criminal recidivism, teen pregnancy, addiction and other social ills say these cases are rare, compared with the number of programs receiving funds, and should not tarnish the concept of bringing more religious groups into publicly financed programs, so long as any direct financing is used only for secular expenses.

That concept has been embodied most prominently since 2001 in the Bush administration's Faith-Based and Community Initiative, a high-profile effort to encourage religious and community groups to participate in government programs. More than 100 cities and 33 states have established similar initiatives, according to Mr. Hein.

The basic architecture of these initiatives has so far withstood constitutional challenge, although the Supreme Court agreed on Dec. 1 to consider a case on whether taxpayers have legal standing to bring such challenges against the Bush administration's program.

Defenders of these initiatives say they are necessary to eliminate longstanding government policies that discriminated against religious groups — to provide a level playing field, as one White House study put it.

But critics say the "level playing field" argument ignores the fact that giving public money directly to ministries that aim at religious conversion poses constitutional problems that simply do not arise when the money goes elsewhere.

Converting Young People

Those constitutional problems sharpen when young people are the intended beneficiaries of these transformational ministries. In recent years, several judges have concluded that children and teenagers, like prisoners, have too few options and too little power to make the voluntary choices the Supreme Court requires when public money flows to programs involving religious instruction or indoctrination.

That was the conclusion last year of a federal judge in Michigan, in a case filed by Teen Ranch, a nonprofit Christian facility that provides residential care for troubled or abused children ages 11 to 17.

In 2003, state officials imposed a moratorium on placements of children there, primarily because of its intensively religious programming. Lawyers for the ranch went to court to challenge that moratorium.

"Teen Ranch acknowledges that it is overtly and unapologetically a Christian facility with a Christian worldview that hopes to touch and improve the lives of the youth served by encouraging their conversion to faith in Christ, or assisting them in deepening their pre-existing Christian faith," observed a United States District judge, Robert Holmes Bell, in a decision released in September 2005.

Although youngsters in state custody could not choose where to be placed, they could refuse to go to the ranch if they objected to its religious character. As a result, the ranch's lawyers argued, the state money was constitutionally permissible.

The state contended that the children in its care were "too young, vulnerable and traumatized" to make genuine choices. The ranch disputed that and added that the children had case workers and other adults to guide them. Judge Bell rejected Teen Ranch's arguments. "Regardless of whether state wards are particularly vulnerable, they are children," he wrote.

The ranch in Michigan has discontinued operations pending the outcome of its appeal, said Mitchell E. Koster, who was its chief operating officer. "We are confident that our argument will win," Mr. Koster said. "It's just a question of at what level."

In another case early last year, a federal judge struck down a federal grant in 2003 to MentorKids USA, a ministry based in Phoenix, to provide mentors for the children of prisoners. In a case filed by the Freedom From Religion Foundation in Madison, Wis., the judge noted that the exclusively Christian mentors had to regularly assess whether the young people in their care seemed "to be progressing in relationship with God." In a program newsletter offered as evidence, its director said, "Our goal is to see every young adult choose Christ."

The federal government had been clearly informed in advance of the nature of the MentorKids ministry, said John Gibson, chairman of the group's board. "The court's decision meant that there were 50 kids we could have served that we were not able to serve."

In another case, more than $1 million in federal funds went to the Alaska Christian College in Soldotna, Alaska, which says it provides "a theologically based post-secondary education" to teenage Native Americans from isolated villages. But an investigator from the Education Department who visited the school last year found a first-year curriculum "that is almost entirely religious in nature."

The Freedom From Religion Foundation sued to block the financing. The school promised to use government money only for secular expenses, and federal financing resumed last May, according to Derek Gaubatz, of the Becket Fund for Religious Liberty, which represents the college.

A number of government grants to finance sexual abstinence education have been successfully challenged. For example, the Louisiana Governor's Program on Abstinence gave federal money to several religious groups that used it for clearly unconstitutional purposes, a federal judge ruled in 2002, in a case filed by the American Civil Liberties Union.

One grant went to a theater company that toured high schools performing a skit called "Just Say Whoa." The script contained many religious references including one in which a character called Bible Guy tells teenagers in the cast: "As Christians, our bodies belong to the Lord, not to us."

The federal judge said the grants were so poorly monitored that the state missed other clear signs of unconstitutional activity — as when one Catholic diocese sent monthly reports showing that it had used federal money "to support prayer at abortion clinics, pro-life marches and pro-life rallies." Gail Dignam, director of the abstinence program, said that state contracts now emphasize more clearly that no grant money may be used for religious activities.

The Programs in Prisons

Programs like the one at the Iowa prison are a rare ray of hope for American prisoners, and governments should encourage them, their supporters say.

"We have 2.3 million Americans in prison today; 700,000 of them will get out of prison this coming year," said Mark L. Earley, a former attorney general of Virginia. Many inmates come out of prison "much more antisocial than when they came in," he added. He said he saw faith-based groups as essential partners in any effective rehabilitation efforts.

Mr. Earley is the president and chief executive of Prison Fellowship Ministries, based in Lansdowne, Va. With almost $56 million a year in revenue, the ministry oversees the InnerChange Freedom Initiative, which operates the Iowa program.

Since its birth in 1976, Prison Fellowship has been most closely associated with one of its founders, Charles W. Colson, who said in a 2002 newsletter that the InnerChange program demonstrates "that Christ changes lives, and that changing prisoners from the inside out is the only crime-prevention program that really works."

In early 2003, Americans United for Separation of Church and State joined with a group of Iowa taxpayers and inmates to challenge the InnerChange program in federal court.

In ruling on that case, Judge Pratt noted that the born-again Christian staff was the sole judge of an inmate's spiritual transformation. If an inmate did not join in the religious activities that were part of his "treatment," the staff could write up disciplinary reports, generating demerits the inmate's parole board might see. Or they could expel the inmate.

And while the program was supposedly open to all, in practice its content was "a substantial disincentive" for inmates of other faiths to join, the judge noted. Although the ministry itself does not condone hostility toward Catholics, Roman Catholic inmates heard their faith criticized by staff members and volunteers from local evangelical churches, the judge found. And Jews and Muslims in the program would have been required to participate in Christian worship services even if that deeply offended their own religious beliefs.

Mr. Earley said Judge Pratt's decision was sharply inconsistent with current law and his standard for separating secular from religious expenses was so extreme that it would disqualify almost any faith-based program. He acknowledged that inmates, whatever their own faith, are required to participate in all program activities, including worship, but he insisted that a religious conversion is not required for success. InnerChange uses biblical references only to illustrate a set of universal values, such as integrity and responsibility, and not to exclude those of other faiths, he said, adding that it was "unfortunate" if any inmates felt the program denigrated Catholicism or any other Christian faith. Corrections officials in Iowa declined to comment on the case.

Not all programs in prisons are so narrowly focused. Florida now has three prisons that offer inmates, who must ask to be housed there, more than two dozen offerings ranging from various Christian denominations to Orthodox Judaism to Scientology. But at Newton, Judge Pratt found, there were few options — and no equivalent programs — without religious indoctrination.

"The state has literally established an Evangelical Christian congregation within the walls of one of its penal institutions, giving the leaders of that congregation, i.e., InnerChange employees, authority to control the spiritual, emotional and physical lives of hundreds of Iowa inmates," Judge Pratt wrote. "There are no adequate safeguards present, nor could there be, to ensure that state funds are not being directly spent to indoctrinate Iowa inmates."

InnerChange, which has been widely praised by corrections officials and politicians, operates similar programs at prisons in Texas, Minnesota, Kansas, Arkansas and, by next spring, Missouri. Officials in those states are monitoring the Iowa case, but several said they believed their programs were sufficiently different to survive a similar challenge.

A government-financed religious education program at a county jail in Fort Worth was struck down by the Texas Supreme Court more than five years ago, and more lawsuits are pending. Corrections Corporation was among those sued last year by the Freedom From Religion Foundation, which is challenging a Christian residential program at a women's prison in Grant, N.M. The foundation has also sued the federal Bureau of Prisons over its faith-based rehabilitation programs. And Americans United, the Iowa plaintiff, and the American Civil Liberties Union have sued a job-training program run by a religious group at the Bradford County Jail near Troy, Pa.

Prison Fellowship Ministries is one of about a half-dozen Christian groups that operate programs at jails and prisons run by the Corrections Corporation. The company's lawyers are studying the Iowa decision, said a spokeswoman, Louise Grant. "But we are not, at this time, changing or altering any of our programming based on that, or any other ruling."

Inadequate Monitoring

Government agencies have been criticized repeatedly for inadequately watching these programs. Besides the criticism in various court decisions, the Government Accountability Office has twice raised questions about cloudy guidelines and inadequate safeguards against government-financed evangelism.

In its most recent audit released in June, the G.A.O., which examined faith-based organizations in four states, found that some were violating federal rules against proselytizing and that government agencies did not have adequate safeguards against such violations.

The problem is not that none of these programs are audited. Every group that gets a federal grant worth more than $500,000 has to pay a private auditor to examine its books and report to the government. Many federal programs, like those that provide Medicaid services or help the government allocate arts grants, require additional audits.

But no supplemental audits are required under the faith-based initiative — indeed, it would probably violate the Bush administration's new regulations to do so, said Robert W. Tuttle, a professor of law and religion at George Washington University and co-director of legal research, along with Ira C. Lupu, for the Roundtable on Religion and Social Welfare Policy, a project of the Rockefeller Institute.

"The rules can be read to prohibit special audit requirements because that would be considered a stigma, which would be discriminatory," Professor Tuttle said. "But that flies in the face of constitutional logic, because religion is special, and that special quality has to be reflected in program guidelines and audit rules."

The G.A.O. also says the government cannot easily or accurately track either how much money is flowing to groups or whether they are using the funds in unconstitutional ways.

The Bush administration is already studying whether these constitutional problems can be resolved by reshaping many government grants into voucher programs under which the beneficiary decides where the money goes. But vouchers are a limited solution because most social service agencies need to know that a certain amount of money is assured before they can begin operations.

Mr. Hein, the White House official, agreed that vouchers could clarify the legal landscape. But even where they are not practical, he said, the Bush administration remains committed to keeping the doors to government financing open for as many religious groups as possible.

Congressman Wants Lacrosse Investigation (AP)

A congressman asked the Justice Department on Tuesday to investigate whether the district attorney prosecuting three Duke University lacrosse players charged with rape has violated the athletes' civil rights.

In a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, Rep. Walter Jones also asked the Justice Department to review Durham County District Attorney Mike Nifong's actions for possible prosecutorial misconduct.

"Over the past several months, many of my constituents and a growing number of mainstream media outlets have raised serious questions about the accuser's allegations and Mr. Nifong's prosecution," wrote Jones, R-N.C.

Jones' complaints to Gonzales repeat criticisms that defense attorneys and others have raised about Nifong's handling of the case.

A grand jury indicted three lacrosse players on charges they raped a stripper at a team party in March. All three have strongly proclaimed their innocence, and a trial is not expected to start until spring.

There was no immediate response to a call to Nifong's office seeking comment. In an interview with The Associated Press in October, Nifong said he and the city's police department have not mishandled the case and that his only regret was granting so many interviews to reporters during the investigation's early days.

Three years ago, Jones helped lead an effort to make sure Capitol Hill cafeterias revised their menus to list "freedom fries" instead of french fries to protest France's opposition to the war in Iraq.

CIVIL LAW:

Financiers Agree To Settle Napster Suit (LAT)

By Joseph Menn, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 13, 2006

Venture firm strikes a deal with Universal and EMI in a test of liability on copyright issues.

The San Francisco investment firm behind the first widely used file-swapping service has agreed to settle a multibillion-dollar copyright lawsuit filed by two record labels.

Hummer Winblad Venture Partners, which put $13 million into Napster Inc. in 2000, has been defending its role in the suit by Universal Music Group and EMI Group. The labels accuse Hummer Winblad of helping Napster's tens of millions of users steal an unprecedented volume of music through their linked computers.

The two sides reached the tentative deal, which requires court approval, ahead of a summary judgment hearing that had been scheduled for today.

The case had loomed as a test of whether financial backers could be punished for rampant Internet piracy. But the settlement's financial terms weren't disclosed, so the question might remain murky, at least until a related case is resolved.

It's unclear what broke the logjam in negotiations. But Hummer Winblad was helped by an aggressive defense against the record companies.

The venture firm argued that it shouldn't be held liable for violating copyright laws when the labels themselves broke antitrust law by conspiring to heavily restrict the consumption of digital music.

U.S. District Judge Marilyn Hall Patel found enough evidence supporting the antitrust argument that in April she ordered the labels to disclose internal legal documents that would ordinarily have been protected by attorney-client privilege.

Patel ruled that the companies had misled the Justice Department about how they set the rules and prices governing the use of digital music by two industry-sponsored ventures, MusicNet and Pressplay.

Record industry sources said Universal and EMI were worried about Patel's findings and that any new documents they turned over could be used against them in other suits and government proceedings.

The settlement with Hummer Winblad is contingent on Patel vacating her April ruling, according to a filing by the three parties last week. Hummer Winblad's attorney declined to comment on the deal. Defendants John Hummer and Hank Barry, who are partners in the firm and served as Napster directors, didn't return phone messages.

In a related fight before Patel, EMI and other music publishers are continuing to sue Bertelsmann, the German media company that invested in Napster later in 2000. In September, Bertelsmann agreed to pay Universal $60 million to settle that company's claims against it.

The labels initially sued Napster itself, forcing its 2001 shutdown, but the company was liquidated in bankruptcy court. The Napster name was bought by a software company that now uses the brand for an authorized music distribution service.

"We're happy that we've settled conditionally," said EMI spokeswoman Jeanne Meyer. "We remain confident that we have a strong case against Bertelsmann."

Who Killed The Mass Torts Bonanza? (LAW)

By Alison Frankel, The American Lawyer

Law.com, December 13, 2006

The power of the plaintiffs bar is on the wane in this country, and will be for a long time to come.

You won't hear many tort reformers admit it. They've done too good a job demonizing trial lawyers to let their bogeymen fade away. Twenty years ago, tort reform was an obscure movement with a funny name; today, politicians speak of "ending lawsuit abuse" or "eliminating frivolous lawsuits" -- tort reform by more felicitous names -- whenever they need a failsafe applause line. The movement's success has been a public relations masterpiece.

Beginning at a time when plaintiffs lawyers, flush from the fat years of asbestos revenues, seemed to have the money, brainpower and political alliances to cripple any defendant of their choosing, tort reformers engineered a billion-dollar anti-trial lawyer campaign: They produced and promulgated scholarly papers on the economic consequences of litigation; they sponsored grassroots groups to lobby state legislatures and campaign for business-backed state judicial candidates; they even hit upon such innovations as the publication of newspapers supported by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce to report on litigation in plaintiffs-friendly southern Illinois and West Virginia.

Plaintiffs lawyers, accustomed to thinking of themselves as champions of the people, fighting big business on behalf of the little guy, seethed at the vulturous image tort reformers created for them, but didn't grasp its implications. They were, by their own admission, so slow to respond to what Robert Jenner of Janet, Jenner & Suggs calls "the ridiculous propaganda" of their opponents that they permitted the chamber of commerce and the American Tort Reform Association to co-opt the very language of the debate.

"Reform" is one way to describe the business-backed changes in product liability litigation in the last decade. Trial lawyers would choose another, something along the lines of an unconscionable abrogation of plaintiffs' rights. See Mass Torts Roll Call.

Neither, however, would deny that the civil justice system looks drastically different than it did even two years ago. The true triumph (or tragedy, depending on your perspective) of the tort reform movement has been its ability to leverage the success of its public relations campaign into concrete and hard-to-reverse changes. State legislatures have passed laws that undercut the trial lawyers' successes in Washington, D.C. -- especially in the asbestos litigation, which has declined precipitously since the early 2000s.

Tort reformers have packed state judiciaries with judges amenable to their agenda. Federal and state courts overseeing multidistrict cases have become more vigilant about policing their dockets. And defendants, no longer as terrified of runaway punitive damages, "hellhole" jurisdictions and unmanageable trial schedules, are refusing to settle cases en masse. Such plaintiffs giants as Motley Rice; Waite, Schneider, Bayless & Chesley; and Lieff, Cabraser, Heimann & Bernstein are reconsidering their caseloads and edging away from mass torts. "I do not believe the next 10 years will be a repeat of the last 10," says Joseph Rice, one of the shrewdest businessmen practicing law. "There will not be a repetition of the personal injury practice. Congress will not allow another tobacco. The courts will not allow multiple-jurisdiction litigation over products."

To be sure, plaintiffs lawyers and mass torts aren't going to disappear -- witness the furor over newly hatched global warming suits, which, despite legal theories that are speculative at best, have forced oil companies, coal manufacturers and utilities to begin planning a defense. Asbestos will continue to generate about 10,000 cancer cases a year, and plaintiffs firms are still pushing to lasso peripheral defendants into asbestos liability. Motley Rice's eight-year investment in lead paint litigation, which finally yielded a jury verdict on liability in Rhode Island in February, may yet pay off. Weitz & Luxenberg and Baron & Budd see promise in multidistrict litigation over the gasoline additive MTBE, in which oil company defendants face more than $1 billion in claims of water contamination by municipalities and water districts. And Vioxx lawyers Christopher Seeger and W. Mark Lanier maintain that Merck & Co., Inc., will eventually begin settling cases, as almost all of the pharmaceutical defendants have.

There will always be people injured by the products or actions of big corporations, and there's still money to be made representing them. But the bonanza -- the Wild West era in which mass torts was an unfettered frontier and plaintiffs lawyers seemed to have all the firepower -- is over. If you're a plaintiffs lawyer and you haven't already bought the plane and the yacht of your dreams, well, sorry, pal. You're too late.

IT'S THE STATES, STUPID

George Christian, a lawyer and lobbyist in Austin, remembers without fondness Texas' litigation situation in the early 1980s. Juries in places such as Beaumont and Corpus Christi were doling out million-dollar verdicts like lollipops on Halloween, drawing thousands of out-of-state plaintiffs to Texas courts and transforming a coterie of plaintiffs lawyers into multimillionaires with the power to influence state judicial elections. In 1986 the Texas Supreme Court handed down a ruling that ended contributory negligence in state courts, allowing plaintiffs to recover damages even when juries found them to be partially responsible for their own injuries.

"It was a major change in state policy and got people's attention," Christian says. In response, a coalition of businesses and doctors formed the Texas Civil Justice League, a lobbying group with the sole objective of making the state's civil justice system less friendly to plaintiffs. Christian became the group's general counsel.

The league had its first success right away, when the Texas legislature passed a cap on punitive damages in 1987. Christian's group then pressed for changes in venue rules and for product liability reform. The legislature obliged in 1993, and Democratic governor Ann Richards signed the tort reform bills into law. "Republican winds were blowing, and we took advantage of that," says Christian. "[But] Governor Richards was part of it. Because of the reputation of the state, she felt, 'I need to address this.' " The issues weren't politically sexy -- joint and several liability doesn't exactly bring voters streaming to the polls -- but the coalition lobbying for change was influential and well financed.

Those early tort reform advances, which were taking place not only in Texas but also in other state legislatures, did not take the organized plaintiffs bar by surprise. Beginning in about 1990, ATLA began developing an expertise in state constitutional law, working under the umbrella theory that legislative meddling in the judicial process violated states' separation-of-powers doctrines, says Robert Peck of the Center for Constitutional Litigation, a spin-off of the Association of Trial Lawyers of America. In 1995 ATLA hired Peck to head its legal department, and he launched challenges to sweeping tort reform laws in, among other states, Ohio and Illinois. In both, Peck eventually prevailed: The Ohio and Illinois supreme courts threw out the legislation.

But Peck's wins proved temporary. Business interests learned that if state judges didn't vote their way, they could replace those judges with others who would. The Texas Civil Justice League offered an exemplar for tort reformers attempting to influence judicial elections. In 1988 a Texas supreme court justice appointed by Republican governor Bill Clements was opposed for election by a candidate running with the support of Texas' plaintiffs lawyers. "We spent a lot of time creating voters' guides," says Christian. "They went out by the millions." The league distributed its playing card-sized guides through its membership, asking doctors and local businesses to hand stacks of cards to patients and customers. "We were trying to build on people who already had an interest in the issue," Christian says. "We were able to win in 1988, then we got a couple more [justices] in 1990, 1992 and 1994. By 1994 the old court was pretty much replaced." The new Texas court showed its allegiance quickly, with pro-business rulings on punitive damages and expert witnesses in 1995.

Following the Texas Civil Justice League model, the Washington, D.C.-based American Tort Reform Association (ATRA) and Institute for Legal Reform began in the mid-1990s to nurture statewide groups that would simultaneously lobby in state legislatures and campaign against judges backed by trial lawyers. "Nobody had [previously] paid too much attention to the judiciary," says Edward Murnane of one such group, the Illinois Civil Justice League. "We realized we needed to expand our sphere of activity."

In Mississippi, Ohio, Alabama and Arkansas -- states once considered plaintiffs havens -- business interests succeeded in shifting the balance of power in state judiciaries. Five of the seven justices now serving on the Illinois Supreme Court received the support of the Illinois Civil Justice League, including the justice who holds the seat reserved for Illinois' notoriously plaintiffs-friendly southern counties. He prevailed against the trial lawyer-backed candidate in the most expensive state judicial contest in U.S. history in 2004; between them, the candidates raised an estimated $9 million. Nationwide, according to Governing magazine, spending in state judicial elections has exploded in the last decade, jumping 61 percent from 1998 to 2000 alone; in 2004 the average cost of winning a judicial seat was $650,000.

The impact of the dual judicial-and-legislative attack has been profound. In Mississippi the newly constituted supreme court played tag-team tort reform with state lawmakers, each branch rushing to ratify the other's advances; the state has gone from being "the poster child of litigation abuse," wrote Shook, Hardy & Bacon partner (and ATRA counsel) Mark Behrens in a 2005 law review article, to "a shining example of how a state can join the legal mainstream and foster economic growth through legal reform."

Both the silica and asbestos dockets in Mississippi have been slashed, according to defense lawyer Brian Hannula of Jackson's Forman Perry Watkins Krutz & Tardy: silica from more than 21,000 to fewer than 4,000 cases; asbestos from more than 60,000 to fewer than 10,000. In Illinois, where Democrats in state government have stalled tort reform laws, the new supreme court issued a series of pro-business rulings, overturning a $10 billion verdict against Philip Morris USA Inc. and acting to restrict class actions and out-of-state filings.

"I don't want to take credit," says Murnane of the Illinois Civil Justice League. "But I definitely think our activities and the involvement we've had, helping good people get on the court, [meant] we were able to break the stranglehold. We helped the court become more independent."

Texas remains the most dramatic state transformation. In the last 10 years, the legislature passed law after law, knowing that the court would approve them: punitive damages and liability reform in 1995; caps on medical malpractice damages in 2003; and restrictions on asbestos litigation in 2005. Personal injury filings statewide dropped about 30 percent after the 2003 reforms. "We hemmed [them] in pretty good," says Christian of the Texas Civil Justice League. "We've become a pretty unfriendly place for mass torts."

ATLA kept abreast of what was happening in the states, says communications vice president Chris Mather, but the national group's orientation has always been Washington, D.C, where, since 2000, it has been plenty busy warding off federal laws intended to restrict litigation. (ATLA's only significant defeat in Washington was the Class Action Fairness Act of 2005, which assured that most big class actions would be litigated in federal, not state, court.) State trial lawyer associations fought state-based tort reform groups in the legislatures and in judicial elections, but even with ATLA's assistance, they were outmatched and outspent. The judicial situation is now so unpromising that Robert Peck, the onetime ATLA lawyer who was so effective in the 1990s at persuading state justices to overturn tort reform laws, says he has decided against challenging new laws in some states with hostile supreme courts.

"The moment we won in Ohio, they began campaigning against the author of the opinion," says Peck, who spun off the Center for Constitutional Litigation from ATLA in 2001. "There was nothing I could do as a law firm." (The justice, Alice Resnick, was reelected but recently announced that she will not run again.) Peck does have a challenge pending in Ohio, where the legislature passed a new, but hardly changed, tort reform bill after the old law was struck down. His briefs cite some of the same constitutional deficiencies that led the Ohio Supreme Court to overturn the original law, but he doesn't know how effective they'll be this time: Only two of the justices who ruled in his favor in 1997 are still on the court.

VOLUME KILLS

In the early days of the asbestos litigation, which is to say, the early days of mass tort litigation, what so unnerved judges and defendants was volume: There seemed to be too many cases to litigate within the routine procedures of the civil justice system. Corporations said they couldn't defend themselves simultaneously in dozens of trials all over the country, particularly when plaintiffs lawyers could file those cases in jurisdictions inclined to award crippling punitive damages. Judges said they couldn't manage dockets with hundreds -- then thousands -- of cases, and pressed for block settlements and group trials. Volume shifted the focus of litigation away from the facts of any one particular case, which meant that plaintiffs lawyers were able to generate fees from cases without compelling facts. In one oft-employed asbestos strategy, now banned in Texas, plaintiffs lawyers would bundle a strong case, one involving the asbestos-linked lung cancer called mesothelioma, with many cases of lesser injury or shakier causation, and demand settlement of all of them at the same time.

As mass tort litigation spread beyond asbestos to other environmental, product liability and pharmaceutical cases, the plaintiffs bar developed a system that institutionalized the advantage of volume. Lawyer advertising and labor unions produced potential clients, whose initial lawyer contact might well have been with a firm that functioned only as a referral clearinghouse. Client files would be passed to one of a couple dozen large, well-financed plaintiffs shops operating in jurisdictions where juries could be counted upon to reward plaintiffs claims. Those firms, through their referral networks, would wind up with tens of thousands of cases -- and they understood how to leverage those numbers into settlements. (The big firms, in turn, directed a percentage of their contingency fees to the referring firms.) Volume permitted plaintiffs lawyers to make money from little more than nothing. "They have a long history of making easy profit by jamming the system," says Theodore Mayer of New York's Hughes Hubbard & Reed, spokesman for Merck in the Vioxx litigation. "Courts threw up their hands and forced settlements in the interest of clearing dockets."

Volume frightened defendants into overvaluing finality. The personal injury class action vogue of the 1990s, in which mass tort defendants attempted to settle huge numbers of individual cases through global class actions, developed because defendants were more anxious to define the limits of the litigation they faced than to test plaintiffs cases one at a time. Paying weak claims seemed preferable to litigating endlessly. The corrupting power of volume was displayed most egregiously in the 1999 settlement of the diet drug litigation against American Home Products Corp. (now Wyeth). Wyeth believed that it could resolve the litigation through a global settlement (carefully crafted to comply with the restrictions on personal injury class actions established by the U.S. Supreme Court's rulings in the Amchem and Georgine cases of the 1990s). But Wyeth knew that the $3.75 billion class action fund it was proposing could not receive the necessary judicial approval if enough plaintiffs objected to it. So to minimize objections to the global deal, Wyeth lawyers paid billions to settle thousands of untested cases. That free spending, as well as the settlement's concession of causation, turned the diet drug litigation into a $20 billion debacle of dubious claims.

In recent years, however, the federal judiciary has quietly mitigated the power of volume in mass torts, most frequently through the use of the MDL, or multidistrict litigation, vehicle. The MDL process has existed since 1971. A panel of six federal judges, who are selected by the chief justice of the U.S. Supreme Court, decides whether cases involving similar claims but filed in multiple federal courts should be transferred to a single federal judge for consolidated pretrial discovery and motions practice. At first, according to a report prepared by the MDL panel's statistical analyst at the request of The American Lawyer, the MDL judges appeared skeptical about using the vehicle to manage product liability mass torts.

In the panel's first 15 years of existence, the judges heard arguments to transfer 32 mass torts matters. They denied the transfer of 19 of them -- including several proposed asbestos MDLs and at least a half-dozen pharmaceutical cases -- leaving the cases to be litigated in multiple courtrooms. Then trends changed. As mass tort litigation burgeoned, the MDL panel judges not only heard more requests, they also transferred a higher percentage of them. From 1986 through 2000, the panel denied only nine of the 68 MDL motions it heard. And in the last six years, only six of the 62 cases the panel considered were denied MDL status. "The MDL panel is so quick to jump in today," says Rice of Motley Rice. "Too quick. If there's a [product] recall, before suits are even filed it's an MDL."

Mass tort lawyers on both the defense and plaintiffs sides used to debate whether the MDL process helped or hurt defendants. Transferring all federal cases to a single judge reduced the chaos of mass tort litigation and lifted the defense burden of fighting the same discovery and motions battles in multiple courtrooms. But MDLs also permitted plaintiffs lawyers to pool resources, spreading the expense of working up the litigation to several firms -- and spreading damning documents turned up in discovery across the country. Moreover, when a case was deemed an MDL, the litigation gained credibility in the plaintiffs bar. The MDL panel's imprimatur was a signal that a case was officially a mass tort, so MDLs attracted additional filings, thus magnifying the risk to defendants of adverse rulings by the MDL judge.

The debate should now be over: The MDL process has proved to be more of a boon to defendants than plaintiffs, thanks to several rulings by MDL judges aggressively policing the mass torts transferred to their courtrooms. The most famous MDL ruling was the 2005 opinion of Corpus Christi federal district court judge Janis Graham Jack in the silicosis litigation, which at one time was considered to have asbestos-sized potential. After Judge Jack held hearings on the qualifications of the plaintiffs' expert witnesses under the Supreme Court's Daubert "junk science" decision, she found enough evidence of malfeasance by doctors and plaintiffs lawyers that Texas prosecutors convened a grand jury. Jack's ruling effectively halted the silica litigation, and, at least in the view of defense lawyers, sent a strong message to plaintiffs lawyers about the scrutiny they could expect in other mass torts as well.

No other federal judge has written a decision as devastating as Judge Jack's, but in both the Rezulin and Meridia MDLs, for instance, pretrial proceedings resulted in rulings that made the cases manageable for defendants. Judge Lewis Kaplan's 2005 Daubert hearings in the 23,000-case Rezulin litigation, which involved a Warner-Lambert Co. drug to treat diabetes, persuaded about 80 percent of the plaintiffs to settle or voluntarily dismiss their claims. Kaplan severely restricted the litigation, holding that only plaintiffs who could prove their livers were affected while they were taking Rezulin -- not those whose livers were damaged before or after they took the drug -- had scientifically valid claims. Warner-Lambert's successor, Pfizer Inc., was subsequently able to dispose of the cases that survived Kaplan's ruling.

The Meridia diet drug ruling was more drastic: Judge James Gwin dismissed the entire federal litigation on a summary judgment motion by the defendant, Abbott Laboratories, which argued that the drug's warning label protected it from liability. Gwin's ruling helped convince Stanley Chesley, who headed the Meridia plaintiffs steering committee, that mass torts were no longer a reliable source of business. "Looking at our past experience in mass torts," says Chesley, a pioneer in the litigation, "I'm [now] very picky before I get into them. ... We've moved into securities and antitrust [instead]." (Chesley is not guaranteed success in those areas, either: The number of securities class action filings is down in the last two years, and, according to plaintiffs lawyer Steven Toll of Cohen, Milstein & Hausfeld, the dismissal rate is on the rise.)

In addition to scrutinizing the claims of masses of plaintiffs, more state and federal MDL judges are demanding evidence of injury from individual claimants early in the litigation, says O'Melveny & Myers partner John Beisner, a mass tort defense specialist. "It used to be that all the time up front, the discovery, everything was on the plaintiffs side," Beisner says. "Now judges are saying, 'We're going to work on both sides of this. ... What is the evidence that you, Mr. or Ms. Smith, were injured?'"

In the litigation over Baycol, a cholesterol-reduction drug produced by Bayer AG, the state court judge overseeing all of the Baycol cases in Pennsylvania required each plaintiff to submit an expert report on his or her injury; as a result, says Baycol defense counsel Philip Beck of Bartlit Beck Herman Palenchar & Scott, plaintiffs lawyers dropped weak claims that plumped the purported size of the litigation. "Judges have seen what happens when the mass tort process gets abused, when it gets out of control," says Beck, who, like Beisner, is on Merck's Vioxx defense team. "They're doing something about it."

The MDL vehicle is now common in state courts. Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Texas, for instance, have established state-court mechanisms that parallel federal MDLs: Cases are consolidated before a single state judge for pretrial hearings (many states have adopted stringent Daubert-like standards for expert witnesses) and docket management. State MDLs have also served mass tort defendants well, says O'Melveny's Beisner. "One of the plaintiffs tactics was to get an early trial, to get the best case set for trial in a place like Texas. Now, with [state] MDL proceedings, their capacity to walk to the courthouse and get a trial date is limited. There aren't many states anymore where you can get cases on a fast track to trial." Texas' asbestos litigation, says Christian, of the Texas Civil Justice League, was tamed only after the cases, at the behest of tort reformers, were transferred to a Houston state MDL.

State and federal MDL judges are increasingly likely to work together to manage mass tort litigation. Federal judges can decide when and whether to remand cases to state courts; some mass torts lawyers say there's growing federal court resistance to the plaintiffs tactic of naming a local doctor or pharmacy as a defendant in order to keep a case in state court. State judges often wait for federal rulings on Daubert and other motions to conduct their own hearings. Judges on both levels coordinate trial dates. In the manganese welding rod mass tort, for instance, federal court judge Kathleen McDonald O'Malley and various state judges have scheduled only 12 trials in almost four years of litigation, says lead defense counsel Beisner: one in the federal MDL and 11 in state courts. The defendants have had time to prepare for each trial, and have won all but one of them. A litigation that, according to Beisner, started off with about 7,000 cases is "diminishing rapidly," he says. "The numbers are down 40-45 percent. The winnowing has been successful."

PLAYING DEFENSE

When Phil Beck began advising Bayer in the Baycol litigation in the early 2000s, he says, Wyeth's diet drug experience loomed large. "That was the prototype for disaster," he says. "We looked very closely at fen-phen and other mass tort situations and saw how things had gone awry. ... We made a very conscious decision to take a different approach."

That new defense attitude, pioneered by Bayer in the Baycol litigation and spreading fast ever since, may be the most significant obstacle that plaintiffs lawyers will face in future mass torts. Of course, Beck says, Bayer could not have engaged plaintiffs lawyers so aggressively had it not been for state tort reform and activist MDL judges. But the Baycol litigation emboldened defendants -- and chastened plaintiffs lawyers -- because it showed both sides that defendants could seize control of a mass tort litigation from the plaintiffs in a way that had rarely happened before.

After Bayer voluntarily withdrew Baycol from the market in 2001 because of a side effect called rhabdomyolysis, a potentially fatal muscle deterioration, the company faced the onslaught of suits that seems to follow every drug recall. Some of the cases involved claims of rhabdo, as the condition is known; other plaintiffs claimed different Baycol-related injuries. The company believed, based on epidemiological evidence, that it knew the universe of Baycol users who had developed rhabdo -- and that it could afford to settle their cases. The uncertainty lay in the thousands of cases in which the plaintiffs' evidence of rhabdo was weak, or in which plaintiffs claimed non-rhabdo injuries. And it was in these cases, says Beck, that Bayer took a radical position.

Early in the litigation, the federal MDL judge, Michael Davis of Minneapolis, called a meeting of Bayer defense lawyers, plaintiffs lawyers and state judges with large Baycol dockets. "At that big meeting," says Beck, "I stood up and said, 'I have an announcement. We recognize that some people who took Baycol experienced the side effect [of rhabdomyolysis]. We think we have a good defense on the merits, [but] if you can show your client was taking Baycol contemporaneously with contracting rhabdo, we're willing to settle every case. We're going to be fair and reasonable.'" Beck recounts. "'But on the flip side, if you demand a premium [because] you have a trial in a plaintiffs-friendly jurisdiction, we're going to fight you to the death. And most of your cases are not rhabdo. We're not going to pay a penny on those.'"

Plaintiffs lawyers put Bayer to the test in both of the situations Beck cited. In 2003 Bayer went to trial on a rhabdo case in Corpus Christi, Texas, against noted plaintiffs lawyer Mikal Watts. "He had over 1,000 Baycol cases and was trying to put pressure on us to settle globally," Beck says. "[Watts] told us he wouldn't settle the rhabdo cases without the others. And he was out there telling the financial press that Baycol was going to cost Bayer $50 billion." (Watts did not respond to phone and e-mail messages requesting comment.)

Beck won the trial in Texas. "That was the big turning point," he says. "Plaintiffs lawyers said, 'Why do I want to invest the time and the money litigating when they're willing to settle the rhabdo cases?'" Then, after Bayer won four non-rhabdo trials, including three in Mississippi, plaintiffs lawyers began dropping those cases. With the litigation now winding down, Beck says, Bayer has settled 3,050 Baycol cases for $1.15 billion -- a tiny fraction of what fen-phen, with its failed attempt at a global settlement of all claims, cost Wyeth.

In a series of mass torts since Baycol, defendants have taken a similar approach, settling the strongest cases but refusing to pay for weaker claims, even if that means going to trial. "The paradigm definitely shifted," says plaintiffs lawyer Jenner, a lead counsel in the litigation over Prempro, Wyeth's hormone replacement therapy drug. "Plaintiffs lawyers are not taking cases with nominal injuries. People are not taking a broad inventory of cases." In his litigation, for instance, there are about 5,000 cases -- far fewer than Wyeth faced in the fen-phen litigation -- but almost all of them involve such serious side effects as breast cancer or stroke.

The most prominent example of defense intransigence right now is Merck's proclamation in the Vioxx litigation that it will try every case (24,000 have been filed). "Ten years ago," says plaintiffs lawyer Seeger of New York's Seeger Weiss, "this case would already be over. It wouldn't be dragging on like this. It would be over." Lanier agrees: "If Vioxx predated [fen-phen], you would see Merck more willing to settle instead of trying every case. Instead, they're following the tobacco model: Try every case, take no prisoners." Merck, according to Securities and Exchange Commission filings, has set aside about $1 billion to defend Vioxx cases. It spent $325 million in the first three quarters of 2006, but none of that money went to Vioxx claimants or their lawyers.

Merck counsel Mayer of Hughes Hubbard is circumspect to the point of impenetrability, but he does allow that state tort reforms have factored in Merck's strategy. "They help the courts do justice in individual cases," he says. So far, the judges overseeing Vioxx cases in state and federal courts -- there is not only a federal MDL, but also state court-coordinated proceedings in jurisdictions with busy Vioxx dockets -- have permitted what Mayer calls "a very rational program of trials" involving plaintiffs claiming serious injuries. The company may yet request judicial orders demanding proof of injury from plaintiffs, which could serve to weed out weaker claims. Until then, Merck plans to proceed with trials scheduled in New Jersey, California and Texas. "We believe in our defense," says Mayer. "We believe it's important to put plaintiffs to the test. We're going to continue to take cases as they arise." (It's worth noting that in the long run, tort reform hurts the defense bar as well as the plaintiffs bar, except when mass tort defendants resolve to try lots of cases. "It's in our interest to have a broken system," says Beck. "I have one view of what's good for the country, and another of what's good for me. A system that is slightly out of control is good for me.")

BACK TO THE FUTURE

Perry Weitz of New York's Weitz & Luxenberg, an accomplished mass tort strategist, maintains that all of tort reform's gains can still be undone. "If we get a new president, a new Congress, everything is up for grabs again," he says. In fact, even in the crucible of the Bush administration, the trial lawyers have been remarkably effective at blocking federal legislation intended to curtail litigation. With ATLA's lobbying expertise and their own contributions to Democratic politicians, they defeated attempts to shut down litigation over MTBE, guns and certain vaccines -- and, in the biggest and hardest-fought battle, asbestos. Weitz and a dozen or so other asbestos lawyers fiercely opposed a plan to remove all asbestos cases from the courts and place them instead in an extrajudicial federal trust. The asbestos bar placed its trust in Democratic politicians, to whom it made lavish campaign contributions. In the midterm elections of 2002, with the asbestos issue gaining attention in Congress, nine of the 20 biggest law firm campaign contributors were asbestos firms, according to data compiled by opensecrets.org, the Web site of The Center for Responsive Politics. In 2004, when the asbestos bill was before the Senate, ATLA was once again the largest contributor in the legal industry, with 92 percent of the group's $2.6 million in campaign contributions going to Democrats. Since 2003, according to opensecrets.org, ATLA has spent $13.9 million on federal lobbying, to apparently good end: The Senate killed the asbestos bill earlier this year.

But the success was Pyrrhic -- and it shows why, even though the Democrats have regained much of their political power, they probably won't be the saviors of the trial bar. Weitz and his brethren beat back the asbestos legislation only at the expense of repeated vilification. Congressional asbestos hearings spotlighted the most egregious mass tort litigation excesses, such as the roving X-ray vans that generated tens of thousands of cases on behalf of plaintiffs whose lungs showed evidence of asbestos exposure, but who suffered no impairment. Defendants and insurers blamed plaintiffs lawyers for driving dozens of companies, some of which were far removed from asbestos manufacturing, into bankruptcy, where those same plaintiffs lawyers, running creditors committees, established trusts that even now provide them with a continuing stream of contingency fees. The asbestos debate fed tort reform's campaign against the trial bar, helping make plaintiffs lawyers a big, fat, juicy target.

So as states passed legislation to restrict suits by unimpaired asbestos claimants and jurisdictions with heavy asbestos caseloads shifted unimpaired plaintiffs onto inactive dockets -- essentially accomplishing, piecemeal, what the federal legislation intended -- no one stood up to defend trial lawyers. And even if Democrats backed by the plaintiffs bar win additional state and federal offices, it's impossible to imagine them rushing to reverse tort reform. It requires great political resolve to repeal legislation that has survived judicial review, as much state tort reform has. Mustering that resolve at the behest of trial lawyers is unthinkable. "It used to be that when you walked around, people on the street thought you were their lawyer," says Chris Seeger. "The Republicans have convinced people on the street that we're the bad guys, that they're paying more because of us."

Until trial lawyers win back those people on the street, the people who have deflated mass torts -- lobbyists, legislators, and judges on both the state and federal level -- have no reason to permit mass torts to balloon once again. ATLA is at least, and at last, trying. Last summer the group announced that it was changing its name. Its board had imported a new chief executive officer, Washington, D.C., public relations executive and presidential campaign veteran Jon Haber, and he "got people together to talk about the fight we're in," says Chris Mather, ATLA's vice president of communications and another of the group's new, politically tested advisers. The result of ATLA's soul-searching was not only a new name -- the American Association for Justice -- but also a public relations campaign called "The Fight for Justice."

"We are in a battle for justice," says the relentlessly on-message Mather. "We fight for justice. The other side doesn't." ATLA intends its "Fight for Justice" effort to remind Americans of the rights they've lost through tort reform. "I think people are starting to catch on to the motives of our opponents," says Mather. "The commitment from trial lawyers to fight back has never been greater."

Tort reformers are hardly sitting back and enjoying their gains, though. They're targeting West Virginia, which has proved resistant, so far, to business-backed attempts to change the laws and the judiciary; California, where asbestos cases have migrated and claims under disability statutes are on the rise; and Delaware, where there's talk of an influx of class actions now that the old class action haven, Madison County, Illinois, has been shut down. The relatively sleepy Wisconsin Coalition for Civil Justice Reform was just energized by a series of pro-plaintiff state supreme court rulings, and plans to campaign in nonpartisan judicial elections in April.

The best hope of the plaintiffs bar may lie in, of all places, Texas -- the very state that first made tort reform politically popular. George Christian, the general counsel of the Texas Civil Justice League, says that Texans are beginning to have second thoughts about some of the legislation his group lobbied for (though not enough to suggest rolling back the laws). "To be honest, in the medical area there have been some instances that have made people stop and look," he says. "In the 1980s and 1990s we were able to show that the pendulum had swung too far to the trial lawyers. Has it swung too far in the other direction?"

Plaintiffs lawyers launched the mass tort era by exposing the grave wrongs that defendants inflicted on ordinary people. To revive it, they'll have to show those people that it's still the defendants -- and not they -- who are at fault.

U.S. Report Details Jail's Fatal Risks (DMN)

By Kevin Krause, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, December 13, 2006

Suit threatened over care; Dallas County officials say conditions improving

Conditions in the Dallas County Jail are so dangerous, they have contributed to the death and injury of numerous inmates and placed others at "risk of serious harm," a U.S. Department of Justice report has concluded.

The fact that problems persist at the troubled jail system – the nation's seventh largest – is not new. State inspectors have given the jail a failing grade four times in a row, and a consultant hired by the county warned early last year of its dangerously inadequate health care.

But for the first time, a report has documented multiple incidents of inmates with serious health problems dying or becoming maimed or disabled after failing to receive prompt or adequate medical care.

The report paints a disturbing portrait of the jail as a place where indifference to human suffering is common.

"Most seriously, we found numerous instances where DCJ's [the jail's] mismanagement contributed to preventable deaths, hospitalizations and unnecessary harm," according to the 47-page report made available to county commissioners on Tuesday.

Such deficiencies violate inmates' constitutional rights by failing to provide them with adequate medical and mental health care and safe and sanitary conditions, the report said.

U.S. Assistant Attorney General Wan J. Kim, who signed the report, included a long list of "remedial measures" and said that if the county doesn't address the government's concerns, the U.S. attorney general's office can file a lawsuit against the county 49 days after the report's release.

Dallas County officials say they have been working to correct deficiencies at the jail by putting Parkland Memorial Hospital in charge of jail health, starting construction on a new jail tower and improving sanitation, among other measures.

"It's not as though it's anything that's new to us," said Commissioner John Wiley Price, chairman of the commissioners' jail population committee. "We weren't waiting for them in order to fix some of this."

County Judge Margaret Keliher, who leaves office later this month, did not return calls seeking comment.

Sheriff Lupe Valdez is out of town all week and unavailable, but a spokesman said the Sheriff's Department is working closely with county commissioners and the federal government to fix the problems.

Lack of medical care

The Dallas County Jail, according to the Justice Department report, is a place where requests for medical attention go unanswered, where inmates can have multiple seizures and still not see a doctor. It's a place where one inmate went seven months without seeing a doctor or getting his HIV medication. Other inmates with medical and psychiatric illnesses lay in their own excrement for up to four days before receiving care.

Society's vulnerable fared as bad or worse in the jail, according to the report.

A pregnant woman who complained of continual bleeding could not get help for two months despite her repeated requests. An elderly inmate with severe health problems would probably have died if another inmate hadn't helped him. And an inmate suffering from bipolar disorder was seen repeatedly eating his own feces in March after receiving a "significant lack of continuity of care" during the previous six months.

At the jail, "inmates routinely miss doses of life-sustaining medications," the report said. One inmate with congestive heart failure died after jail staffers failed to give him medication that might have saved his life, it said.

Medical examination rooms were found to be unclean, with hazardous waste on the floors and no available sinks or towels in some rooms. No dental care was being provided when federal inspectors were on site in February.

The Justice Department noted that its findings were consistent with those from a consultant's report that was released as early as February 2005.

The county commissioned the report in late 2004 from Health Management Associates. It was written by Dr. Michael Puisis, a specialist in correctional health.

The Justice Department's civil rights division began looking into medical care, mental health care and sanitation at the jail about a year ago. Federal inspectors visited the jail in February and March. At the time, about 7,770 inmates were housed in the county's various jail facilities, the report said.

"Dallas County knew about it, Dallas County was told about it, and Dallas County never acted upon it," said lawyer David Finn, who is suing the county in federal court on behalf of a former inmate.

'Litany of horror'

Mr. Finn said he was horrified by the Justice Department's report, which he called a "Kafkaesque litany of horror."

"It shows deliberate indifference over a substantial period of time," he said. "The magnitude of the problem may be shocking. The existence of the problem should surprise no one."

The Justice Department report found inadequacies in 13 areas: intake screening; acute care; chronic care; the treatment and management of communicable diseases; access to health care; follow-up care; record keeping; medication administration; medical facilities; specialty care; staffing, training and supervision; quality assurance; and dental care.

Deadly conditions at the jail were first alleged in a civil rights lawsuit filed in 2004 by lawyers for a mentally ill inmate who nearly died after water to his cell was shut off for two weeks. James Mims also didn't receive his medication for two months, which the suit called part of a long-standing pattern of abuse and neglect at the jail. The suit also alleges that mistreatment led to the death of inmate Clarence Lee Grant Jr. in 2003.

The Justice Department's report cited additional cases of neglect involving inmates who later died.

The October 2005 death of an HIV-infected inmate due to pneumonia, for example, could have been prevented if he had been given the antibiotic he was prescribed when he arrived at the jail, the report said. But the inmate didn't receive his medication until 11 days after he was booked in.

A second inmate died from a complication of diabetes the same month, two days after being booked into the jail, the report said. When he arrived at the jail, his blood sugar level was dangerously high, but he received no care from a physician while there, according to the report.

UTMB blamed

Mr. Price said that since Parkland has taken over, significantly more inmates are being transported to the hospital for care. He said the University of Texas Medical Branch, which had a three-year jail management contract, was to blame for most of the deficiencies in medical care.

Parkland, he said, is spending $28 million, twice as much as last year, to improve jail health care. Mr. Price said it was "far-reaching" for the government to blame inmate deaths on the county.

"They took a snapshot. It isn't anything that we weren't already working on," he said. "Everyone is acting as if we were just sitting there and being derelict. That's not the case."

Commissioner Maurine Dickey said she was disappointed that the Justice Department began investigating around the time that Parkland took over.

"They didn't give Parkland a chance to come in and transition," she said.

She said she was horrified by the reports of neglect.

"It's absolutely awful," she said. "At that time, we had suffered from years of neglect. We're paying the price for that now."

Screened by paramedics

Since Parkland took over, paramedics are now screening inmates for health problems at the book-in area, having replaced jail guards with no medical experience.

But the process remains deficient because no medical policies govern it, the Justice Department report said, and because "signs and symptoms of serious illness or contagious disease go unrecorded."

The Justice Department's report also said the jail failed to properly screen for tuberculosis, to contain outbreaks of it or to treat those who contracted it. In March, the backlog for X-rays of such patients reached 891 cases. The same was true for other communicable diseases such as staph infections.

Such inadequate practices pose a risk not only to other inmates and jail staff but also to the Dallas community, given the jail's high turnover, the report said.

The mentally ill fared no better in the Dallas County Jail, according to the report.

One inmate with a 20-year history of schizophrenia didn't receive his prescribed medication for five weeks. Jail staff without mental health training sometimes place inmates in single cells meant for suicidal inmates as punishment, the report said.

Suicide prevention was called "grossly inadequate" without proper training for staff or necessary reviews of suicides.

An inmate who hanged herself in 2003 had submitted a note two days before that said: "I need to see the doctor to get my medicine straightened out. ... I cannot afford to be treated this way! Please help me! I need my medication."

Justice Dept. Report: Dallas Jail Conditions Violate Rights (AP)

By Matt Curry

AP, December 12, 2006

DALLAS — The Dallas County Jail, one of the largest in the country, violates the constitutional rights of inmates by failing to provide adequate medical and mental health care, according to an eyebrow-raising federal report.

Page after page of violations are detailed in a letter from the U.S. Department of Justice, which also found that prisoners are not kept in safe or sanitary conditions at the detention complex, the seventh largest in the United States.

Among the more egregious examples were an HIV-positive prisoner who died in October 2005 from an infection after his antibiotic was withheld 11 days and a woman who hanged herself in January 2003. Her records included an inmate request form she filled out just two days earlier.

"I need to see the doctor to get my medicine straightened out. I am not getting my meds that my doctor faxed prior orders for me, and I brought in the medication myself and paid for it," it said. "I cannot afford to be treated this way! Please help me! I need my medicine."

There is no indication the woman, identified only as M.K., received the medicine.

The 47-page letter, dated Dec. 8 and signed by Assistant Attorney General Wan J. Kim, was addressed to County Judge Margaret Keliher, who was defeated in the November election and leaves office at the end of the month. She did not immediately return a phone message from The Associated Press.

Sheriff Lupe Valdez has not seen the report, said spokesman Raul Reyna, who referred questions to Keliher.

The letter indicates that federal authorities expect to resolve the problems by working with county officials. If they are unable to, they warn that a lawsuit could be filed.

In February 2005, a separate report found that lapses in medical care in the Dallas County jail system resulted in undetected illnesses, excess costs and risks to the public. That report was produced at Keliher's request by Health Management Associates, partly as a response to the near-death of James Mims. The mentally ill inmate's psychiatric medications were withheld for two months.

"If you listen to the local leaders, everything's fine. 'Problem? What problem?'" said Dallas attorney David Finn, who represents Mims in a federal lawsuit. "It's as if they are standing in front of a burning building, and people are jumping to their death from the fourth floor. You can smell the smoke, and you can see the flames, and they're telling the world that there's not a problem at the Dallas County Jail."

In November 2005, the Department of Justice's Civil Rights Division notified the county that it would investigate conditions at the jail.

Accompanied by consultants in correctional medical care, mental care and environmental health and safety, the office conducted its onsite inspections in February and March.

The report lists numerous examples of inadequate care and screening.

A prisoner identified as Q.S. was transferred to the hospital and died of alcohol withdrawal in December 2004. He had been admitted to the jail a week earlier with a history of alcohol withdrawal and seizures during the withdrawal, the report showed.

Within four of five days, he became disoriented, developed a fever and had an elevated blood pressure. The report says he was kept in the facility without physician or nursing care and no monitoring of his vital signs.

He was later discovered lying in his feces, but it took an additional five hours before he was taken to the hospital, where he died.

A juvenile identified as O.H. was taken to Parkland Memorial Hospital in June 2005 to receive sutures. He received no follow-up and was forced to remove them himself.

The investigation found several problems related to suicides.

"Due to a lack of training, correctional staff are ill-prepared to handle a suicide in progress, including how to cut down a hanging victim and employ other first aid measures," the report says. "Finally, contrary to generally accepted practice, there is no administrative review following a suicide or a suicide attempt to identify what could have been done to prevent the incident."

Lobbying The Jury (NYT)

The New York Times, December 13, 2006

We are disappointed that the Supreme Court has upheld a defendant's conviction even though spectators at his trial put prejudicial material in sight of the jury. Fortunately, the court made clear that its ruling this week was based only on the unusual way the issue was raised, and that it was not deciding when this kind of politicking from the audience violated the Constitution.

The decision should prompt courts to think about how to ensure that courtroom atmosphere does not deprive defendants of a fair trial.

At Mathew Musladin's murder trial in California, the dead man's family sat in the front of the spectators' gallery wearing buttons with their relative's picture. The key issue at trial was which of the two men was the aggressor in a fight, and the photographs were essentially an argument that the deceased was the innocent victim.

Mr. Musladin was convicted in state court, but a federal appeals court overturned his conviction. A federal court can do this only if it finds that a state court violated "clearly established federal law." In this case, the appeals court decided the state court had, since the Supreme Court had ruled in an analogous case that forcing a defendant to stand trial in prison garb sent a message of guilt to the jury and thus violated his right to a fair trial.

The Supreme Court upheld Mr. Musladin's conviction, reversing the appeals court. It ruled that the court was wrong about there being "clearly established federal law" in this area. It decided, not all that convincingly, that the prison garb case was different from Mr. Musladin's case because the government, not private citizens, was sending the prejudicial message.

The Supreme Court emphasized that it was not deciding whether photographs of the kind worn at Mr. Musladin's trial violated the Constitution; that remains an open question. Justice Anthony Kennedy, writing separately, advised courts to consider when spectators infringe on a defendant's fair-trial rights.

Justice Kennedy is right. A victim's family has every right to attend a trial. But judges must ensure that criminal defendants are judged on the evidence, and nothing more. If Mr. Musladin's case is at all typical, it suggests that many courts do not have clear, uniform rules about what sort of spectator actions are impermissible. Court systems around the country should take Justice Kennedy's advice and set appropriate standards that preserve defendants' right to a fair trial.

A Lawsuit Threat Is Gone And Christmas Trees Return (NYT)

By William Yardley

SEATTLE, Dec. 12 — Fourteen Christmas trees that were abruptly sent to storage on Friday were back on display Tuesday in the main terminal of Seattle-Tacoma International Airport, neither taller nor brighter than they had been before but clearly drawing more attention.

"I saw people taking pictures," said Mark Reis, director of Seattle-Tacoma International Airport, referring to the largest tree, which received finishing touches on Tuesday and is on display in the airy south terminal. "I guess they wanted to say they saw THE tree. I guess it's gotten its level of notoriety."

On Friday, faced with the threat of a lawsuit when it refused to add a menorah to its annual holiday display, the airport removed all 14 trees overnight.

The move, intended to avoid controversy, stoked it instead.

By early Saturday, television news crews were filming the untrimming, and a holiday-season debate over religion and free speech inevitably took shape. At Chabad-Lubavitch in Seattle, the Jewish Orthodox educational group that had asked the airport to add the menorah, hate messages soon flooded e-mail inboxes. The group, which had never asked for the trees to be removed, was accused by some of trying to steal Christmas. It quickly dropped its talk of a lawsuit and joined those asking the airport to bring back the trees. That, the airport said, freed it to put them back up.

"By no means did we want to take away any religious symbols or trees from any other culture," said Elazar Bogomilsky, the Chabad rabbi who is listed as the lead plaintiff on a draft lawsuit that has not been filed.

The draft suit names the Port of Seattle, which runs the airport, as the lead defendant.

"The port went ahead and made this very poor decision," Rabbi Bogomilsky said. "They said, 'Whoa, we can't deal with this.' "

Mr. Reis said, "The rabbi never said, 'We want to take the trees down.' That was purely our reaction when we felt we'd been put in an untenable position."

There is disagreement over how it came to this. An airport architect who has been involved with Chabad had asked to add the menorah to the display.

Rabbi Bogomilsky said his group was initially told that a menorah could be displayed, "then all of a sudden there was a no, and then zero dialogue, just a stone wall between the port and us."

Mr. Reis said he rejected the idea because the airport had long ago revised its holiday display to be what he called secular.

"It's just lights and snowflakes," he said, and "holiday trees."

Adding a menorah could mean having to add symbols of other religions, and that could give the display unintended religious meaning, he said. "If you were going to add one, then where do you stop?" he said.

The draft of the lawsuit cites a 1989 decision by the United States Supreme Court upholding the dual display of the menorah and Christmas trees in public places as expression that is protected under the First Amendment. The draft suit says the plaintiffs would suffer irreparable harm if they are not allowed to display the menorah by Friday, Dec. 15, because Hanukkah begins at sundown that day.

Rabbi Bogomilsky said the threat of a lawsuit was meant only to show seriousness. "It wasn't about suing; we never filed anything, and made it very clear that we are not going to file," he said. "We said that we have the option. We said we're getting close to Hanukkah and we need to know what your decision is, and they jumped the gun and said, 'We can't deal with it, we're going to remove everything.' "

Mr. Reis said: "We ended up with a demand that we make a decision in X amount of time or face a lawsuit. We really did not have the time to step back and make a decision about what is the right ecumenical thing to do."

He added, "I think there's no question that we all regret the atmospherics that developed over this whole issue." He said the airport authority would reconsider the issue next year.

Robert S. Jacobs, director for the Pacific Northwest region of the Anti-Defamation League, said the airport, as an entry point to the Northwest, "missed a great opportunity to demonstrate to the entire world the sort of pluralistic, cosmopolitan city Seattle has become."

ANTITRUST:

UAL, Continental Discuss Merger As AirTran Presses Bid For Midwest (WSJ)

By Susan Carey, Melanie Trottman And Dennis K. Berman

The Wall Street Journal, December 13, 2006

The long-awaited consolidation of the airline industry is heating up, with UAL Corp. and Continental Airlines Inc. holding talks on a possible merger and another carrier emerging as the target of an unsolicited takeover offer.

UAL, parent of United Airlines, and Continental have been engaged in exploratory talks on a business combination for several months, but the discussions have taken on new urgency since US Airways Group Inc. made a hostile bid for Delta Air Lines Inc. four weeks ago, according to people familiar with the matter.

Among the industry's smaller players, AirTran Holdings Inc. is poised to launch an offer for Midwest Air Group Inc., say people familiar with the plan, signaling that consolidation pressure has extended beyond the industry's behemoths.

Airlines outside the U.S. also are attracting more takeover interest. Australia's Qantas Airways Ltd. last night rejected a takeover bid of roughly $8.6 billion from a group of investors that includes private-equity firm Texas Pacific Group and Macquarie Bank Ltd. of Australia. (See related article1.)

The consolidation frenzy comes as the industry rebounds financially after a severe downturn that began five years ago. Airlines have since learned to cope with costlier fuel and show discipline in adding capacity. As a result, carriers generally are expected to do better financially in 2007. Mergers could help them further reduce overhead and save money by eliminating overlapping routes.

For consumers, that would likely mean higher fares and more-crowded aircraft as more seats were taken out of service. Consumers already are paying more to fly than they did during the depth of the industry's troubles, thanks to steady fare increases put through to cover skyrocketing fuel prices and service cutbacks on unprofitable routes.

The preliminary talks on merging United Airlines and Continental, the nation's second- and fifth-largest airlines, respectively, have run into several vexing issues, including what to do about the "golden share" that Northwest Airlines Corp. holds in Continental, which could complicate any deal Continental might attempt, the people familiar with the matter said.

Northwest's golden share is a special voting series of Continental preferred stock it owns in connection with its marketing alliance with Continental, which runs through 2025. Northwest could use those shares to block a merger of Continental with another major airline -- if the combination required a vote by Continental shareholders. Even with the golden share in place, however, Continental could buy another airline without interference from Northwest if that transaction didn't require Continental shareholders' approval.

ROUTE MAPS

· United Airlines3

A deal between UAL and Continental isn't certain or imminent, people familiar with the matter said. Other issues that would need to be settled, including how the transaction would be structured and which management team would run the combined company. And the combination could also raise antitrust issues. But the preliminary talks are another strong signal that the industry is nearing the culmination of a restructuring that began in the wake of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

People who advise the industry say that all the big airlines are either keeping a close eye on the potential consolidation moves or are already in early discussions with one or more competitor. While most carriers would prefer the status quo because mergers are expensive, complex and have a poor track record, they also worry about being left behind in a game that increasingly resembles musical chairs.

UAL, keeping its options open, also has reached out to Delta management and Delta's creditors committee, knowledgeable people said. The pitch: If Delta is going to be forced by the market and its creditors into a merger instead of emerging from bankruptcy-court protection as a standalone company, UAL might be a better fit than hostile suitor US Airways.

People familiar with the situation said UAL made contact with the airline recently.

Meanwhile, AirTran in the next few days is expected to publicly disclose a recent $200 million offer made to Midwest's management. The proposed deal would award Midwest's shares $11.25 each in cash and AirTran stock, representing a 24% premium to where the company's shares traded yesterday. AirTran has been pursuing Midwest for over a year, people familiar with the matter say, but was rejected in its most recent approach earlier this month.

In going public with its bid, AirTran would be putting pressure on Midwest, which has quietly built a business around a few hubs, notably Milwaukee and Kansas City, Mo. Midwest has won customer plaudits for its business-class seating arrangements and chocolate-chip cookies, which are baked and served in transit.

AirTran is a discount full-service carrier that operates mainly through its Orlando, Fla., and Atlanta hubs. The airline, which competes along the East Coast and through the Midwest, has a market capitalization of $1.16 billion.

AirTran estimates that it could wring about $60 million in cost savings via an acquisition, according to the people familiar with the matter, which represents nearly one-third of Midwest's current market value. The hope, these people say, is to utilize AirTran's young aircraft fleet more efficiently along Midwest's routes, while potentially sparing Midwest the cost of purchasing new airplanes. AirTran posted gross margins last year of 38.6%, compared with Midwest's 32.5%, according to data compiled by FactSet Research Systems Inc.

Midwest, however, appears unwilling to cooperate so far. And AirTran runs the risk of putting its target in play, potentially sending it into the hands of a bigger and richer competitor such as Southwest Airlines Co.

As for the courtship of the industry's giants, Glenn Tilton, UAL's chairman and chief executive, declined to disclose any details of his company's merger aspirations yesterday at an investor conference in suburban Chicago. Instead, he reiterated his long-held belief that consolidation is overdue and said UAL will be "attentive to opportunities as they present themselves" to benefit shareholders.

Mr. Tilton and his executives sidestepped multiple questions about consolidation. But the CEO tantalized the group of about 75 investors and analysts by saying UAL is "not waiting for opportunities to come to us." He also observed that "there is a tremendous amount of cash in the marketplace today, waiting to be put to good use." UAL, which emerged from Chapter 11 bankruptcy proceedings in February, made overtures to both Delta and Continental during its bankruptcy case but nothing came of them.

Airline stocks and the bonds of Delta and Northwest, both operating under Chapter 11 protection, have soared since US Airways offered to acquire Delta for $8.5 billion in cash and stock. Investors believe that if US Airways -- or another airline, either in a "white knight" role or through an auction process -- prevailed in buying Delta, there could be a second transaction as the biggest airlines try to grab market share and avoid being left behind in the race to grow.

US Airways' shares jumped after the company bid for Delta. The stock traded down 3.4% at $59.46 yesterday, near the top of its 52-week range and up 17% from its price before the bid. Continental's shares have jumped 13% since Dec. 1, "with consolidation the obvious catalyst, in our view," said J.P. Morgan analyst Jamie Baker, in a research report.

Continental shares retreated somewhat yesterday on the airline's downbeat fourth-quarter guidance, causing the shares to trade down 5.6% to $42.88. But they remain near the top of their 52-week range. UAL's stock also is trading near its 52-week high, closing down 2.9% at $43.23 yesterday.

The rumor mill began churning anew last week when Northwest disclosed in a bankruptcy-court filing that it is seeking to hire boutique investment bank Evercore Partners Inc. as its merger-and-acquisitions adviser. Doug Steenland, Northwest's CEO, told employees this week that "because in the current industry environment, where there's already one active proposal out there, things can change quickly, and it's important that we have ongoing access to advisers who are experienced in these sorts of things." But he stressed that Northwest intends to step out of Chapter 11 as an independent company.

Then a stock analyst distributed a note earlier this week speculating that UAL, which months ago engaged Goldman Sachs Group Inc. as its M&A adviser, would announce a deal with Continental at its investor day conference. Adding to the frenzy, Delta is scheduled to file its proposed plan of reorganization with the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in New York early next week. Those documents are intended to back Delta management's position that the airline and its creditors would be better off if Delta remains independent, at least for now.

If Delta's creditors don't agree that the standalone plan is more attractive than a merger, analysts expect other carriers to move in on Delta, seeking to displace US Airways as a potential acquirer. If UAL is among them, that could leave Continental, whose flexibility is hampered by Northwest's golden share, with fewer options, one of which could be a merger with Northwest.

People familiar with the UAL-Continental discussions said the airlines' respective CEOs, advisers and bankers have talked periodically in recent months. Larry Kellner, Continental's CEO, told employees after the US Airways bid for Delta that he would prefer to stay independent if the industry stays as it is, but is prepared to do what is necessary if the landscape changes.

People familiar with the Houston-based airline's strategy said Continental favors the status quo because it believes it's better-positioned than its peers in terms of its popularity with business travelers, ability to command higher fares, strong hubs in Houston and Newark and extensive routes to Europe and Latin America. It also has a seasoned management team that is respected in the industry.

But if others start merging, Continental would become even smaller by comparison. Size and scope -- not customer service -- are key when it comes to winning corporate travel contracts that boost revenue. So Mr. Kellner is entertaining talks with UAL despite numerous concerns, said one person knowledgeable about the matter.

United for years has admired Continental for its revenue premium, good service and strong presence in the big New York market. Analysts don't see much route overlap between the two carriers, with United dominant in the Midwest, West and Asia. But the combination would vault the pair to the largest airline by traffic, larger even than a combined Delta-US Airways, which could prompt intense regulatory scrutiny.

United And Continental Discussing Possible Merger (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin And Jeff Bailey

The New York Times, December 13, 2006

United Airlines is holding preliminary talks to merge with Continental Airlines in a huge deal that would further reshape the struggling airline industry, people involved in the negotiations said tonight.

The discussions, though far from complete, recently picked up pace following US Airways' bid last month to buy Delta Air Lines for about $8 billion, these people said.

US Airways' proposal, promising $1.65 billion a year in savings by combining with Delta, has helped add urgency to carriers' interests in merging.

A United spokeswoman, Jean Medina, and a Continental spokesman, David Messing, each declined to comment.

Any deal between the two airlines is far from imminent. Continental and United executives are watching the US Airways and Delta situation to see how it might play with antitrust regulators. Delta is expected to file its plan to exit bankruptcy proceedings next week, following a flurry of meetings scheduled for later this week among Delta creditors and others.

Analysts have long favored a combination of United's Asian routes and heavy coverage of the Western United States with Continental's Latin American and European routes and its large and highly profitable hub in Newark.

At today's close of the stock market, Continental's market capitalization was about $4 billion and United's was about $5 billion.

United's chief executive, Glenn Tilton, and Continental's chief executive, Larry Kellner, have met in person to discuss a combination, a person with knowledge of the talks said. Today, however, Mr. Kellner was in Tel Aviv on business, Continental had informed its employees earlier this week.

Any effort by the two to merge would be complicated by an agreement Continental has with Northwest Airlines. The agreement could allow Northwest to block certain merger transactions involving Continental, but could allow Continental more freedom to enter into a combination if it was the acquiring party and approval of its shareholders was not required.

Also, if Northwest entered into a merger, it would lose its blocking power over Continental.

Continental, United Discussing Merger (WP)

By Del Quentin Wilber

The Washington Post, December 13, 2006

Continental and United airlines have been discussing a potential merger -- the latest in a series of signs that major carriers are seeking to reshape the recovering industry.

The talks have involved top executives of each company and have touched on the potential structure and shape of a combined carrier, industry sources familiar with the discussions said yesterday.

Those sources, who spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to discuss the potential deal, said the discussions intensified last month after US Airways Group announced an unsolicited $8.7 billion bid to merge with Delta Air Lines, which is in bankruptcy protection.

Chicago-based United is the nation's fourth-largest carrier in terms of passenger traffic and is strong in the Midwest and Asia. It has major hubs in Denver, Chicago and at Washington's Dulles International Airport. Its parent company, UAL, has a market capitalization of about $4.8 billion.

Houston-based Continental is the nation's sixth-largest carrier and has major hubs in Houston, Cleveland and Newark. It has strong links to Europe, the Caribbean and Latin America. It has a market capitalization of about $3.9 billion.

Representatives of each airline declined to comment. A merger could face a number of obstacles, including a review by federal regulators. Also, Northwest Airlines has an agreement with Continental that in many cases would give Northwest the power to block a merger.

United's chief executive, Glenn F. Tilton, said in an interview last week that he would consider a serious merger possibility but declined to discuss any potential deals, including one with Continental.

Continental chief executive Larry Kellner has said he wants the airline to remain an independent carrier but would not be against a merger if the rest of the industry landscape changed substantially.

Airline executives have been speculating in recent months about the possibility of combining operations of the nation's six traditional carriers -- American, Continental, United and US Airways, as well as Delta and Northwest, both in bankruptcy protection.

Just last week, Northwest asked a bankruptcy judge for permission to hire financial advisers to help it plan for the possibility of a merger or acquisition.

Analysts and executives believe that mergers in the airline industry could benefit carriers by allowing them to cut overhead costs while expanding more lucrative routes. US Airways chief executive Douglas Parker has said his proposed deal with Delta would allow him to cut flights and overhead, saving up to $1.6 billion a year.

More partnerships might also be on the horizon, even among low-cost carriers. The Wall Street Journal reported on its Web site last night that AirTran Holdings was considering an offer for Midwest Air Group.

Qantas Buyout May Be Discussed Despite Rebuff (WSJ)

By Kate Linebaugh In Hong Kong And Bill Lindsay In Sydney, Australia

The Wall Street Journal, December 13, 2006

A takeover bid for Australia's Qantas Airways Ltd. of 10.9 billion Australian dollars (US$8.6 billion) from a consortium of local and international investment companies was quickly rejected by the airline's board, but negotiations on terms of a deal may just be starting.

The consortium -- Texas Pacific Group of the U.S. and Macquarie Bank Ltd. of Australia, as well as Australia's Allco Equity Partners Ltd., Allco Finance Group Ltd. and Canadian private-equity firm Onex Group -- has bid A$5.50 (US$4.32) a Qantas share in its takeover proposal, the airline said.

The airline's nonexecutive directors called the terms of the proposal unacceptable. Qantas said the proposal involved a number of "complex conditions," unanimous support from Qantas directors and a breakup fee. The consortium, which calls itself Airline Partners Australia, said it was considering a response.

Shares of Qantas, which hit a seven-year high Monday in Sydney, fell in early trading Wednesday, down 4.6% to A$4.99.

The market expects talks to continue. "I wouldn't read it as an outright rejection," said Troy Angus, a portfolio manager at BT Funds Management. "We think this is still just early stages. They haven't rejected the bid outright. They have just said that some of the terms are unacceptable."

The bid -- in the making since the Australian flag carrier late last month confirmed it had received the "confidential and incomplete" approach -- suggests an expanding target for private equity, a feverish period of deal making for Texas Pacific and the continuing attractiveness of the Australian market.

The Australian government has said it won't block a takeover of Qantas as long as the deal is structured to meet foreign-ownership and shareholder limits, set as part of the 1995 privatization of the Sydney-based airline. Those limits cap total foreign ownership at 49%, and no single foreign investor can hold more than 25% of the shares. The bidding consortium said it has kept foreign ownership below 40% with no single investor above 15%. Macquarie bank has less than 15% to avoid a conflict of interest with its airport holdings, while Allco has a 45% stake through its two entities.

The choice of such a cyclical industry is an unusual one for Macquarie, an Australian investment bank known for chasing multibillion-dollar deals involving assets that generate a steady stream of cash. Airlines are in a volatile sector that has felt the pain of stiff competition and a prolonged increase in jet-fuel prices.

Still, Qantas has remained profitable, unlike many global rivals. Last week, for the second time in little more than a month, the company raised its profit estimate for the year ending in June. It said it expects profit before tax to rise 25% to 30% from the previous year. Qantas also has low debt and units such as terminals, freight, maintenance and catering that could be spun off or put into funds.

Antitrust Raid On German Power Groups (FT)

By Tobias Buck And Timm Kraegenow

Financial Times, December 13, 2006

Germany's four largest power groups – Eon, RWE, EnBW and Vattenfall – were raided by European antitrust officials on Tuesday, raising fresh concerns about the state of competition in the region's energy market.

It was the second time in less than six months that the European Commission ordered inspections at RWE, and the third time it searched Eon's offices. The earlier raids were carried out in May in connection with a separate inquiry – which means Germany's leading power groups are currently the target of two potentially damaging antitrust probes.

The new case against Eon, RWE, EnBW and Vattenfall is understood to focus on allegations that the four groups have tried to keep electricity prices in the German market artificially high – for example by lowering the output of certain power stations. The companies are also suspected of trying to freeze out new rivals by delaying the construction of new transmission infrastructure, people familiar with the case said.

In addition to the groups' troubles on the antitrust front, the Commission is currently drafting a proposal designed to curb the market power of integrated energy groups such as Eon and RWE. Brussels is expected to suggest next month that groups that are both energy suppliers and owners of crucial infrastructure, such as pipelines and grids, must separate their two interests more clearly than at present.

The EU competition watchdog would only say on Tuesday that it had reason to believe that the four companies' behaviour in the electricity market may have broken antitrust rules. It refused to specify its allegations and said merely that they were suspected of operating a cartel, or possibly abusing a dominant market position. Both violations can ultimately be punished with antitrust fines of up to 10 per cent of a group's annual worldwide turnover.

The Commission stressed that the raids did not mean the companies were guilty. In any case, it usually takes the Brussels investigators at least two to three years to finish a competition probe.

The Commission declined to identify the four companies but Eon, RWE, EnBW and Vattenfall all confirmed they had been raided and pledged full co-operation with the inquiry.

The raids provide fresh evidence of the Commission's determination to crack open once and for all the EU's markets for electricity and gas. Neelie Kroes, the EU competition commissioner, warned in February that her officials had uncovered evidence of severe market distortions, and warned that individual probes would follow soon.

Johnson & Johnson Cleared To Buy Pfizer Consumer Unit (BLOOM)

By James Rowley And Shannon Pettypiece

Bloomberg, December 13, 2006

Dec. 12 (Bloomberg) -- Johnson & Johnson won U.S. antitrust approval to complete its $16.6 billion purchase of Pfizer Inc.'s consumer health-care unit on condition the companies complete plans to divest treatments for heartburn, itching, sleeplessness and diaper rash.

The Federal Trade Commission said in a statement that Johnson & Johnson must sell three of Pfizer's over-the-counter drugs: Zantac H-2 for heartburn, Cortizone for itching and the Unisom sleep-aid medication.

The all-cash transaction will give Pfizer the funds to acquire new products and repurchase shares. For J&J, the deal expands its consumer operations by more than a third to $13 billion a year in sales, or almost a quarter of its overall revenue last year. The companies said in October that they planned to sell the brands in order to get regulatory clearance.

Pfizer's consumer unit, which employs about 7,000 people, had $3.88 billion in 2005 sales.

Johnson & Johnson must also sell its Balmex diaper-rash treatment, the FTC said. The FTC said the divestitures would preserve competition in the markets for over-the-counter products regularly used by consumers.

Two Biggest Makers

Pfizer and Johnson & Johnson are the two largest U.S. makers of over-the-counter H-2 blockers, which limit acid production in the stomach to treat ulcers and heartburn, anti-itch cream and over-the-counter drugs for sleeplessness. Without the sale of Pfizer's Zantac H-2 to Boehringer Ingelheim GmbH, J&J would have controlled 70 percent of that market, the FTC said.

Boehringer Ingelheim agreed in October to pay $509.5 million for Zantac, which had about $132 million in sales in the U.S. last year. Chattem Inc. also said in October it would pay $410 million for Cortizone, Balmex, Kaopectate and Unisom.

The other brands Johnson & Johnson will acquire include Benadryl antihistamine, Neosporin antibiotic, Rolaids antacids, Visine eyedrops and the e.p.t. pregnancy test.

Johnson & Johnson's consumer line includes the Immodium diarrhea treatment, Band-Aids, Mylanta antacids and St. Joseph's aspirin. The 120-year-old company is also the world's largest maker of medical devices and the second-largest U.S. maker of prescription drugs behind Pfizer.

J&J's last attempt at a major acquisition was its failed offer of $24.2 billion for Guidant Corp., the No. 2 maker of implantable electronic heart devices. Boston Scientific Corp. prevailed in a bidding war and purchased Guidant in April for $27.5 billion.

Schneider Says APC Deal Clears US Antitrust Hurdle (MRKTWTCH)

PARIS (MarketWatch) -- French electrical equipment manufacturer Schneider SA (12197.FR) said Tuesday that its planned merger with American Power Conversion Corp. (APCC) doesn't face further antitrust review from U.S. authorities now that the mandatory waiting period under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act of 1976 has ended.

As reported at the end of October, Schneider is offering to acquire APC for $31 a share in cash, a deal that values APC at EUR6.1 billion.

Schneider said the transaction is expected to close in the first quarter of 2007 and is subject to customary conditions including approval by APC's shareholders.

A special meeting of Schneider shareholders has been scheduled for Jan. 16 to vote on the proposed merger.

Schneider and APC have filed documents with the European Commission to begin the antitrust regulatory review process in the European Union.

Pricing Of Flat Screens Is Under Inquiry (NYT)

By Choe Sang-Hun

The New York Times, December 13, 2006

SEOUL, South Korea, Dec. 12 — Antitrust authorities here and in the United States and Japan have started an investigation into price-fixing allegations against the world's two leading makers of flat-panel displays, Samsung Electronics and LG.Philips LCD, officials said on Tuesday, shaking an industry already burdened by falling prices.

Samsung and LG.Philips — the world's largest and second-largest makers of liquid-crystal displays — confirmed on Tuesday that they were being investigated by the antitrust authorities in the three countries on suspicion of anticompetitive practices in 2003 and 2004.

The European Commission confirmed on Tuesday that it, too, had opened a price-fixing investigation into companies that build flat screens. The European Union's executive body said that it sent formal requests for information on Friday to an undisclosed number of companies that make thin-film-transistor and liquid-crystal displays. After LG.Philips, a joint venture involving LG Electronics of Seoul and Royal Philips Electronics of Amsterdam, said that it was under investigation, its share price fell nearly 8 percent before ending the day down 4.2 percent. Investors feared that the company's legal costs, and provisions for possible penalties, might increase its losses in the coming quarters, analysts said. Samsung shares dropped 0.7 percent.

The news was yet another setback for Samsung. The investigation is the first in the manufacturing of liquid-crystal displays, an industry led by Samsung, but the company is already facing another price-fixing investigation in the United States involving its main product line, computer memory chips.

The investigation comes at an awkward time for L.C.D. makers; prices plummeted in the first half of 2006 because of supply gluts. Except for Samsung, which often uses price wars to beat its competitors, the major players had to cut production to reduce inventories.

"This is very bad news for an industry where companies are suffering either falling profits or fear growing deficits," said Michael Min, a senior industry analyst at Korea Investment and Securities. "The expression that comes to mind to describe their situation is 'misery loves company.' "

The scope of the investigation into Samsung and LG.Philips remains unclear. Officials at the Korea Fair Trade Commission, Samsung and LG.Philips declined to discuss details.

But analysts here said they thought that the regulators might be focusing on whether L.C.D. makers colluded on prices and supplies in 2003 and 2004 when the industry was in an upturn.

They also speculated that the inquiry might be a coordinated among antitrust bodies in Japan, South Korea and the United States.

The European investigation is focusing on specific markets, including personal computer and laptop screens, televisions and displays used in mobile phones, digital cameras, Global Positioning System receivers and other hand-held devices. The commission said it had been in contact with other antitrust authorities. No inspections have been carried out in Europe, the commission said, because the companies operate outside the European Union.

Panel Makers Facing Prices Probe (FT)

By Song Jung-a In Seoul, Kathrin Hille In Taipei And Leo Lewis,in Tokyo

Financial Times, December 13, 2006

Authorities in the US, Europe, Japan and South Korea have launched an investigation into alleged price fixing by the world's leading manufacturers of LCD panels.

The investigation is a fresh blow to an industry struggling to cope with falling prices and toomuch supply.

Samsung Electronics, LG Philips LCD and AU Optronics, the world's top LCD panelmakers, all said yesterday they were being investigated for "possible anti-competitive conduct".

Sharp, Japan's largest LCD panelmaker, said it had received summons from regulators at home and in the US during the weekend.

Sanyo Epson, another Japanese LCD panelmaker, and Chi Mei Optoelec-tronics, Taiwan's second largest flat panelmaker, said they had been in contact with regulators, although neither would say if they were being investigated.

Regulators in Korea and Japan declined to reveal any details of their investigation. But one industry executive familiar with the investigation said regulators were examining potential price fixing in 2003 and 2004, rather than recent behaviour.

Meanwhile, the European Commission yesterday said it had asked a numberof LCD makers for information and added that it was trying to find out whether the companies involved were operating a price-fixing cartel.

Since the first quarter of 2004 panel prices have fallen sharply.

According to Lehman Brothers estimates, since early 2004 the average price of a 32-inch LCD panel has fallen almost 70 per cent, from more than $1,100 to about $350.

However, between the first quarter of 2003 and the first quarter of 2004the average price of the same panel fell by just15 per cent.

All of the companies that yesterday admitted to being investigated pledged full co-operation with the ongoing investigation.

In Korea, the LCD makers face fines of up to 10 per cent of the sales generated from price-fixing, while under European competition rules, members of a cartel can be fined up to 10 per cent of their global annual turnover.

Asian Stocks Fall In U.S., Led By AU Optronics; BHP Shares Drop (BLOOM)

By Lu Wang

Bloomberg, December 13, 2006

Dec. 12 (Bloomberg) -- Asian stocks trading in the U.S. fell, led by makers of liquid-crystal displays, after AU Optronics Corp. said it is being probed in Japan and the U.S. as part of an antitrust investigation.

The Bank of New York Co.'s Asia ADR Index, which tracks the region's American depositary receipts, slipped 0.3 percent to 152.04. The index recovered part of its loss after the Federal Reserve left the benchmark U.S. interest rate at 5.25 percent for a fourth straight meeting.

AU Optronics slumped 56 cents to $12.76. The world's third- largest LCD maker said its Japan and U.S. units are being probed. Regulators in the U.S., South Korea, Japan and Europe are investigating companies including Samsung Electronics Co. and LG.Philips LCD Co. for alleged price fixing in the $69 billion industry.

LG.Philips, the No. 2 LCD maker, slipped 51 cents to $14.06. Shares of bigger rival Samsung weren't traded in the U.S.

BHP Billiton led a decline in commodity shares as prices of oil, copper and gold dropped. Crude oil fell for a third day on forecasts of warm U.S. weather that would reduce heating-fuel demand over most of the next month. Copper slipped as U.S. inventories of the metal rose to an eight-month high.

BHP, the world's largest mining company, fell 62 cents to $39.78. PetroChina Co., the country's biggest oil producer, declined $1.79 to $130.95. Santos Ltd., an Australian oil and gas company, fell 82 cents to $30.42.

Nikkei 225 Stock Average futures expiring in March were at 16,685 in Chicago, compared with 16,660 in Singapore and 16,670 in Osaka.

Specter's Antitrust Battle Against NFL Could Affect Cable And TV Mergers (LAW)

By Bill McConnell

The Deal

Sen. Arlen Specter, who for a few more weeks is chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, says the time has come for Congress to blitz the National Football League's exemption from antitrust laws. Side effects of such a move could affect mergers in the cable and satellite television business.

In a hearing Dec. 7, Specter said he plans to introduce legislation next year that would eliminate the NFL's ability to negotiate television contracts on behalf of the entire league. Without the exemption, each team would have to negotiate its own TV contract to avoid violating antitrust prohibitions on collusion among competitors in a business.

"I will introduce legislation in the next session to take away the antitrust exemption from the NFL," Specter said.

Specter said the NFL has abused the exemption by extracting high-priced TV contracts and allowing team owners to bully local governments for new stadium funding. Specter said he's not ready to remove other pro sports' antitrust exemptions.

How much weight his plan will carry in the upcoming Democratic-controlled Congress is unclear. The Pennsylvania Republican will lose his Judiciary Committee chairmanship in January. Incoming Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., has questioned the wisdom of sports antitrust exemptions but the issue is thorny for Sen. Herb Kohl, D-Minn., who is in line to run the panel's Antitrust Subcommittee. Kohl owns the National Basketball Association's Milwaukee Bucks.

Applying the full force of antitrust law to professional football would likely invalidate the NFL's exclusive contract with satellite television's DirecTV for carriage of the NFL Sunday Ticket, the largest package of NFL games and a big draw for football fans that don't live in the same market as their favorite teams. Cable operators have demanded access to the Sunday Ticket for years but to no avail.

Eliminating the exemption also could reduce the company's leverage to demand steep compensation from cable and satellite carriers that want to carry the league's 24-hour, seven-days-a-week NFL channel.

Control of the Sunday Ticket and other exclusive sports programming has been an issue in television industry mergers recently.

In 2003, cable operators raised the Sunday Ticket dispute in News Corp.'s acquisition of DirecTV. Ultimately the Federal Communications Commission did not impose mandates on that programming package, but did require News Corp. and DirecTV to enter commercial arbitration to resolve disputes with cable operators over access to News Corp.-owned broadcast stations and Fox regional sports networks. This condition lasts until 2010.

Sports programming was also an issue in this year's carve-up of Adelphia Communications by Time Warner Cable and Comcast, which the FCC and the Federal Trade Commission approved.

The main issue in the FTC's portion of the review was whether the expansion of Time Warner and Comcast geographic "clusters" of cable systems would give them too much power to dictate the prices satellite TV providers, telephone companies, and small cable "overbuilders" would pay for regional cable sports networks.

Access to sports networks is a big deal because it is considered "must have" programming for any pay-TV service.

Competitors warned that the added clustering the deal would allow would increase the ability of the two largest cable operators in the U.S. to strike exclusive deals with regional sports networks or charge extravagant prices for ones they own directly.

Although Philadelphia-based Comcast has long denied DirecTV access to its Philadelphia area sports network, the FTC's three-Republican majority, backed by the agency's Bureau of Competition and staff economists, found no evidence that the merger would allow either cable carrier to impose similar restrictions on their sports nets in other parts of the country.

Comcast's Philadelphia SportsNet is unique because it takes advantage of a loophole in cable program access rules to deny access to satellite carriers. Under current law, cable operators must lease most in-house channels to competing TV distributors. The mandate, implemented as part of the Cable Act of 1992, applies to all channels transmitted to cable franchises via satellite -- a transmission method cable operators use for the overwhelming majority of channels. Philadelphia SportsNet is delivered to franchises via terrestrial lines.

The terrestrial exemption was created to entice cable operators to develop local oriented channels.

DirecTV, small cable operators and public utilities trying to enter the TV distribution business have been lobbying to eliminate the exemption for years. "It its crucial for Congress to remove the so-called 'terrestrial loophole," said James Baller, senior principal of Baller Herbst Law Group and a adviser to public and private providers of communications services that compete against cable. Given the enormous investments required to build high-capacity communications networks, "certainty about access to critical video programming" those lines would carry is essential to justify the expense.

But Comcast executive vice president David Cohen said Philadelphia SportsNet is just the sort of programming Congress wanted to encourage when the terrestrial exemption was created. Eliminating the NFL's antitrust exemption is a preferable way to promote access to sports programming, he said.

"We've invested more than $450 million in this network based on an exemption created by this Congress," he said.

He added that Comcast has agreed to share Philadelphia SportsNet with Verizon Communications Inc. as the telecom provider rolls out its new pay-TV service in the suburbs surrounding Philadelphia. Satellite TV distributors have been denied the programming, he said, because DirecTV has been unwilling to waive its exclusive right to the NFL Sunday Ticket.

Specter Looks To Repeal NFL's Antitrust Exemption (NYSUN)

By Evan Weiner

New York Sun, December 13, 2006

The outgoing chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Senator Specter, a Republican of Pennsylvania, has decided — for reasons best known to him — that its time to repeal the National Football League's antitrust exemption under the Sports Broadcasting Act of 1961. Specter plans to introduce legislation as soon as the new Congress convenes in January. The bill would end the NFL's practice of bundling its 32 teams into one group for the purposes of negotiating both over-the-air and cable television contracts.

It's unclear whether Specter also plans to include Major League Baseball, the National Basketball Association, National Hockey League, the National Collegiate Athletic Association, and other sports organizations in his proposed legislation, as all of those businesses enjoy the same exemption.

Also uncertain is whether Specter can generate any support from the other 99 Senate members or the 435 House members — and it would take an awful lot for him to get President Bush's signature on the bill. The president once owned a piece of the Texas Rangers baseball franchise, and baseball owners have reaped the considerable benefits of the 1961 Sports Broadcasting Act. So Specter may be throwing a Senate version of a Hail Mary pass in this case.

Specter's bill may never make it out of committee but it's worth looking at how the Sports Broadcasting Act of 1961 changed not only the NFL but also sports and television.

In 1961, a Brooklyn Congressman and chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, Emanuel Cellar, pushed the exemption through the House. President Kennedy signed it into law on September 30 later that year. The legislation is considered the main reason the NFL went from a ragtag business to the powerful entity it is today.

This year, under the terms of four new network deals, each NFL team will annually earn more than $120 million in shared TV money. The league's officials negotiated various deals with CBS, NBC, FOX, and Disney and ended up with a six-year, $24 billion broadcast and cable rights contract. The television deals end in 2011. Additionally, DirecTV will pay $700 million every year through 2010 for its Sunday Ticket package. The NFL also decided to keep an eight-game Thursday-to-Saturday night package in-house, placing it on its NFL Network. That those eight games are not available to all fans may be why Specter is unhappy.

The NFL Network still has not reached agreements with Time Warner Cable and Cablevision to carry the league-owned network. League officials want too much money for the network, according to Time Warner executives. Meanwhile, Cablevision chairman Charles Dolan has said nothing publicly about his negotiations with the NFL. Specter seemed to be taking the cable operators' position when he said last Thursday that, "This is the NFL exerting its power … right down to the last nickel."

In what may be a goodwill gesture to Senator Lautenberg of New Jersey and, in an effort to sway Specter, the NFL announced yesterday that it planned to give Time Warner and Cablevision subscribers a free week of programming between December 24 and 30. The timing will allow subscribers to tune in to the Rugters–Kansas State Texas Bowl matchup and another college bowl game featuring Minnesota and Texas Tech. Lautenberg has complained that many Rutgers fans in New Jersey were being unfairly denied the opportunity to watch Rutgers in the Texas Bowl because the NFL Network, which has rights to the game, has not yet reached deals with Cablevision and Time Warner Cable.

But giving away a week's worth of programming probably won't appease Specter, nor will it be a catalyst for an agreement between the NFL and the two holdout, cable systems operators.

Specter wants to turn the clock back to a time when television contracts were negotiated locally, and when there were just two real networks, CBS and NBC. As television proliferated in the 1950s, the NFL was prevented by a court-ordered injunction from signing a single league-wide contract with a network. Instead, each NFL team negotiated a separate deal with a local television network. In 1960, the New York Giants received $340,000 for their deal, while the Green Bay Packers made only $105,000. The fledgling, eight-team AFL— which was not limited by the injunction — pooled its broadcast rights and signed a national network contract with a struggling ABC (the network had several weak-signaled affiliates at the time).

Immediately following the passage of the 1961 Sports Broadcasting Act, the NFL pooled its television rights and signed a deal with CBS for 1962 for $4.65 million annually. That money was split among the 14 NFL franchises.

The NFL commissioner at the time, Pete Rozelle, had to convince the franchise owners in the larger markets that they could secure greater leverage through pooled rights, although they might experience an initial drop in revenue. Rozelle saw the changing playing field and knew the big-market teams in New York, Chicago, and Los Angeles could land enormous contracts as television grew, leaving behind smaller markets such as Pittsburgh and Green Bay. Rozelle borrowed an idea first raised by baseball executive Branch Rickey when he was trying to challenge MLB with the proposed creation of a Continental League, in the late 1950s. Given the AFL's success in implementing the "Rickey" concept, Rozelle knew he had to work at getting a diverse group of owners to think about the league instead of their individual freedoms.

About six years ago, Giants owner Wellington Mara remarked that because the Cleveland Browns were willing to surrender their large television package, others were persuaded to do the same.

"[Art Modell] was really the one who gave something away. We didn't know what we were giving up. That is what did it. They made the decision. Without that, why, we wouldn't have the league we have today," Mara said. "I think [Rozelle] explained to everybody very cogently what was at stake and [Rozelle] knew it wasn't going to be much of a league with lopsided revenue. … It was too much to expect Buffalo to compete with New York or Green Bay to compete with Chicago."

Specter may be unafraid of taking on the NFL and its highly politically connected owners, but he is absolutely wrong when he contends that football fans of America are being "gouged." The real gouging would come after the antitrust exemption is lifted.

Pennsylvania's senior senator apparently does not know how sports owners operate today — as opposed to 1960 — where television is concerned. Most of the NFL's regular season — and all of its playoff games — are on over-the-air TV. That's an anomaly in sports. Take a look at New York's professional teams: the Knicks, Rangers, Nets, Devils, and Islanders are not on "free" television. Save for a few network TV games, the teams work strictly with cable programming. The Yankees and Mets have a handful of games on over-the-air television (the Boston Red Sox will not be on over-the-air television in 2007)

Specter needs to understand that sports owners have taken their properties from terrestrial TV to cable because that's where the money is. The Giants, Jets, Chicago, Philadelphia, New England (Boston), or Dallas would likely have no problem putting together a lucrative TV network because of their big city locations. Green Bay, Buffalo, New Orleans, Tennessee (Nashville), Jacksonville, Kansas City, or Cincinnati, on the other hand, would have major difficulties getting big money agreements.

Specter should realize that football also will migrate to cable television, where regional sports cable networks — who collect revenue from both subscribers and advertisers — have deeper pockets and so, more money to offer than local TV stations. This is not good news for cable TV subscribers since NFL programming is very expensive; it almost certainly means cable rates will go up for everyone, not just football fans.

NFL owners already are locked in a battle over shared revenue, with New York Senator Schumer looking over their shoulders to ensure the Buffalo Bills and other small market teams can line up with big market players like New York and Chicago. Can you imagine what would happen within the league if Specter's bill becomes law?

The bill would end not only the NFL's view of football economic socialism — which basically allows Green Bay to compete on a nearly even financial footing with New York in signing free agent players and offering bonuses to draft picks — but more important, would be costly for cable TV consumers. Which is why Specter's proposed legislation is pure folly and will more than likely never come out of committee.

Wal-Mart's Lesson For Wall Street (WSJ)

By Alan Murray

The Wall Street Journal, December 13, 2006

Wal-Mart's firing of hot-shot advertising executive Julie Roehm is being portrayed by her supporters as a modern-day morality tale, with the Elmer Gantrys of Arkansas recoiling from a culture of fast cars, fine restaurants, copulating animals and lingerie football. There's something to that. Arkansans generally prefer their sex behind closed doors and their football straight.

Still, this dust-up has less to do with parochialism or moralism than with capitalism. Wal-Mart conquered the retail world not because it harbored some rigid code of ethics, but because it was relentless in its quest for world-class efficiency. It seems to have parted ways with Ms. Roehm for much the same reason.

Anyone who's ever tried to sell something to Wal-Mart knows what I'm talking about. Vendors who make the pilgrimage to Bentonville are ushered into one of some 40 cramped meeting rooms, with nothing on a wall save a poster labeled "Gifts and Gratuities." It reads:

"It is our policy that associates of the Company, regardless of their capacity, do not accept for their personal benefits, gratuities, tips, cash, samples, etc., from anyone buying from us or selling to us, or in any way serving our company."

In case anyone misses the point, the poster goes on to define gifts and gratuities as including: tickets to entertainment events, kickbacks in the form of money or merchandise, special discounts, sample merchandise, Christmas gifts, or meals. There is no "de minimis" rule; even a cup of coffee is forbidden.

This may seem harsh, especially in a retail world where business used to be done over martinis, and copious "samples" were the coin of the realm. But Wal-Mart's goal is to prevent such "relationships." It doesn't want its buyers to be influenced by whoever treats them to a night out, or who gives them a birthday present. Instead, it wants buyers to focus on the economic essentials: quality and price.

That's an idea that's spreading in the retail world, but hasn't fully infiltrated Madison Avenue, where "relationships" still rule. Wal-Mart won't provide details on what happened with Ms. Roehm. Ms. Roehm says she tried to comply with Wal-Mart's policies. The rest of us are left to speculate.

Meanwhile, the Supreme Court last week took a dive into New York City's money culture by agreeing to hear a case about the way the nation's largest investment banks sell initial public offerings of new stock.

The original case was brought on behalf of investors who got burned when the Internet stock-market bubble burst. The plaintiffs claim they were harmed by anti-competitive practices by investment banks, such as requiring investors who were given allocations of "hot" IPOs to then buy additional shares in the aftermarket -- leading to artificially high prices.

The issue before the Supreme Court is arcane: It involves whether the Securities and Exchange Commission's regulation of investment banks gives those banks immunity from antitrust lawsuits. Moreover, the whole idea of investors turning to the courts to recover losses from their own bad investment decisions is disturbing.

Still, the case does shine a harsh light on the way Wall Street sells IPOs, and it's not pretty. Some of the worst abuses of the late 1990s are gone. But the process through which IPOs are allocated remains shrouded in mystery, and "relationships," not markets, still rule.

Google tried to break the mold three years ago when it offered its shares in an auction rather than letting the investment banks dole them out. The titans of Wall Street rebelled, and few companies have challenged the status quo since.

The lesson here? New York may have better restaurants than Bentonville. But the folks in Arkansas could still teach the Kings of Capitalism a thing or two about how markets work.

Foes Of Monsanto Deal Dig In (WSJ)

By Scott Kilman

The Wall Street Journal, December 13, 2006

Monsanto Co.'s second attempt in seven years to bring southern seed giant Delta & Pine Land Co. to the altar could be running into trouble.

An unusual backlash against the proposed combination is taking root across the U.S. Farm Belt, driven in part by rivals in the crop-biotechnology industry, which Monsanto dominates.

The proposed $1.5 billion deal announced in August would give Monsanto more control over a major crop by a biotechnology company than ever before allowed, a prospect that upsets antibiotechnology activists. Delta & Pine Land's seeds produce half of America's cotton, the nation's fifth-biggest crop. Delta's market share is highest in southern states such as Georgia, where 92% of the cotton is grown from Delta seed.

Wall Street is treating the acquisition as a done deal. Delta & Pine Land stock has hovered just under the $42-a-share offer since Aug. 15, when it jumped 11% on news of the agreement. The shares were at $40.64, down 24 cents, Friday in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading. Monsanto shares fell 43 cents to $48.08 Friday on the Big Board. Monsanto is trading at more than 25 times estimated earnings for its next fiscal year, according to Thomson Financial, compared with about 16 for the stocks in the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index.

Analysts have applauded the proposed combination because it would allow Monsanto to speed penetration of the cottonseed market with new genetically modified traits while ending several years of costly litigation between the two firms over their first breakup. Some biotech-industry leaders are prodding the attorneys general of several states to look into the combination as an antitrust review by the Justice Department extends into its fourth month. "The proposed Monsanto acquisition of Delta & Pine Land is clearly anticompetitive," said Doyle Karr, a spokesman for DuPont Co., the Wilmington, Del., chemicals giant. "We have serious concerns about the impact that it would have on farmers, the agriculture industry and ultimately consumers."

Syngenta AG, the Swiss biotech company, is telling cotton farmers that Monsanto's pending acquisition isn't in their best interest. Lobbyist and former U.S. Sen. Tim Hutchinson of Arkansas is squiring DuPont executives around Congress to press their case against the deal. "There are enough indications of concern that should cause [the Justice Department] to take a careful look," said Rep. Bob Inglis, a South Carolina Republican. Representatives for the North Carolina and Iowa attorneys general said their offices were looking into the deal. Iowa is the home of DuPont's Pioneer Hi-Bred International seed unit. While crop-biotechnology companies have a history of battling in courtrooms, they have tried to present a united front in the face questions over biotechnology safety.

"We are disappointed that competitors are using extreme tactics to try to gin up opposition to a deal that would benefit U.S. cotton growers and the cotton industry," said Carl M. Casale, executive vice president of Monsanto, which is fielding questions about the merger from officials in such noncotton states as Maine and Wisconsin. "The regulators should be allowed to do their job and review this transaction without the background noise," he said.

Delta & Pine Land Chief Executive and President Tom Jagodinski didn't return phone calls seeking comment.

For Delta shareholders, the industry scrape is the latest chapter in what has been an ill-starred romance between the Scott, Miss., company and Monsanto, based in St. Louis. Monsanto offered to buy Delta in 1998 for stock then valued at $1.8 billion. Monsanto backed out in December 1999 after antitrust regulators in the Clinton administration's Justice Department had reviewed the case for 19 months without making a decision. To get executives of Delta & Pine Land to shelve a lawsuit seeking $2 billion in damages over the breakup and consider a new offer, Monsanto promised to hand over $600 million if the new deal doesn't pass antitrust review by August 2007, a deadline that can be extended.

The opposition of DuPont and other firms reflects Delta's role in their plans to challenge Monsanto's decade-long dominance of crop biotechnology. Monsanto owns brands that sell about 25% of the seed used to grow the two biggest U.S. crops -- corn and soybeans -- and has licensed independent seed companies to use its genes.

Today, the majority of genetically modified crops -- including corn, soybeans and cotton -- contain Monsanto genes, which equip plants to make their own insecticide and to tolerate exposure to weedkillers. Such traits make plants so much easier to tend that farmers are willing to pay far more for genetically modified seed than conventional seed. DuPont and others are developing new genes with the aim of replacing Monsanto technology over the next decade. To win, they need to get their inventions into as many bags of seed as possible. DuPont and Syngenta, which own their own brands of corn and soybean seed, don't control any cottonseed. Delta, the last publicly traded pure seed company in the U.S., had been making moves to break its dependence on Monsanto genes.

In July -- a month before the proposed acquisition was announced -- Delta struck a deal to use genes, under development at DuPont's Pioneer seeds unit, designed to give plants the same sort of immunity to weedkillers as Monsanto genes. Likewise, Syngenta had licensed Delta to use genes it is developing that instruct a plant how to make its own bugkiller. To make the deal more palatable to regulators, Monsanto is promising to divest its Stoneville cottonseed business, which controls 12% of the market. Monsanto executives said they would be interested in being able to offer Syngenta and DuPont genes in Delta & Pine Land cottonseed. They stopped short of promising to use competitors' genes.

US Judge Asks FBI Why Information Withheld In Civil Trial (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, December 13, 2006

A federal judge ordered the Justice Department last night to ask FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III to explain why the bureau has refused to share crucial information with the government's own lawyers, disrupting the civil trial being held on behalf of four men who were wrongly imprisoned for decades.

US District Judge Nancy Gertner wrote that the FBI's position is "chilling," given that the suit brought on behalf of Peter Limone , Joseph Salvati , Henry Tameleo , and Louis Greco is about informant abuse and FBI agents allegedly "hiding the ball" by withholding information that would have helped exonerate the four men in a 1965 gangland slaying.

She ordered the Justice Department to notify Mueller of her concerns and report back by Monday on why she should not find the government in contempt and impose punitive fines.

Gail Marcinkiewicz , a spokeswoman for the FBI in Boston, said the case was being handled out of Washington and "because it's an ongoing matter, we can't comment on it."

A Justice Department spokesman could not be reached last night for comment.

The four men were exonerated five years ago after secret FBI memos surfaced indicating that Joseph "The Animal" Barboza, a Mafia hit man-turned-government witness, may have framed them for the slaying of Edward "Teddy" Deegan, partly to protect a friend who was an FBI informant.

The suit seeks more than $100 million for Limone and Salvati, who spent more than 30 years in prison, and for the families of Greco and Tameleo, who died while in custody.

Justice Department lawyers who are defending the government at trial told the judge yesterday that the FBI would not authorize them to see certain documents containing informants' names, and gave them redacted versions of the files.

Gertner wrote, "Time and time again it appears that the lawyers representing the government have simply not been given the authority they need to understand the big picture, trying this case, if you will, with one hand tied behind their back."

FBI Director: Hoffa Case Will Be Solved (AP)

By Kristin Longley, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 13, 2006

DETROIT -- FBI Director Robert Mueller said Tuesday the decades-old disappearance of Teamsters leader Jimmy Hoffa will eventually be solved.

Mueller spoke during a question-and-answer session with reporters at the FBI's Detroit office, months after an expensive search at a southeastern Michigan horse farm turned up nothing.

"We have a long, long memory," Mueller said. "We will continue to follow any lead that comes to our attention."

Hoffa was last seen alive on July 30, 1975. Over the years, theories have suggested Hoffa was buried at Giants Stadium in New Jersey or dumped in a Florida swamp.

The day he disappeared, Hoffa was scheduled to meet a New Jersey Teamsters boss and a Detroit mafia captain, both of whom are now dead, at a restaurant about 20 miles from the Hidden Dreams horse farm that the FBI searched in May.

The two-week excavation at the farm, about 30 miles northwest of Detroit, involved up to 20 agents, 24-hour guards, archaeologists, anthropologists, a demolition crew and cadaver-sniffing dogs, but it yielded nothing more than a water line, a beer can and other trash.

FBI spokeswoman Dawn Clenney said the search cost less than the $250,000 the agency had budgeted for it.

Mueller would not comment on whether the FBI has any new leads in Hoffa's disappearance, but said the agency will always be working on the case.

"As you can see from the undertakings last summer, we are very willing to follow up on any leads where we believe there is some basis," Mueller said.

FBI Papers On Terror Expertise To Released (ALBANYTU/AP)

By John Solomon, Associated Press

Albany Times Union, December 13, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Lawyers for a once-decorated terror-fighting FBI agent will make public hundreds of pages of testimony from the bureau's top brass declaring that terrorism expertise has been given little weight in promoting agents since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

The evidence gathered during Agent Bassem Youssef's ongoing lawsuit against the FBI includes statements from the agency's director, Robert Mueller, and many of his top supervisors on how little Middle Eastern experience, Arabic language skills or formal anti-terrorism training has played in promotion decisions.

The testimony, some of which was reported by The Associated Press in 2005, is being posted Wednesday to a Web site for the public to see. It includes:

--Mueller defending the 2003 appointment of agent Gary Bald to the top terror-fighting job on grounds that he was qualified because he ran the Baltimore office when it investigated the 2002 Washington-area sniper shootings.

"He had the sniper case, which I don't know whether it was actually documented as a domestic terrorism program, but certainly it could fall under the category of domestic terrorism. So running the office gave him some exposure to terrorism matters," Mueller testified.

--Bald, who retired earlier this year, was asked about his grasp of Middle Eastern culture and history, and testified: "I wish that I had it. It would be nice."

--The agent assigned to oversee the Sept. 11 investigation at the Pentagon acknowledged she had no formal terrorism background. "I do not have a terrorism background myself," agent Ellen Knowlton testified.

--John Lewis, a deputy assistant director for counterterrorism, testified that there was no difference in recruiting an informant to infiltrate a white supremacist group or al-Qaida. "It doesn't make any difference whether somebody's from the Middle East or a white supremacist or from Australia," he said.

Youssef, the agent suing the bureau, alleges he was passed over for several promotions that could have better utilized his skills in the war on terror. The FBI denies discriminating against him.

Youssef's lawyer said Tuesday he was making the depositions public so Americans can see the FBI answers for themselves. "The American public has a right to know what really happened inside the FBI counterterrorism division after Sept. 11," attorney Stephen Kohn said.

The documents are to be posted Wednesday to http://www.whistleblowers.org/html/inside--the--fbi.html

An FBI spokesman did not immediately return a call seeking comment Tuesday. In the past, the FBI has declined to discuss the Youssef litigation but has said the agency has fundamentally reshaped itself to ensure the field agents on the ground who work the cases have the necessary skills, training and background for fighting terrorism. It has noted it hired or redeployed more than 1,000 agents to counterterrorism and hired an additional 1,200 intelligence analysts and linguists.

Youssef was credited with improving relations with Saudi Arabia during the late 1990s as the threat from al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden grew and the bureau struggled to solve the case of the 1996 Khobar Towers bombing. He received special awards for his performance.

But after Sept. 11, Youssef repeatedly was passed over for top-level headquarters jobs in terrorism. Instead, he was offered same-rank positions in budgeting or exploiting intelligence from terrorism documents.

Louis Freeh, the former FBI director who left that job three months before the terrorist attacks, testified he believed Youssef should have gotten an important terror-fighting job in the post-Sept. 11 era

And one FBI supervisor, just-retired agent Paul Vick, testified he was concerned that Youssef's skills weren't utilized after Sept. 11 and that some colleagues had mistaken him for another agent who was Muslim and had refused certain work assignments on religious beliefs.

Youssef is Christian and never refused any assignments, his lawyer said.

SI Mob Crew Busted (AP)

AP, December 12, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) -- When a Bonanno crime family associate disrespected Michael Souza over a financial dispute, he had to pay.

Souza, who ran a dangerous Colombo mob crew on Staten Island, decided to launch a surprise attack, or a Jack in the Box, to take out the Bonanno associate, prosecutors said. He acquired a gun silencer for the crime but never got a chance to use it, they said.

On Tuesday, federal agents said they silenced Souza and 10 of his crew members, arresting them on charges of racketeering, robbery, assault, weapon possession, loansharking, gambling and drug dealing.

The arrests came after federal prosecutors unsealed a lengthy indictment that alleged Michael Angelo Souza, a made man in the Colombo organized crime family, ran the brazen crew with his brother, Anthony "Ant" Souza.

The indictment, the result of an eight-month DEA investigation, said the crew committed the crimes between January 2004 and November 2006. Agents obtained evidence against the men through wiretap interceptions.

In one of those federal recordings, Souza boasted about his violent past.

"I beat people up with chairs, barstools," Souza said in the recording. "I cut a guy's eye out of his head with a wine glass."

As part of the same investigation, federal authorities said they charged an Albanian mobster, Lulzim Kupa, in a separate indictment with conspiracy to distribute marijuana.

All 12 men were arraigned Tuesday in Brooklyn federal court. They pleaded not guilty, a court spokesman said.

Prosecutors said the Colombo crew was running a violent enterprise on Staten Island, operating a lucrative sports betting business and peddling crack cocaine and pot.

Authorities said one of the crew's most ambitious schemes involved trying to rob an armored car but DEA agents thwarted the heist before it could be pulled off.

In Kupa's case, DEA agents said they intercepted a shipment of about 60 pounds of marijuana that he intended to sell.

If convicted, Kupa, a felon, could face more than 10 years in prison. The other defendants could face decades behind bars if convicted.

Doctor Pleads Guilty In Drug Case (BRADV)

Baton Rouge Advocate, December 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0106094

LAFAYETTE — A doctor who operated an occupational medicine clinic in Broussard pleaded guilty Monday to methamphetamine charges.

Randy L. Lavespere, 44, faces up to 20 years in prison on charges of possession with intent distribute methamphetamine.

Agents arrested Lavespere during an undercover sting in March when he bought a half-pound of methamphetamine for $8,000 in the building center parking lot in Opelousas.

The doctor had been targeted by U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration investigators after an informant reported selling methamphetamine to Lavespere in the past, according to court records.

Lavespere has voluntarily surrendered his medical license and checked himself into inpatient substance treatment at Palmetto Addiction Recovery Center four days after his arrest. He left inpatient treatment in June but has continued with outpatient treatment, according to court records.

"He's admitted to what he's done, and he is sorry for what he did," Lavespere's attorney, Hillar Moore III, said.

A second man arrested in the case faces up to one year in prison after pleading guilty in August to simple possession of methamphetamine for his part in the drug buy.

Lavespere admitted in court documents that the other man was acting on his behalf when he exchanged money with the an undercover agent while Lavespere waited nearby the parking lot.

Moore said Lavespere might be able to regain his medical license, even with the felony drug conviction, but "that's not even on his radar right now."

Any decision of the reinstatement of Lavespere's license would be made by the state Board of Medical Examiners.

No sentencing date has been set in the case.

Because Lavespere has no previous criminal history, he will most likely face a sentence far below the 20-year maximum allowed under the law.

Lavespere's arrest came in a joint investigation involving the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, Alexandria Police Department, St. Landry Parish Sheriff's Office, Lafayette Parish Sheriff's Office and Vermilion Parish Sheriff's Office.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephanie Finley said that, as part of Lavespere's plea deal, he has agreed to cooperate in any future investigations.

San Diego County Board Votes To Appeal Medical Marijuana Ruling (AP)

AP, December 12, 2006

SAN DIEGO, (AP) --

The San Diego County Board of Supervisors voted Tuesday to appeal a judge's recent decision to reject the county's challenge to California's decade-old law legalizing marijuana use by the chronically ill.

The county sued California and its health services director in February over a state requirement that counties issue identification cards for medical marijuana users and maintain a registry of people who apply for the cards. San Bernardino and Merced counties joined the suit.

The counties argued that local governments shouldn't be bound to uphold state laws that are weaker than the federal blanket ban on marijuana.

Superior Court Judge William R. Nevitt Jr. ruled last week that county officials would not be breaking federal law by giving out state identification cards.

Marijuana users in California can still be prosecuted under federal drug laws.

Fifty-five percent of California voters approved the law in a 1996 vote. Since then, 10 other states have adopted measures protecting qualified patients from prosecution: Alaska, Colorado, Hawaii, Maine, Montana, Nevada, Oregon, Rhode Island, Vermont and Washington.

IMMIGRATION:

Immigration Officials Raid Meatpacking Plants (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, December 13, 2006

Washington — Federal officials raided six meatpacking plants across the country Tuesday in the culmination of a 10-month investigation triggered by allegations that illegal immigrants were using the stolen identities of U.S. citizens.

The raids, all at plants operated by Swift & Co., resulted in arrests of workers on immigration violations and some existing criminal warrants, with charges of aggravated identity theft possible at a later date, officials said. The number of arrests was not immediately known. The company was not charged.

The action targeted the use of legitimate Social Security numbers by illegal immigrants -- what Jamie Zuieback, spokeswoman for Immigration and Customs Enforcement, called "a massive identity-theft scheme."

"We believe hundreds of U.S. citizens were affected," she said. "We do see this as a new trend, and the scope of it is very large, and that makes it significant."

In the past, she said, illegal workers had used "false identities, which is different from using stolen identities."

ICE officials did not say whether immigrants had stolen the identities themselves or whether they had purchased them from third parties.

The Bush administration has pushed businesses to use an online verification system that determines the validity of Social Security numbers provided by workers. Business groups were quick to criticize the raids, saying they underscored fundamental weaknesses in the system, known as Basic Pilot, which Swift has employed since 1997.

"This shows their Basic Pilot system does not work," said Angelo Amador, immigration policy director at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. "Right now it does nothing to protect against identity theft."

Immigrant advocates questioned the efficacy of work-site enforcement efforts that focused on workers, not employers. "It suggests they think they can deal with our immigration problem by going after immigrants one at a time," said Cecilia Munoz of the National Council of La Raza. "It's alarming."

Swift's chief executive, Sam Rovit, said in a statement that the company had checked every employee with Basic Pilot.

"Swift has ... relied in good faith on a program explicitly held out by the president of the United States as an effective tool to help employers comply with applicable immigration laws," he said. "Swift has never condoned the employment of unauthorized workers, nor have we ever knowingly hired such individuals."

In June, a Swift executive told a House Small Business subcommittee about weaknesses in the program, noting that it could identify false numbers but was unable to detect multiple use of the same genuine number.

"The same Social Security number could be in use at another employer and potentially multiple employers across the country," said Jack Shandley, the company's senior vice president for human resources.

The issue of identity theft by illegal immigrants came up in this summer's congressional debate on immigration, with senators taking to the floor to describe stay-at-home mothers who received tax bills because of jobs in other states actually held by illegal immigrants using the women's Social Security numbers.

Swift, a privately owned company based in Greeley, Colo., is the country's third-largest processor of beef and pork, with annual sales close to $10 billion and 15,000 workers in nine plants across eight states.

Tuesday's raids targeted plants in Greeley; Grand Island, Neb.; Cactus, Texas; Hyrum, Utah; Marshalltown, Iowa; and Worthington, Minn. Work at the six plants, which include all of Swift's beef processing facilities and 77 percent of its pork processing facilities, was temporarily suspended. Swift said its ability to resume operations would depend on the number of employees able to return to work.

Raid Targets Illegal Migrants (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

DOJ_NMG_0106096

One of the world's largest meat processors shut down nearly all of its U.S. operations Tuesday as federal agents raided plants in six states in a crackdown on illegal immigrants who allegedly used stolen identification to get their jobs.

It was unclear how many people were arrested in the raids at Swift & Co.'s headquarters in Greeley, Colo., and its plants in Grand Island, Neb.; Cactus, Texas; Hyrum, Utah; Marshalltown, Iowa; and Worthington, Minn.

The plants have thousands of workers, and Tuesday's massive roundup — which involved 1,000 federal agents — was one of the U.S. government's largest moves ever against illegal workers.

The raids come eight months after Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) arrested 1,187 illegal workers at plants operated by IFCO Systems, a company that makes pallets.

The Swift probe, which began in February, uncovered a "massive identity fraud scheme" in which illegal workers had "stolen the identity of hundreds of people," ICE Assistant Secretary Julie Myers said. She said agents were interviewing those arrested at the plants to determine whether they should face criminal or immigration charges.

Swift, which has not been charged, denied knowledge of the alleged scheme.

"Swift has never condoned the employment of unauthorized workers, nor have we ever knowingly hired such individuals," Swift President and CEO Sam Rovit said in a statement.

Hours before the raids, Weld County, Colo., District Attorney Ken Buck's office filed 25 arrest warrants at the request of U.S. agents.

The arrest affidavits say about 30 Swift employees used false information to get jobs at the Greeley facility, which has about 2,700 workers.

One of those using a false ID was identified in court papers as Otilio Torres Rivera. The Social Security number and North Carolina ID he offered as proof of legal residence belonged to a man who had died in February 2005, court papers allege. The dead man's sister had filed a complaint with the Federal Trade Commission after a Social Security Administration report wrongly said her late brother was employed at Swift. Court papers did not specify how the dead man's ID was stolen.

In Greeley, about 75 workers' family members and protesters gathered outside the plant, complaining that ICE agents were cruel to arrest workers just before Christmas, Police Chief Jerry Garner said.

Swift said it would reopen its plants after ICE ends its operation, but that production would depend on the number of workers arrested or detained.

The plants raided handle all of Swift's domestic beef processing and 77% of its pork processing.

Illegal Workers Arrested In 6-State ID Theft Sweep (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu And Krissah Williams

The Washington Post, December 13, 2006

Federal agents targeting illegal immigrants raided meatpacking plants in six states yesterday, arresting hundreds of workers on the uncommon charge of identity theft and shutting down the world's second-largest meat processing company for much of the day.

About 1,000 U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents with search warrants entered plants owned by Swift & Co., of Greeley, Colo., charging that "large numbers" of workers illegally assumed the identities of U.S. citizens or legal residents by using their Social Security numbers to get work, ICE officials said.

Company and union officials said agents, some dressed in riot gear, locked down six beef- and pork-processing plants early in the morning, segregating workers into groups of citizens and non-citizens after questioning. Some illegal workers were bused to detention facilities hours away, labor officials said.

ICE officials would not say how many people were arrested, pending a news conference today in Washington. About 90 percent of Swift's 15,000 U.S. employees work in three shifts at the plants, company officials said.

The crackdown was another step in the federal government's campaign against illegal immigration, and like some recent raids it targeted job sites, the magnet drawing many of the nearly 12 million illegal immigrants. But the move was unusual for several reasons.

U.S. authorities cast the 11-month investigation as an attack on identity theft, not on typical immigration violations. Swift officials were not charged, despite recent administration vows to get tough on companies as well as workers.

The sweep also highlighted flaws in the main program through which the government helps employers authenticate workers' identification documents, underscoring how weak government ID requirements and poor coordination with the Social Security Administration have frustrated enforcers for decades. Swift has been participating in the program for years.

Yesterday's raid "shows the weakness of the current system, the ways illegal workers have been able to find employment in the legitimate economy, and the need for enforcement efforts to focus on the work site and not just the border," said Deborah W. Meyers, senior policy analyst at the Migration Policy Institute, a nonpartisan think tank in Washington.

Although many illegal workers by definition commit document fraud to get jobs, the government's use of identity theft charges could reframe the immigration debate for the public and spotlight how sharing Social Security data could fight such abuses, she said.

In a brief teleconference with reporters, Julie L. Myers, assistant secretary of homeland security for ICE, said that "the signal we're intending to send here is, 'We're serious about work site enforcement, and those individuals who steal identities of U.S. citizens will not escape action from us.' " She said the government would also pursue vendors of fake documents, former workers and legitimate residents who sold their Social Security numbers.

Raids took place in plants in Greeley; Grand Island, Neb.; Cactus, Tex.; Hyrum, Utah; Marshalltown, Iowa; and Worthington, Minn.

ICE spokesman Marc Raimondi said investigators will decide whether those arrested will face immediate deportation, prosecution or detention pending other legal proceedings. U.S. officials noted the participation of the Federal Trade Commission, which routinely shares data on identity theft victims with federal and state law enforcement agencies.

In 1998, similar raids at 40 meatpacking plants in and around Nebraska found that nearly 20 percent of workers had invalid documents. The vast majority disappeared before questioning.

Worker advocates condemned yesterday's raids, which came without warning. They advised detainees to remain silent and contact attorneys.

"These actions today by ICE are an affront to decency," said Mark Lauritsen, a spokesman for the United Food and Commercial Workers union, which sought an injunction in court to halt the raids and planned protests around the country. Federal agents essentially stormed plants "in an effort designed to terrorize" workers, he said.

In Grand Island, as many as 250 workers from a shift of more than 600 were detained as two buses and 10 ICE vans sat outside the plant gates, said Mike Mary, spokesman for UFCW 22 Local. From Worthington, Swift workers were bused to South Dakota, said UFCW spokeswoman Jill Cashen.

"This is not a systematic way to address the deep problems plaguing the immigration system," Cashen said.

In an interview, Swift's president and chief executive, Sam Rovit, also criticized the arrests. He said that his firm's practices are similar to those of its competitors and that "everyone in the whole agriculture sector should be worried."

"Swift has played by the rules and relied in good faith on a program explicitly held out by the president of the United States as an effective tool to help employers comply with applicable immigration laws," said Rovit, whose company reported $9.4 billion in sales in 2006. "Swift believes that today's actions by the government . . . raise serious questions as to the government's possible violation of individual workers' civil rights."

Rovit cited promises made by the government to protect employers who voluntarily submit information about workers to a federal program called Basic Pilot, which confirms the authenticity of Social Security numbers against federal databases. Swift has run all new U.S. hires through the program since 1997.

Studies show that Basic Pilot suffers from data errors, has an unacceptably high false-alarm rate and cannot detect fraudulent use of borrowed or stolen Social Security numbers. Congress is hoping to expand the program as part of beefed-up enforcement.

U.S. Raids 6 Meat Plants In ID Case (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The New York Times, December 13, 2006

In simultaneous dawn raids, federal immigration agents swept into six Swift & Company meatpacking plants in six states yesterday, rounding up hundreds of immigrant workers in what the agents described as a vast criminal investigation of identity theft.

More than 1,000 agents from Immigration and Customs Enforcement appeared at 6 a.m. at the Swift plants with warrants to search for illegal immigrants. Inside, agents separated American citizens from immigrants, interviewing all the foreign workers and taking hundreds away in buses to immigration detention centers.

In a new enforcement tactic, federal officials said they planned to bring criminal charges against some of the immigrants accused of using stolen identities. They said the raids were tied to complaints from United States citizens who discovered that their names were being used by Swift plant workers.

“There are several hundred Americans who were victimized,” said Marc Raimondi, a spokesman for the immigration agency, known as I.C.E.

Other immigrants who are found to be living illegally in the United States will be deported, Mr. Raimondi said.

The raids brought protests from Swift, the only business singled out, and from the United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, which organizes employees at five of the six plants.

Sam Rovit, chief executive of Swift, said the company learned of the I.C.E. investigation in March, but had been "rebuffed repeatedly" when it offered to cooperate. Mr. Rovit said the company had participated since 1997 in a federal program known as Basic Pilot, which allows employers to use a federal database to verify documents presented by job-seekers.

"We have complied with every law that is out there on the books," Mr. Rovit said in an interview.

The six plants employ more than 10,000 people, Swift executives said.

Mr. Rovit said the company had been careful to avoid inquiring too deeply into backgrounds of job applicants. He said the Justice Department sued Swift in 2001 charging that it discriminated against immigrant workers. The case was settled for $200,000, a company statement said.

Illegal immigrants frequently use false Social Security cards or residency documents known as green cards when they apply for jobs. I.C.E. officials said the operation focused on immigrants who had obtained documents with identity information corresponding to that of United States citizens, in some cases by buying them from underground organizations that traffic in false documents.

Officials at the union called the operation a "wholesale roundup" and said they would seek injunctions on behalf of the detained workers.

"Worksite raids are not an effective form of immigration reform," said Jill Cashen, a spokeswoman for the union. "They terrorize workers and destroy families."

The immigration agency raided plants in Hyrum, Utah; Greeley, Colo.; Cactus, Tex.; Grand Island, Neb.; Marshalltown, Iowa; and Worthington, Minn.

Ill. Governor To Announce New Benefits For Immigrants (WP)

By Kari Lydersen

The Washington Post, December 13, 2006

CHICAGO, Dec. 12 -- Illinois Gov. Rod Blagojevich (D) will announce on Wednesday a wide-ranging set of measures meant to better integrate immigrants, legal and illegal, into the state's economy, education system and workforce.

The measures are the result of an executive order that Blagojevich signed in November 2005 requiring state agencies to coordinate with community groups, business leaders and religious institutions to better serve immigrant populations.

Key points of the New Americans program include increasing the number of dual-language schools, English-as-a-second-language programs and bilingual staff members at state agencies, as well as providing job training for skilled and unskilled immigrants. The program is described as the first of its kind nationwide.

"It's a fact that immigrants are driving the job market, immigrants are driving the housing market," said Gerardo Cardenas, the governor's spokesman. "So helping them acquire English language proficiency and providing better services, moving them up the job ladder, is strategic for the future of the state."

The measures were developed by a new state agency; a policy council of Illinois business, religious and community leaders; and a national advisory panel that included former Immigration and Naturalization Service commissioner Doris Meissner.

"The debate going on in our country is focused almost entirely on illegal immigration, but we overlook the fact that there's a very large legal immigration taking place," she said. "It's in our interest as a nation to make sure that process is working well."

About 1.7 million immigrants make up 12.6 percent of Illinois's population and 17 percent of its workforce, according to a recent report by the Illinois Coalition for Immigrant and Refugee Rights. The state has about 425,000 illegal immigrants.

The New Americans program promises health care, education and other state services for illegal and legal immigrants. The program will be publicly and privately funded.

Susan Tully, national field director of the Federation for American Immigration Reform, said the program will put Blagojevich in violation of U.S. immigration law.

"He does not have the right under the Constitution, even as governor of Illinois, to grant benefits to people who haven't been cleared by immigration and customs agents," she said.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Leahy To Promise Justice Dept. Oversight (AP)

By Laurie Kellman, Associated Press Writer

Justice Department officials can expect stepped-up oversight of the Bush administration's war on terrorism and — perhaps — some all-expense-paid tickets to Iraq to help train the corrupt police force there, the incoming chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee says.

Sen. Patrick Leahy's agenda includes a look at about a dozen recommendations by the Iraq Study Group to send law enforcement officials from the FBI and other offices in the Justice Department to the war-torn nation to boost a police force riddled with corruption. Leahy noted that over the weekend that Iraqi police allegedly helped Saddam Hussein's nephew, Ayman Sabawi, escape from a prison near Mosul.

"The police force has proven to be one of the worst failures of the occupation," Leahy, D-Vt., said in remarks prepared for delivery Wednesday. "I look forward to the Judiciary Committee contributing to these efforts by exploring the dozen recommendations relating to the Iraqi justice system and the training of Iraqi police forces."

Leahy did not plan to outline many details of his agenda in the speech at Georgetown University. But he said reclaiming the chairmanship after a brief possession of the gavel in 2001-02 would be a period of "restoration, repair and renewal" after what he termed years of the Bush administration's virtually unchecked power to hunt for terrorists even within U.S. borders.

"This administration has been less and less willing to let us know what they are doing," Leahy said in prepared remarks obtained Tuesday by The Associated Press. President Bush's warrantless wiretapping program and the government's secretive terrorism risk assessments of Americans traveling abroad merit a closer look by his panel, Leahy said.

"Americans' privacy is a price the Bush administration is willing to pay for the cavalier way it is spawning new databanks," he said in the prepared text. "We are way overdue in catching up to the erosion of privacy, and the Judiciary Committee now will help to bring this picture into focus."

Also on the agenda, Leahy said, is a bill he has introduced to crack down on war profiteering in Iraq. The measure would prohibit profiteering and fraud by contractors in connection with a war, relief or reconstruction efforts and set stiff punishments of prison time and fines.

USA Today, December 12, 2006

Louisiana has a reputation for embracing political rogues — popular former governor Edwin Edwards is serving a 10-year prison sentence for racketeering — but it was still something of a shock on Saturday when New Orleans voters overwhelmingly re-elected Democratic Rep. William Jefferson.

Jefferson is, after all, the congressman who was found with $90,000 in alleged bribe money in his freezer, making him the object of national ridicule.

Hometown voters are often the last to believe that a well-liked politician might have sinned, and Jefferson is hardly the first to be re-elected while under a cloud of suspicion. Even so, his victory portends a troubling level of mistrust between Washington and New Orleans that could impede the city's recovery from Hurricane Katrina.

Jefferson's 57%-43% triumph was less surprising inside New Orleans than it was to outsiders. Big Easy voters saw a 16-year House veteran who has been investigated by the FBI for 21 months and humiliated in the press — but never charged with a crime. This in a city where Katrina's scars are visible every day and where voters have ample reason to resent federal agencies, which built the city's levees and then let the mostly black population wait days for help after those levees failed. Jefferson denied wrongdoing and struck a chord with supporters who believed he was persecuted. The government's case "isn't very strong, or they would have indicted him by now," a voter told the local newspaper.

Why the Justice Department's probe is taking so long is indeed puzzling. Jefferson's home was raided in 2005. His former business associate pleaded guilty in May to bribing him. His colleagues kicked him off the Ways and Means Committee in June.

That noted, New Orleanians had ample reason to be wary, and their defiant vote could come back to haunt them. City officials are pressing Washington for dollars New Orleans still desperately needs to rebuild, but scandal has tainted the aid programs, and Jefferson's re-election makes it "very difficult to … ask them to trust us with the money we need here," City Councilman Oliver Thomas said.

No kidding. Americans want New Orleans to recover. They want to help people living in government-issued trailers. They just don't want their tax dollars winding up in public officials' pockets — or kitchen appliances.

They'll now have to look cautiously past that danger to the greater need.

Democrats Consider Outside Ethics Panel (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

DOJ_NMG_0106100

WASHINGTON, Dec. 12 — House Democrats are seriously exploring the creation of an independent ethics arm to enforce new rules on travel, lobbying, gifts and other issues that Democrats intend to put in place on taking power next month.

Senior party officials said Tuesday that Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the incoming speaker, had consulted with Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the minority leader, on forming a bipartisan group to examine outside enforcement. The goal would be to have the group report back in the spring.

An independent Congressional watchdog, if approved, would be a major break with tradition. Some lawmakers say House and Senate members have sole responsibility for policing themselves when it comes to internal rules.

Some lawmakers have said an independent entity could be unconstitutional.

The Democratic officials, who spoke only if they were not publicly identified because the proposal for the new panel was now being presented to lawmakers, said the prominence of corruption as a concern in the elections last month gave new impetus to such an idea.

"With ethics such a big issue coming out of the election, members see a need to think outside the box," one senior official said.

Several ideas have circulated about setting up an independent review board. A coalition of House and Senate lawmakers has proposed a professional Office of Public Integrity that would consider and investigate ethics complaints.

Other lawmakers have called for review by a bipartisan group of former members of Congress.

Most believe any independent group would have to work with the existing ethics committee, which is made up of an even number of House Republicans and Democrats and has the power to punish lawmakers up to expulsion.

Similar ideas have run into serious opposition in the past. Most recently, the Senate decisively rejected creation of a public integrity office, a proposal originally included in a package of rules changes instituted last spring.

Senate backers of the public integrity office, including Senators Susan Collins, Republican of Maine; Joseph I. Lieberman, Democrat of Connecticut; and John McCain, Republican of Arizona, renewed their push last week.

Mrs. Pelosi and other House Democratic leaders have grown more serious about the independent watchdog approach as a way to demonstrate their commitment to enforcement after a string of corruption scandals tied to the former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, a major military contracting case and questions about pet projects included in legislation.

Self-styled Congressional watchdogs have long clamored for independent review of the conduct of members of Congress, saying lawmakers have shown an inability to hold their colleagues accountable in all but the most egregious cases.

For example, the ethics committee report last week on the conduct of former Representative Mark Foley of Florida was attacked. Critics said it documented negligence by the Republican leadership in monitoring Mr. Foley's contacts with teenage pages yet failed to recommend punishment for any of those involved.

The Democratic officials said the idea of independent enforcement of House rules had been gaining momentum before the Foley report and was not directly related to it.

The proposal for the bipartisan group is being developed as part of the House rules package that will be presented as one of the first orders of business when the new Congress convenes on Jan. 4. Some staff members are scheduled to be briefed on it on Wednesday, and Representative James E. Clyburn of South Carolina, the new No. 3 Democrat, is planning to present it to lawmakers in conference calls on Thursday, officials said.

Besides the bipartisan group, Democrats are expected to propose a ban on gifts and meals from lobbyists and organizations that employ them; a prohibition on lobbyists and their employers from planning, organizing, requesting, financing, arranging or participating in travel for members or staff; and a bar to the use of official or campaign money to pay for using corporate jets.

The emerging rules would also require the disclosure of earmarks, the special provisions in bills that lawmakers use to direct dollars to specific projects or favored causes. Lawmakers would also have to certify that any request for such spending is not in their personal financial interest.

After the recent Congressional scandals, the Republican majority began developing its own major changes in lobbying and ethics rules this year. The package stalled because of divisions over the scope of the proposed new restrictions on contacts with lobbyists and the extent of disclosure.

Several leading Republicans have suggested since the election that not following through on the rules overhaul was a significant mistake that contributed to the party's losses.

Mrs. Pelosi and other members of the new leadership, including Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, who ran the party's campaign organization, have indicated that they intend to avoid a similar misstep and have strong party support, particularly from newly elected members.

The Foley Fallout (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

The Washington Post, December 13, 2006

Soon-to-be-speaker Nancy Pelosi is fond of mentioning that she's the mother of five, grandmother of six. The California Democrat should keep that in mind as she reviews the House ethics committee's report on former representative Mark Foley and considers proposals for tougher ethics enforcement.

Pelosi should ask herself: What would she think if the pages whom Foley pursued with his smarmy e-mails and even worse instant messages were her own children?

Would she be satisfied with the ethics committee's conclusion that no House rules were broken by any of the lawmakers or staffers who had ample warning of Foley's problem and failed to do anywhere near enough to stop him? As a parent, does she think that their actions complied with the rule requiring members and staff to conduct themselves "at all times in a manner which shall reflect creditably on the House of Representatives?"

Would a company with a problem like this in its midst conclude an investigation without a single minor disciplinary action against any individual? Would an investigator with more independence have come to the same no-fault conclusion?

It's hard to see how.

The 89-page report by a special investigative subcommittee of the ethics panel is an oddly schizophrenic document. The facts it lays out and analyzes present a disturbing, even repellent, picture of an institution where political considerations took precedence over the welfare of children. The few people who tried to stop Foley "encountered obstacles in the chain of command that limited their effectiveness," the report says. Most just tried to toss away the hot potato as quickly as possible.

"In all, a pattern of conduct was exhibited among many individuals to remain willfully ignorant of the potential consequences of former Representative Foley's conduct with respect to House pages," it concludes.

Then it absolves any particular individual of any actual rule violation.

One argument against assessing individual culpability is that the report speaks for itself and will produce its own consequences, in the political arena, for those whose behavior fell short. We'll see. But in my experience, the specific facts fade quickly from the public's memory, and the exculpatory bottom line--no violation of House rules -- remains.

In fact, this self-serving spin is already underway. "I am glad the committee made clear that there was no violation of any House rules by any Member or staff," Speaker J. Dennis Hastert proclaimed in a statement. This from a man who, the evidence shows, was warned by at least two people -- Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) and National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.) -- and most likely a third, his chief of staff, Scott Palmer, about Foley's conduct.

Boehner testified that, when he raised the subject of Foley's inappropriate e-mails with Hastert, the speaker "said that the matter 'has been taken care of.' " The speaker said he doesn't remember any of these conversations.

Another argument is that the wrongdoing here involved errors of omission -- failures to act to stop the chief offender, Foley himself. This lack of attentiveness, so this argument goes, looks a lot worse in hindsight, with Foley's sexually explicit instant messages revealed.

But anyone paying responsible attention to Foley's behavior -- calling a young male intern in another congressional office; using frequent-flier miles to fly a former page up to visit him; turning up outside the page dormitory; the list goes creepily on -- couldn't have been surprised that he crossed so far over the line.

After all, the House clerk confronted Foley directly 10 times about his inappropriate attention to pages; Foley's chief of staff went to Palmer, Hastert's chief of staff, with a "plea" to help him deal with the "chronic problem with my boss's attention to pages and young staffers." Given all this, the lackadaisical, we-may-have-a-political-problem (or opportunity, in the Democrats' case) response when the matter of Foley's "overly friendly" e-mails came up amounts to gross negligence on the part of at least some of those involved.

Ironically, the committee's performance could be a blessing in disguise for those who believe -- as I do -- that the ethics process ought to be strengthened with some kind of independent investigative arm. As the 110th Congress takes up the ethics mess that the 109th failed to fix, the question of adding an independent ethics enforcement process is going to be front and center.

The ethics committee's performance on the Foley matter reinforces the need for such a change -- and for the new speaker to use her "mother-of-five" voice, loudly and firmly, to get it done.

Dems Keep Jefferson Off Ways And Means (AP)

By Jim Abrams

AP, December 13, 2006

House Democrats, insistent that they will hold lawmakers to higher standards, decided Tuesday that Rep. William Jefferson will not return to an influential committee until a federal corruption investigation involving him is completed.

Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi said the Democratic Steering Committee had resolved that Jefferson, who last Saturday won a runoff election in his New Orleans district, will not be given back his spot on the Ways and Means Committee, the panel that determines tax and trade policies.

The Steering Committee also announced new panel assignments for the next session. The full Democratic Caucus must still vote on those decisions.

At Pelosi's urging, the House last June stripped Jefferson of his committee assignment because of the corruption investigation that included an FBI document asserting that agents had found $90,000 in bribe money in the Louisiana Democrat's freezer.

Pelosi has promised to make lobbying and ethics reform a top priority when she becomes speaker next month, and the Jefferson case has been cited as an early challenge.

Jefferson, the first black member of Congress from Louisiana since Reconstruction, has denied any wrongdoing, and has not been charged with any crime. The Congressional Black Caucus has questioned the idea of punishing him before his legal case has been settled.

While depriving Jefferson of his committee assignment, the Democrats have been mum about another member of the Ways and Means Committee, Rep. James McDermott, who on Monday was admonished by the House ethics committee for violating ethics standards by giving reporters access to an illegally taped telephone call involving Republican leaders a decade ago.

Pelosi must also make a decision about Rep. Alan Mollohan of West Virginia, who is in line to become chairman of an Appropriations subcommittee that oversees the FBI. Mollohan faces questions about personal business deals.

Jefferson also holds a seat on the House Budget Committee. It was unclear if he would retain that seat in the next Congress.

Jefferson, an eight-term incumbent, handily defeated his Democratic opponent in a runoff election despite the controversy over the federal investigation. He was accused of taking bribes from a company seeking contracts in the Nigerian telecommunications market.

After his victory speech Saturday night, Jefferson said: "I don't try to second-guess Ms. Pelosi. I don't go there to work for anyone, I go there to work with the people down here."

Senate Panel Clears Reid On Free Tickets (AP)

By Erica Werner

AP, December 13, 2006

Incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid did not break Senate rules in accepting free ringside seats at boxing matches from the Nevada Athletic Commission, the Ethics Committee has concluded.

The committee disclosed the determination in a Dec. 7 letter to Las Vegas resident Robert Rose, who had filed a complaint on the matter.

The Associated Press reported earlier this year that Reid, D-Nev., attended three Las Vegas fights between 2003 and 2005 without paying, using credentials provided by the Nevada Athletic Commission, a state agency. Reid was supporting legislation during this period to create a federal agency to oversee boxing, something the commission opposed.

The legislation passed the Senate but died in the House.

At the time Reid defended attending the matches, saying it helped him understand boxing regulations, but he acknowledged it didn't look right and said he wouldn't do it again.

Senate rules bar senators from accepting gifts worth more than $50 but make an exception for anything paid for by federal, state or local government. The rules also specify that senators should be wary of accepting any gift where it appears there is a desire to influence official action.

"There is not substantial credible evidence which provides substantial cause for the committee to conclude that a violation within the jurisdiction of the committee has occurred," the committee's chief counsel and staff director, Robert L. Walker, wrote to Rose.

Attendance at the matches "was a matter appropriately left to (Reid's) discretion," Walker wrote. The committee will take no further action and the matter is dismissed, the letter said.

"What can I tell you? That's Washington," Rose said of the decision.

Reid spokesman Jon Summers said: "The letter makes it clear that there wasn't a violation, but Sen. Reid realizes that it didn't look right and he's said that he shouldn't have done it and is not going to do it again in the future."

Lawmakers OK Clean-needle Bill (NSL)

By Susan K. Livio, Star-ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger (NJ), December 12, 2006

Divided Senate and Assembly approve program after emotional debate

After more than a dozen years and countless hours of impassioned debate, the Legislature yesterday passed a bill to prevent the spread of HIV and AIDS among drug addicts by allowing needle exchange programs in six cities.

Gov. Jon Corzine said he would sign the bill into law quickly.

"The science is clear: Needle exchange programs reduce sharing of contaminated needles, reduce transmission of HIV and hepatitis C and serve as gateways to treatment," Corzine said.

For 13 years, lawmakers have wrestled with the legal and moral paradox of giving addicts syringes to use illicit drugs. Opponents questioned scores of scientific studies, the vast majority of which have found that needle exchanges reduce drug users' exposure to AIDS and do not entice more people to use drugs.

New Jersey is the only state in the country that does not allow drug users access to clean needles, either with a prescription or through community-based needle exchanges.

Sen. Ronald Rice (D-Essex), the most vocal opponent of the bill, pleaded with his colleagues on behalf of his Newark constituents who live with the presence of the drug trade.

"What do we tell senior citizens on South Orange Avenue who are afraid to come out of their homes?" he said.

Rice became animated as he railed against the bill. He called it an "experiment" on people of color -- saying it disproportionately affects minorities -- and compared it to the federal government's infamous Tuskegee experiment, which allowed 400 poor black men to suffer from syphilis without disclosing their diagnosis or providing treatment.

"The end result is the same -- death for a class of minorities and women," Rice said.

Sen. Nia Gill (D-Essex), a sponsor of the bill, said Rice's arguments against it have remained the same over the years, as has New Jersey's grim status: fifth in the nation in HIV and AIDS cases; first in women with the deadly virus, and third in infected children.

"If Newark doesn't want it, Newark doesn't have to have it," Gill said. "We've crafted the bill so it's permissive -- it would let Camden try to save the lives of its people. Why not let them have a chance to save lives?"

Camden, Atlantic City and Paterson have expressed interest in hosting a trial needle exchange program, said Roseanne Scotti, director of the Drug Policy Alliance of New Jersey, one of the bill's supporters.

Sen. Diane Allen (R-Burlington) said she couldn't vote for the bill after speaking to a parent who had lost a child to drug use. She urged her peers to change the bill to ban the use of public funds to support the needle exchange programs.

"We're using taxpayer dollars to send people deeper into the abyss," she said.

After more than two hours of emotional discussion, the Senate approved the bill (S494) 23-16. Minutes later, the Assembly passed the bill 49-27 with four abstentions.

"The action we are taking today will save lives," said Assembly Speaker Joseph Roberts (D-Camden).

After the vote, Corzine reaffirmed his support for the law.

"The bottom line is that this program will save lives," Corzine said. "I applaud the Legislature for getting it to my desk, and I look forward to signing the bill and seeing the program implemented rapidly."

Health and Senior Services Commissioner Fred Jacobs called the vote a "great day for public health in New Jersey" and praised the inclusion of $10 million for drug treatment services.

"Hopefully we will put this behind us and get on with the issue of savings lives," Jacobs said.

Atlantic City health officer Ron Cash, who came to witness the vote in Trenton, said the city already has passed an ordinance permitting the pilot exchange program -- a requirement of the bill -- and could have a syringe access program operating in three to six months.

"We've tried education, counseling," Cash said. "We just want this as a tool to fight the disease."

Government Appeals Currency Redesign (AP)

AP, December 13, 2006

The Bush administration on Tuesday asked an appeals court to overturn a ruling that could require a redesign of the nation's currency to help the blind.

Justice Department lawyers filed the appeal with the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit on behalf of Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson.

The appeal seeks to overturn a ruling last month by U.S. District Judge James Robertson, who ordered Treasury to come up with ways for the blind to recognize the different denominations of paper currency.

Robertson had ruled in a lawsuit brought by the American Council of the Blind. The council proposed several options for changes, including printing different size bills or changing the texture by adding embossed dots or foil.

Jeffrey Lovitky, an attorney for the council, said he planned to petition the appeals court to reject the appeal until Robertson makes a decision on what remedies the government should pursue. A hearing to hear the government's recommendations is scheduled for next month.

Christopher Gray, president of the council, said that while his group has been lobbying for changes to help the blind since 1995, the government has yet to conduct any feasibility studies of what those changes might cost. He said that during that time, the Bureau of Engraving and Printing has made several design changes to thwart counterfeiters.

"We would be happy to wait until the next change in the bills and build accessibility in at that time," Gray said. "Surely, if you did it that way, the costs can't be anything like what is being claimed by Treasury."

In his ruling, Robertson said that of 180 countries issuing paper currency, only the United States prints bills that are identical in size and color in all their denominations.

He said the current practice violates the Rehabilitation Act, a law that prohibits discrimination on the basis of disability in government programs.

In the government's appeal, Justice Department lawyers argued that visually impaired people are not denied "meaningful access" to money by the way the nation's currency is designed.

They noted the existence of portable reading devices that the blind can use to determine the denomination of paper money. The government said the blind can also use credit cards instead of currency.

The government also argued that Robertson was wrong in ruling that making changes to help the blind would not be unduly burdensome.

Tara Cortes, president of Lighthouse International, another advocacy group for the blind, said the government's decision to fight making changes in the currency was "misguided and harmful to millions."

She said there are 1.3 million people in the United States who are legally blind and there will be millions more in coming years as the baby boom generation ages and more people fall victim to macular degeneration and other diseases that can affect vision such as diabetes.

"While the government may argue that changing the dollar bill will cost billions, it will pale in comparison to the costs of the vision loss epidemic," Cortes said.

Official: Ex-Reagan Aide Investigated (AP)

By Pat Milton

AP, December 13, 2006

A former top budget official in the Reagan White House is a target of a criminal investigation into possible financial fraud at an auto parts company he headed before it collapsed into bankruptcy, a federal official told The Associated Press.

David Stockman, who rose to prominence as budget director under President Reagan, is the former chairman and CEO of Michigan-based Collins & Aikman Corp.

Federal investigators and prosecutors are preparing a case against Stockman and other corporate officers from Collins & Aikman and expect to soon present the findings to a grand jury in New York City, the official said.

The investigation is focused on whether Stockman and other corporate officers at Collins & Aikman misled investors about the financial health of the company by artificially inflating stock prices. ABC News reported on the case Monday.

The investigation began last summer, the federal official said, speaking on condition of anonymity because the probe is still under way.

Stockman could face charges of securities fraud, mail fraud and wire fraud, the official said.

Stockman's attorney, Elkan Abramowitz, said he did not believe that charges should be brought.

"We have been cooperating fully with both the U.S. Attorney and the SEC," he said. "We strongly believe that no criminal charges should be brought against Mr. Stockman. We have made our arguments orally to the U.S. Attorney. We have been told that they are considering them."

Collins & Aikman spokesman David Youngman declined comment Tuesday.

Collins & Aikman Corp. filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection in 2005. It was formed in 1891 as an upholstery manufacturer and now provides automotive flooring, fabric, instrument panels and other equipment to several automakers around the world.

Stockman, also a former congressman, was Reagan's budget director from 1981 to 1985. He created a storm early in his tenure when he told an interviewer that he thought Reaganomics were a "Trojan horse" for the rich, and predicted huge budget deficits. He said later he was summoned to the White House "woodshed."

Stockman apologized and kept his job until 1985, when he resigned and wrote a book of scathing criticism of Reagan and his top aides.

Scalia, Breyer Debate Unanimity On The High Court (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Law.com, December 13, 2006

More than once in recent months, Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. has said that one of his goals is to achieve greater unanimity on the Supreme Court -- even if it means deciding cases narrowly.

"There are many cases we get that can be decided on a number of different grounds," Roberts told the conference of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in July. "If there's one where it's 8-1 or 9-to-nothing, and another where it's 5-4, I think it's better to decide on the former ground and let it go at that."

Last week it became clear that the Court is not even unanimous on whether Roberts' goal is realistic or worth striving for.

During a public debate on Dec. 5 co-sponsored by the American Constitution Society and the Federalist Society, Justices Antonin Scalia and Stephen Breyer were asked about Roberts' aspirations.

Scalia started laughing and said, "Lots of luck." More seriously, he said of unanimity, "Of course that's desirable, and I think we work hard to achieve it."

But Scalia went on to suggest that unanimity isn't all that it is cracked up to be. "You can get more agreement by deciding less. If you want to decide almost nothing at all, and decide the case on such a narrow ground that it will be of very little use to the bar in the future, you can get nine votes."

The job of the Court, Scalia continued, is to "help the bar" determine what the rules are in a disputed area of the law. "You want it to take on the big question." Deciding the case on "a little technicality," he said, "won't help the bar at all."

Breyer then weighed in, also sounding dubious about Roberts' goal. "You don't want nine on an opinion for the sake of getting nine on an opinion."

Before the discussion moved on, Scalia spoke again to clarify his views, "lest I be misquoted or misunderstood." He said, "I am not against narrow opinions. ... There are a lot of good reasons for narrow opinions, but one of them is not to get nine votes. That's all I'm saying."

Breyer and Scalia have debated before, but their conversation on issues of constitutional interpretation and judicial activism before members of the two groups was unusually sharp and lively.

Breyer said the job of judges is to conduct "boundary patrol" between the branches, but it was safe to guess that Scalia thinks Breyer does more than that. Asked by moderator Jan Crawford Greenburg of ABC News whether Breyer was an activist judge, Scalia said with a smile that he would never say that "to his face."

Scalia also confirmed what Court watchers have guessed at for years: that with his bold, sometimes bombastic dissents, he no longer aspires to win over his colleagues or the bar. "I don't hope to persuade you. It's too late for you guys," Scalia said with resignation, adding, "Maybe the next generation."

Google To Let Workers Sell Options Online (WP)

By Sara Kehaulani Goo, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 13, 2006

Private Auction Is First for a U.S. Company

Google has come up with yet another novel way to reward its employees.

DOJ_NMG_0106106

In keeping with its offbeat approach to business, the search-engine firm plans to create an online auction for its 9,000 employees to sell their stock options to financial institutions. The goal is to give workers a new avenue to cash in on Google's stock, which has increased five-fold since the company went public two years ago.

It would mark the first time a U.S. company has created a private Internet auction for stock options. Investment experts called the idea creative and said other firms might follow suit if Google's plan succeeds.

The private online auction is to be managed by Morgan Stanley and accessible only by Google employees and the participating investment banks.

Google executives said the plan is designed partly to help employees understand the value of their stock options, which may be higher than the share price on Wall Street.

"The challenges we have with options we're granting today are the same as any company -- there's very little transparency to employees in terms of the options' value," said Dave Rolefson, Google's equity and executive compensation manager. "We're trying to help employees understand their options are valuable by showing them what someone else might be able to pay for them."

Many companies give stock options as a way to recruit, retain and compensate their workers. Options give an employee the chance to buy stock at a fixed price, often the market price at the time the option was granted, for a specific period of time. If the shares rise, the employee can profit by buying at the lower price and selling at the market price.

Google's stock options proved valuable to its early employees because its shares rose sharply from its initial offering price of $85 to close yesterday at $481.78 on the Nasdaq Stock Market. Some analysts questioned whether Google's share price can continue growing at the same rate, which could mean new employees might not reap the same benefits from options as those earned by people previously hired.

Google's stock options typically vest in full over four years and expire after 10 years. Google has 6.6 million outstanding employee options, some of which are at strike prices at or above the current market value.

Stock options were a hot recruiting tool in the late 1990s, when Internet companies made millions of dollars after going public. Option fever abated after the Internet bubble burst and regulators imposed a new accounting rule that took effect last year, requiring companies to deduct the value of options as an expense. Today, stock options are still common, but some firms have questioned their value.

"There's been a huge debate as to whether stock options have value, and this settles that debate for me, personally," said Arthur Levitt, former chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission and senior adviser at the Carlyle Group. "If this develops into a broad market, we have a very interesting way of liquefying the holdings of employees in a very constructive and creative way."

Levitt was among the handful of experts Google briefed about the program in advance under a non-disclosure agreement, which allowed them to talk to reporters who were also briefed.

Google said it plans to start its "transferable stock option" program by April, giving employees access to a private Web site where investment banks approved by the company will be able to bid on options employees want to sell. Options, which must be vested before being offered, would be sold to the highest bidder. Once bought, they cannot be resold and would expire within two years. Senior executives are not eligible to participate.

Google is counting on banks being willing to buy employee stock options as a new way to bet on the future of Google's share price.

Some people might have trouble understanding why Google, a company that pampers employees with free gourmet meals, free dry cleaning, and transportation to and from work in the San Francisco Bay Area, would worry about compensation. Investment experts said Google is addressing a long-term issue that could help it remain competitive with start-ups, where the lure of making a big payout might be stronger.

The program also comes as Google is struggling with a compensation imbalance among employees. A large number of longtime Google employees became millionaires after the firm went public in 2004. Since its workforce has tripled over the past three years, Google now has a large group of workers who must wait out their vesting periods and hope that Google's shares continue to rise during that period.

"What this does is addresses a major employee perception issue," said Ted Buyniski, senior vice president of Radford Surveys and Consulting, a unit of Aon. "Your average employee, if I say you can have an option on a stock at $10 a share or at $500 a share, most of them say give me the $10. They automatically think $10 stock will go to $20 faster than a $500 stock will go to $1,000. The real issue is how fast is the whole company growing. What transferable options do is, they help close that gap between the perceived value of the option and the financial value."

In the short term, Google said it would incur some costs related to setting up the program, but investment experts said they expect little, if any, financial impact on Google's bottom line. Over time, the company may even benefit by reducing the number of options it grants if employees think the private market is adding extra value to their existing options.

Like Google, Microsoft made millionaires of its employees through stock options and once helped them sell their options, but under different circumstances. After Microsoft's stock fell in 1999, many employees were holding worthless options. In 2003, Microsoft created a one-time opportunity for workers to sell their options to J.P. Morgan Chase at a fixed price.

Nell Minow, co-founder of the Corporate Library, an independent corporate governance research firm, expressed skepticism about Google's plan because it seems to defeat one purpose of options -- retaining employees and limiting their opportunities to cash out and join competitors. Minow said Google's plans are "innovative." But in the end, she said, "it's just as likely to encourage people to jump ship on the options than it is to hold onto them."

Other experts disagreed, saying that most employees cash in their options soon after they are eligible anyway and that the new market may enhance loyalty. Google is "being quite forward-thinking in terms of establishing a mechanism that is useful" for valuing options, said Joseph A. Grundfest, a former SEC commissioner and Stanford University law professor.

Google executives said they had extensive discussions with the SEC about their plan and think it complies with federal regulations.

Google Unveils Unorthodox Stock Option Auction (CNET)

By Elinor Mills

Google plans to start an unorthodox stock options program in April that will allow employees to sell their vested options in an online auction, the search giant announced late Tuesday.

Traditionally, employees have two ways to deal with stock options: exercise (take ownership) of them once they have "vested" and sell them at the current trading price, and pay back the company for their so-called strike price (that's typically the trading price the day the options were granted), or hold on to them after exercising them.

High ImpactWhat's new:

A new Google program will allow employees to sell their vested options in an online auction.Bottom line:

Google execs believe big buyers of Google "options" on the public markets may see auctions as a place to bargain hunt. However, the financial institution buying the options assumes a risk: mainly, that Google's stock will keep going up.

More stories on this topic

This new, Transferable Stock Option program gives nonexecutive Google employees a third option: a secondary market of sorts managed by Morgan Stanley where preapproved financial institutions can bid on vested options. It doesn't apply to options granted prior to the search giant's initial public offering.

For employees who have arrived at Google long after its stock price started to climb, the auction potentially presents a more profitable alternative to trading on the public markets. It would work like this: once an employee's options are vested, he or she can look for bidders in the private auction. A financial institution may offer the employee, for example, $150 per option. If the employee's strike price was $400 and the stock was trading at $500, the employee would have made $50 more per option going the auction route rather than selling them on the public market. Employees can also set a minimum price at which to sell.

So why would a financial institution buy into this? Google execs believe big buyers of Google "options" on the public markets may see this as a place to bargain hunt. But the financial institution buying that option assumes a risk: mainly, that Google's stock will keep going up. To hedge their bets, financial institutions may "short" the stock, usually a complicated, three-way transaction where the short-seller makes money when a company's stock price goes down.

So why is Google doing this? Executives say it's to make things fair for newer employees. The company's stock closed trading Tuesday at $481.78 and, despite its long, upward climb, some justifiably wonder how high the stock price can go and whether the options for newer employees will be worth anything when they vest. Google's employee stock options vest after four years and typically expire after 10 years.

"Our expectation is that banks would be willing to pay employees a premium for the right to continue holding the stock," said Dave Rolefson, equity and executive compensation manager at Google.

Google co-founder Sergey Brin was an early proponent of the auction system, which he saw as a way to improve the fairness of the options system for newer employees whose strike prices are much higher than people even hired shortly before them, said Allan Brown, director of recognition and human resource systems at Google.

Financial experts who have been briefed on the program say it's certainly innovative, but wonder how many Google employees will opt for it rather than rolling with company's seemingly ever-increasing stock price.

"It's very creative and innovative; what you would expect from Google," but it's likely Googlers will choose to sell rather than hold onto options, said Nell Minow, editor at The Corporate Library, an independent research firm specializing in corporate governance. "The question is, given that it would defy the law of physics for this stock to continue to perform at the level it has since the company went public, is the smart money going to go for cashing out more quickly or for holding on?"

But Silicon Valley employees, in particular, "are more used to seeing a $550 stock drop to $10 than rise to $1,000. The perceived value is much less than the financial calculated value," said Ted Buyniski, a compensation consultant at Radford Surveys + Consulting. "This enables Google to close that perception gap."

Google's accounting will not change as a result of the new program, but the amount of stock-based compensation expense will be higher than it would be if not for the program, said Mark Fuchs, chief accountant for Google. The company said it has discussed the program with the Securities & Exchange Commission. News of the Google stock options plan provoked "mild grousing" from one shareholder advocate who said companies should not encourage employees to sell options, or even sell stock in general, in the company because it could lessen the incentive for employees to contribute at their jobs.

Foreign Companies Fare Worse In US Courts (FT)

By Brooke Masters And Francesco Guerrera In New York

Financial Times, December 13, 2006

Non-US public companies sued in the US are more likely to lose than their American counterparts of similar size facing similar claims, a study of 3,000 corporate defendants has found.

The mere announcement of a US lawsuit also hits non-US companies far harder.

On average, their value dropped $930,000 on the day of the announcement compared with $366,000 for US firms, according to the study by Utpal Bhattacharya, a finance professor at Indiana University.

The study, which will be published next year, looked at lawsuits filed in federal courts between 1995 and 2000 and followed the cases through to final resolution.

The apparent “home court advantage” revealed in the study may heighten foreign companies’ concerns over their ability to do business in the US.

Fears of protectionism in the US have increased due to public opposition to foreign takeovers of US companies and rising hostility towards the outsourcing of US jobs to developing countries.

“If it’s a foreign firm that gets sued, they lose far more often and they lose higher dollar amounts,” Mr Bhattacharya said. “Foreign firms don’t think they get a fair shake in US courts.”

He said the companies studied were spread across the globe.

The study, co-authored by Bruce Haslem and Neal Galpin, also found more non-US firms were becoming entangled in the US legal system.

In 1995, non-US firms made up 20 per cent of the public company defendants. By the end of the study period, their share had risen to 29 per cent.

Some non-US companies may choose to fight lawsuits that US companies would opt to settle.

“Even if you have US legal counsel, the companies back home don’t understand the crazy things that go on here,” said Tom Niles, vice-chairman of the United States Council for International Business.

Last year, US lawmakers threatened to block the $18.5bn bid by China’s CNOOC for Californian oil group Unocal, which was subsequently bought by Chevron.

This week, Dubai Ports World agreed to sell to AIG the US ports bought as part of February’s acquisition of P&O – a divestment forced upon the group by Congressional opposition.

The study “gives empirical backing to the idea that the US legal system is broken,” said Linda Kelly, vice-president of the US Chamber of Congress’s Institute for Legal Reform.

“It suggests a need for Congress to see what they can do to improve our global competitiveness from a legal standpoint,” she said.

FTC Cracks Down On Bogus Business Scams (AP)

By Christopher S. Rugaber

AP, December 12, 2006

WASHINGTON

Scams playing off the well-known brand names of online retailers such as Amazon.com and Overstock.com are among the latest get-rich-quick schemes bilking consumers for millions of dollars, federal regulators warned Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0106109

As the Federal Trade Commission announced a new crackdown, it also gave some cautionary advice to consumers who are tempted by the lure of easy riches from ads online, in newspapers, magazines and on TV: don't be fooled.

The latest law enforcement sweep, dubbed Project False Hopes, involves more than 100 enforcement actions by the FTC, Department of Justice and other federal and state agencies.

The FTC announced nine new cases Tuesday involving bogus offers to operate vending machines, Internet access kiosks and ATM businesses, among other hoaxes. In four of those cases, consumers lost a combined $30 million.

In one case, a Phoenix-based company called The Results Group charged between $99 and $599 to set up Web sites that were supposedly affiliated with Amazon.com and Overstock.com. Consumers were told that they would make money when people purchased products from those companies through the Web sites. The retailers, however, had no involvement in the scam and were unaware of the affiliations, the FTC said. The consumers made no money.

The FTC has filed court papers seeking to shut down the company and recover proceeds it earned from the scam. A phone call to The Results Group was not returned.

In many of the hoaxes, victims paid $15,000 or more for vending machines or other equipment to con artists who promised to find profitable locations for the machines. The hucksters illegally provided false references and false promises that the machines would yield significant income.

One victim said he saw an ad on the History Channel featuring the actor Adam West, who played "Batman" in the 1960s TV series, for a business opportunity placing Internet access kiosks in hotel lobbies and other locations. He called the company, Pantheon Holdings, which promised that it would find high-traffic locations for the machines and provided two references that vouched for the business. The victim paid approximately $26,000 for two of the machines, which were placed in a hotel lobby and store in Colorado, but they were rarely used and made little money. The references turned out to be fake.

"I spent 30 years as a police officer ... and I got took," Doug Stenge of Boulder, Co., told reporters Tuesday.

Overall, Pantheon swindled 700 victims for over $18 million, the Justice Department said. Ten individuals associated with the company have been sentenced to 12 months to 15 years in prison, the department said.

Con artists promoting bogus business opportunities "use promises of big money to lure retirees, work-at-home moms, and others with an entrepreneurial spirit who are looking to supplement their income or perhaps to be their own boss," FTC Chairwoman Deborah Platt Majoras said Tuesday at a press briefing.

Business opportunity scams are widespread. Peter D. Keisler, assistant attorney general for the Justice Department, said that in 2006 the agency secured 23 convictions that led to a total of 160 years of imprisonment for frauds that swindled 4,600 individuals out of $86 million.

The FTC is also stepping up its consumer education efforts, Majoras said, including the use of "teaser Web sites" that mimic scam ads. When consumers click on the sites, they are taken to an FTC site, warning them against scams.

The agency has also developed guidance for newspaper publishers to assist them in rejecting deceptive business opportunity ads, Majoras said.

U.S. Health System Unprepared, Report Says (USAT)

By Mimi Hall, Usa Today

USA Today, December 13, 2006

Defense against flu, bioterrorism comes up short

WASHINGTON — The nation's public health system — the first line of defense against pandemic flu, a bioterror attack or other widespread health emergency — remains woefully unprepared to protect the American public, according to a report out Tuesday.

The annual study by Trust for America's Health found that emergency health preparedness remains inadequate five years after the 9/11 and anthrax attacks of 2001 raised fears of bioterrorism. The study also comes one year after Hurricane Katrina highlighted the need for the government to provide health care quickly when thousands of people are in need.

"The nation is nowhere near as prepared as we should be for bioterrorism, bird flu and other health disasters," said Jeff Levi, director of the trust. "We continue to make progress each year, but it is limited. As a whole, Americans face unnecessary and unacceptable levels of risk."

The report ranked the 50 states and Washington, D.C., on a 10-point system that assessed key indicators, such as whether each state is capable of distributing drugs and antidotes from a national stockpile, whether there are enough hospital beds and nurses to handle a patient surge, and whether states have enough labs and scientists to test for biological threats and other outbreaks.

Oklahoma came out on top — the only state that satisfied all 10 measures.

California, Iowa, Maryland and New Jersey scored lowest with four points out of 10.

DOJ_NMG_0106110

The report also found that:

·The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC)has determined that only 15 states have been certified as capable of distributing drugs and antidotes from the stockpile.

·Half the states would run out of available hospital beds within two weeks of a moderate pandemic flu outbreak.

·Four states don't test for the flu year-round, something health officials regard as key to monitoring for a pandemic.

Although Congress appropriated $5 billion this year for officials to prepare for a possible pandemic, progress has been too slow, the report said.

"The public believes that more is being done and that we are better prepared than we are," said trust board member Margaret Hamburg, a former New York City health officer and former top official at the federal Department of Health and Human Services. Allowing public health system weaknesses "to persist can lead to serious consequences," she says. "Our systems need to be strengthened."

CDC spokesman Von Roebuck agreed. After decades of neglect, the public health system has improved tremendously since 9/11, he said. But "more needs to be done."

China, US To Hold Talks On Health Care, Diseases (AP)

BEIJING (AP)--Rural health care, infectious diseases and an aging population are among key issues the U.S. will bring up with China during talks this week aimed at strengthening cooperation, the top American health official said Wednesday.

Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt said he would focus on those areas, along with regulatory cooperation and technical exchanges, as part of a high-level dialogue between China and the U.S. that will also address trade, currency and other disputes. Leavitt is part of a Cabinet delegation led by U.S. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson.

"We're coming to have this dialogue not only because we believe it's good for the Chinese government but because we believe it's good for the United States for China to be a strong, vibrant, integrated, harmonious society," Leavitt told reporters.

"We want to see how we can be helpful because we will benefit economically if China is prosperous and their environment and their health care and their energy ... are sustainable," he said.

Leavitt said rural health care and the financing of medical costs - a challenge to both China and the U.S. - is one of the priority areas he hopes to discuss.

Despite economic progress, China's health services, particularly in rural areas, have failed to keep up. President Hu Jintao's government has promised to increase spending in the countryside, including building up a solid health care system.

Leavitt also said he would discuss China's rapidly graying society, along with the importance of food safety and a safe supply of medicine. Counterfeit drugs and fake foods are common throughout the country and have caused mass illnesses and deaths.

Leavitt was to meet Wednesday with his Chinese counterpart, Health Minister Gao Qiang.

Earlier, he attended an opening ceremony for a collaborative office between the Chinese and U.S. centers for disease control.

The office will focus on infectious diseases like AIDS, tuberculosis, malaria and bird flu, Leavitt said. It is part of a 2005 agreement on health cooperation.

China has been trying to overcome a reputation for foot-dragging in cooperating on investigating emerging diseases such as bird flu and severe acute respiratory syndrome.

While it has launched a more aggressive and open campaign against bird flu, the Ministry of Agriculture has until recently refused to share bird flu samples. Sharing is key in helping health experts track the diseases and ultimately develop vaccines.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Leahy Vows "Real" Oversight Of FBI, DOJ Anti-Terror Tactics. The AP (12/14, Kellman) reports, "President Bush should expect tougher oversight of the war on terrorism and a closer look at his administration's policies on torture and other human rights issues, the incoming chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee said Wednesday." Sen. Patrick Leahy "said he would also deal with what he says are the administration's human rights abuses by creating a new subcommittee focused on legislation on such issues as torture and detainee treatment." The AP adds, "The incoming chairman should not count on big changes in regard to oversight of the Justice Department, according to a spokesman for the agency. 'As we have for the past six years, we're looking forward to working with the Senate Judiciary Committee,' said spokesman Brian Roehrkasse. The relationship, he added, includes 'working with the committee to provide information that it legitimately needs.' 'In the past, we've reached accommodations, and working together we expect we can do so in the future,' he said. Expecting resistance to his plans to examine the administration's use of executive power, Leahy said he would not hesitate to subpoena witnesses and documents. e said he expected to summon Attorney General Alberto Gonzales before his panel 'soon.'" The AP notes, "Roehrkasse maintained that the administration's domestic surveillance program and treatment of detainees fall within the bounds of U.S. and international law and are appropriate responses to the terrorist threat the nation faces."

McClatchy (12/14, Talev) reports Leahy "said Wednesday that he'll subpoena documents and testimony on U.S. terrorism, detainees and domestic-surveillance programs if Bush administration officials don't cooperate," but he "did not specify whom he might subpoena. … One document he may seek to subpoena, he said, is what's believed to be a 2002 memo listing authorized CIA interrogation techniques on suspected terrorists." Roehrkasse "did not address that memo specifically, but said his department had kept lawmakers sufficiently in the loop about terrorism matters. 'The department will continue to work closely with the Congress as they exercise their oversight functions, and we will appropriately respond to all requests in the spirit of that longstanding relationship,' Roehrkasse said." Bloomberg (12/14, Roberts) notes, "Leahy said he told…Gonzales two weeks ago that he will be asked to appear before the Senate panel to defend the administration's use of wiretapping without a court warrant, which Leahy said has eroded U.S. constitutional rights. 'I expect to get answers. If we don't then we'll use the subpoena,' Leahy said."

The Washington Times (12/14, Hurt, 88K) reports, "Though short on specifics, Mr. Leahy criticized the program of wiretapping without warrants and said he hopes to update the laws governing foreign intelligence warrants. 'With meaningful oversight and cooperation from this administration, we can achieve the right balance,' he said." The New York Times (12/14, Johnston, 1.16M) quotes Leahy saying, "This has been an unfortunate chapter in Congress's history. … I have never seen a Congress so willfully derelict in its duties as during this administration." Leahy also "accused the White House of 'corrosive unilateralism' in refusing to cooperate with Congress. After the September 2001 attacks, he said, 'the White House accelerated its power plays at the expense of the other branches of government -- all in the name of fighting terrorism.'" The Los Angeles Times (12/14, Schmidt, 850K), under the headline "Leahy Threatens To Subpoena Bush Officials," adds that Leahy's comments "represent the strongest and most specific statements yet directed at the White House on the investigative agenda of the Democratic leaders poised to assume control of Congress in January." Leahy's "threat shows the depth of frustration among Democrats who believe the administration has withheld crucial details about some of the most provocative anti-terrorism moves since the Sept. 11 attacks."

Fox News' Big Story with John Gibson (12/13, 5:31 p.m.) reported, "Senator Patrick Leahy said this election was an intervention by the American people, who he believes want change on everything from the war in Iraq to judicial nominees to the warrantless surveillance program. … He says he may call Attorney General Alberto Gonzales in to testify about the program again and says if he doesn't get the answers he wants, he'll subpoena them. Some conservative were quick to react saying he spent 99% of his speech bashing the President in order to lay a cracked foundation for pushing the left's political agenda through Congress." FNC Your World with Neil Cavuto (12/13, 4:07 p.m.) added that "Leahy left little doubt about the issues he will cover once assumed control of the committee on law and order. On his hit list, the warrant was wiretapped program. He sees the surveillance which targets the communications of suspected terrorists as an erosion of privacy and says it is time the administration is held accountable."

State Department Official Warns Terrorists May Target Satellites. The AP (12/14, Schweid) reports "the Bush administration warned Wednesday against threats by terrorist groups and other nations against US commercial and military satellites, and discounted the need for a treaty aimed at preventing an arms race in space." Undersecretary of State Robert G. Joseph also "reasserted US policy that it has a right to use force against hostile nations or terror groups that might try to attack American satellites or ground installations that support space programs. President Bush adopted a new US space policy earlier this year." Said Joseph, in prepared remarks to the George C. Marshall Institute, "We reserve the right to defend ourselves against hostile attacks and interference with our space assets." Joseph, "the senior arms control official at the State Department, said nations cannot all be counted on to use space purely for peaceful purposes." The Washington Times (12/14, Gertz, 88K) reports the story under the headline "US To Defend Space With Military Force," and quotes Joseph saying, "No nation, no non-state actor, should be under the illusion that the United States will tolerate a denial of our right to the use of space for peaceful purposes." The Times adds "US officials said the comments are an indirect warning to China, which has fired a ground-based laser gun at a US satellite that passed over its territory -- an event viewed as one sign of Beijing's efforts to develop space arms that can blind or destroy systems."

Pakistani Judge Dismisses Terror Charges Against Trans-Atlantic Plot Suspect. The New York Times (12/14, Masood, 1.16M) reports, "A judge threw out terrorism charges on Wednesday against Rashid Rauf, a Briton of Pakistani descent whom prosecutors depicted as a major figure in a plot to smuggle liquid explosives onto trans-Atlantic airliners and detonate the bombs in flight." The ruling "means there are now no terrorism charges against two people once accused of being linchpins of a major bombing plot by Al Qaeda. The other is Tayib Rauf, Mr. Rauf's younger brother, who was detained in Britain in August and was soon set free without charge." But "it was not clear whether the ruling would clear the way for Rashid Rauf's return to Britain for questioning on other charges."

Two ELF Terrorists To Plead Guilty To Vail Fire. The AP (12/14) reports, "Two of the people accused of taking part setting a fire at the Vail Ski Resort in 1998 are expected to plead guilty Thursday. Both "Chelsea Gerlach and Stanislaus Meyeroff are currently in Oregon, where they are being held as eco-terrorists in another case." They are members of the ELF, which "said it firebombed buildings and ski lifts at the Vail resort to protect the development of wild lynx."

Investors Urged To Press Corporations On Trade With Terror-Sponsoring States. Sarah Steelman, the state treasurer of Missouri, writes in today's Wall Street Journal (12/14, A21, 2.04M), "According to the independent research provider Conflict Securities Advisory Group (CSAG), there are some 485 publicly traded companies doing business with four regimes designated by the State Department as sponsors of terror. The activities of these mostly foreign-owned companies -- such as Total, Sinopec and BNP Paribas -- in terrorist-sponsoring states generate billions in revenues for the governments of Iran, Sudan, North Korea and Syria. By so doing, these companies create part of the cash flow that enables these nations to underwrite the activities that our armed forces are fighting around the world." Steelman adds, "In this case, shareholders -- citizens -- have the power to influence. If American investors in these businesses -- not only institutional investors such as public pension systems, money managers, investment trusts and university endowments, but also individuals -- pressure companies to sever such business relations, they can become change agents in the financial sector and force multipliers for our troops abroad."

Feinberg Calls For End To Impasse Over Compensation For 9/11 Injuries. Kenneth R. Feinberg, the former administrator of the federal Sept. 11 Victim Compensation Fund, writes in the New York Times (12/14, 1.16M), "Five years have passed since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, but the flood of litigation continues unabated in federal court in Manhattan. Some 6,000 people are suing New York City, the Port Authority and more than 100 private contractors for negligence in exposing workers to toxic dust and fumes after the collapse of the World Trade Center. Thousands of additional claims are expected in the next few months. Waiting in the wings are approximately 40,000 workers who cleaned up the site after Sept. 11, as well as residents of Lower Manhattan, observers of the cleanup effort and people who simply breathed the harmful air on their way to work -- all potential litigants. Some will probably eventually suffer the same ailments that have led to the current lawsuits." Feinberg goes to suggest that "the principles of the 9/11 fund" be used "as a blueprint to resolve the current litigation and get money into the hands of recovery workers and others quickly. More than $1 billion in public funds is currently available for distribution as part of the initial federal appropriation earmarked for New York City's 9/11 recovery."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Judge Rules Against Hamdan, Upholding Military Commissions Act. The AP (12/14, Apuzzo) reports, "A federal judge upheld the Bush administration's new terrorism law Wednesday, agreeing that Guantanamo Bay detainees do not have the right to challenge their imprisonment in US courts. The ruling by U.S. District Judge James Robertson is the first to address the new Military Commissions Act and is a legal victory for the Bush administration at a time when it has been fending off criticism of the law from Democrats and libertarians. Robertson rejected a legal challenge by Salim Ahmed Hamdan, a former driver for Osama bin Laden whose case prompted the Supreme Court to strike down the Bush administration's policy on detainees last year." The AP notes, "Justice Department spokeswoman Kathleen Blomquist said the agency was pleased with the ruling. Government lawyers have repeatedly argued that Guantanamo Bay detainees have no right to use U.S. courts. Blomquist noted that the new law allows detainees to challenge their detention before military tribunals, then contest the tribunal's ruling before a Washington appeals court."

The New York Times (12/14, Lewis, 1.16M) reports, "The judge said the Military Commissions Act, passed by Congress in September and signed into law by President Bush the following month, was unambiguous in denying Guantánamo detainees the use of a habeas corpus statute. Like Mr. Hamdan, hundreds of other prisoners at the base have challenged their detention, in similar cases." The Times adds that "in his decision Wednesday, the judge said circumstances had changed fundamentally with enactment of the new law. And not only is Mr. Hamdan barred from a challenge under the habeas statute, the judge said, he cannot follow the usual second avenue to bring a habeas challenge — invoking the Constitution — because it is unclear that noncitizens at Guantánamo have that right."

The Washington Post (12/14, Barnes, 690K) reports that "the quickly produced MCA, passed by Congress in late September" may be reviewed by the incoming Democratic Congress, "nevertheless, the Justice Department celebrated the dismissal of Hamdan's case by Robertson, a civil rights advocate in private practice who was appointed to the bench by President Bill Clinton. He was also the first judge to invalidate the Bush plan for war tribunals when he first considered Hamdan's case in 2004. 'We are pleased that Judge Robertson agreed that the Military Commissions Act removes federal court jurisdiction over this and similar cases, and that the Military Commissions Act is constitutional,' said Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse. 'The Constitution does not provide alien enemy combatants detained at Guantanamo Bay with the constitutional right to file a petition for habeas corpus in our civilian courts, and thus Congress may regulate those combatants' access to the courts,' he said."

The Los Angeles Times (12/14, Savage, 850K) notes, "The ruling clears the way for the Bush administration to go forward with a military trial of Hamdan. It is also likely to be the first of many decisions interpreting the new law." Sens. Patrick Leahy and Arlen Specter "also have announced they will seek to restore habeas rights for legal immigrants when the new Congress opens in January."

2004 Pentagon Report Found Possible Violations To US Detention Rules. The Washington Post (12/15, A1, Leonnig, 690K) reports, "A previously undisclosed Pentagon report concluded that the three terrorism suspects held at a brig in South Carolina were subjected to months of isolation, and it warned that their 'unique' solitary confinement could be viewed as violating US detention standards. According to a summary of the 2004 report obtained by The Washington Post, interrogators attempted to deprive one detainee, Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri, a Qatari citizen and former student in Peoria, Ill., of sleep and religious comfort by taking away his Koran, warm food, mattresses and pillow as part of an interrogation plan approved by the high-level Joint Forces Command." Interrogators also "prevented the International Committee of the Red Cross from visiting at least one detainee, according to the report, which noted evidence of other unspecified, unauthorized interrogation techniques." The report by the Navy's inspector general "was presented to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld in May 2004 and was declassified in 2005. It was the first to raise the question of mistreatment of alleged enemy combatants inside the United States."

Padilla Lawyers Want Judge, Not Doctor, To Determine Competency. The New York Times (12/14, Sontag, 1.16M) reports, "Saying that he was mentally damaged as a result of his three years and eight months in a naval brig in South Carolina, lawyers for Jose Padilla asked a federal judge in Miami yesterday to determine his competency to stand trial on terrorism conspiracy charges. … 'Jose's experience as a detainee was so traumatic that it's physically and mentally painful for him to answer the questions that we put to him,' said Orlando do Campo, a federal public defender in Miami. 'He just shuts down. We're covering a lot of the same area as his interrogators, and he doesn't want to relive it.'" The Times adds, "Saying that there was 'sufficient cause' to conduct a competency hearing, the government, in papers filed yesterday, urged the judge to do so." Padilla's lawyers "said he opposed this request that his competency be evaluated. Dr. Hegarty, one of two mental health professionals who examined him, said Mr. Padilla was 'fearful of being thought of as crazy.'"

Florida Terrorism Suspect Denies Charges He Planned Terror Attacks. WFOR-TV in Miami (12/13, Andrews) on its web site reported that Florida terrorism suspect Narseal Batiste, who was one of seven charged with conspiring to blow up the Sears Tower in Chicago and other Federal buildings, "wrote a 25-page letter to CBS4's Brian Andrews, in which he says he and his group never had terrorist intentions. Instead, he said he and his 'followers' were looking for money for their Liberty City religious organization." Batiste wrote, "I want you to know that I never had any intentions of doing a terrorist act. … My group and I never had reason to harm anyone." He claims "the FBI put drugs in food he and co-defendants Patrick Abraham were served by the FBI informant the night a surveillance tape was shot, on which Batiste talks about blowing up the Sears Tower. He wrote that he's simply telling the informant what he wanted to hear, just so he could get money from him for their church." He "says he and his group were desperate for money, and that last September, a convenience store owner from Yemen offered assistance. He says the North Miami Beach shopkeeper, whom Batiste identifies as Abbas, teamed up with the feds to get help for his own financial and immigration problems by concocting the lies that led to Batiste and six others being arrested."

The Washington Post/AP (12/14) in a widely distributed article reports, "Batiste said he only told an FBI informant posing as an al-Qaida operative he planned to blow up the Sears Towers because that's what he thought the man wanted to hear. Batiste said he was hoping to get money from the informant so he could help his organization, which he said was called the Universal Divine Saviours." Batiste wrote, "I made it up right then and there. … If you listen to the words I was saying, it's unrealistic, such as I need horses." He "also blames a convenience store owner from Yemen, who he says befriended him and later teamed up with the informants, feeding them lies to help his own financial and immigration problems." The Miami Herald (12/14, Weaver, 286K) in a brief story adds that Batiste "claims the FBI and its informant were bent on 'setting us up.' Authorities have denied the accusation, which will be a key defense issue at the trial set for Sept. 4, 2007."

Federal Authorities Investigate Man Interested In Suspicious Tractor Trailer Training. FOX News (12/14, Porteus) on its web site reports, "Federal and state authorities are investigating why" Mohammed Yusef Mullawala "was seeking a commercial trucking license after his behavior raised flags at the Rhode Island driving school." Darleen Crawford, president of the Nationwide Tractor Trailer Driving School in Smithfield, R.I., contacted the Highway Watch's Information Sharing and Analysis Center and a "joint investigation was then launched by investigators from the Rhode Island State Fusion Center, the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force (JTTF) in Rhode Island, New York and New Jersey and the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement." They "learned that when Mullawala obtained his driver's license from the Rhode Island Registry of Motor Vehicles, he gave a false statement indicating he was a Rhode Island resident. ICE then determined he was a citizen of India and in the United States on an expired temporary student visa." He was arrested Tuesday and police are "studying a computer taken from one of Mullawala's residence," according to Major Steven O'Donnell with the Rhode Island State Police, who said Mullawala "apparently was a computer expert. They will look at his e-mails, as well as any Web sites he frequented. Any potential overseas connections will be handled by the FBI and DHS, O'Donnell said, although none have yet turned up." New York JTTF official "said he could not comment on the status of this or any ongoing investigation.

Columnist Warns Democrats May Hamper Successful Strategies In Stopping Terrorist Attacks. Pundit Michelle Malkin in an opinion piece available on Yahoo! News (12/14) writes that "it was enforcement of immigration laws that played a critical role in detaining" Mullawala. Similar to the 9/11 terrorists "and several al Qaeda operatives identified in the United States over the past decade, Mullawala was here on a temporary student visa that he had overstayed." Malkin notes, "Over the past two years, the FBI has put law enforcement officials on high alert for U.S.-based operatives connected to al Qaeda who may be in possession of commercial driver's licenses and may be planning to use truck bombs." But soon "Democrats led by Nancy Pelosi -- a staunch opponent of strengthened ID laws and strict immigration enforcement -- will reassume power in Washington. An open borders-friendly White House has expressed willingness to deal with them. So we know who supports illegal alien workers and potential terrorist drivers waiting for amnesty. But who will stand up for us?"

WAR NEWS:

Bush Says He Will Not Be Rushed On Iraq Strategy. The Los Angeles Times (12/14, Spiegel, Barnes, 850K) reports that President Bush yesterday "defended his decision to put off his widely anticipated shift in Iraq policy until early next year, saying he wanted his new Defense secretary to weigh in and warning he would not be rushed into making a decision on how to proceed." As part of his review, Bush "held another round of discussions with senior officials involved in Iraq planning, this time meeting the Joint Chiefs of Staff at the Pentagon, along with outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and his successor, former CIA Director Robert M. Gates." The Times adds, "Although Bush declined to comment on the advice he received from the military leaders, Pentagon officials have said in recent days that top uniformed officers largely have rejected recommendations made by the Iraq Study Group to withdraw most combat forces over the next 15 months, a rejection Bush appeared to agree with."

The AP (12/14, Loven) notes "Bush's meeting at the Pentagon lasted more than 90 minutes." The President "pledged anew to work with the Democratic-controlled Congress that convenes in January 'to forge greater bipartisan consensus' on Iraq policy."

ABC World News (12/13, story 3, 2:40, Gibson, 8.78M) reported the President "sounded a note of defiance saying he's rejected some ideas that would lead to defeat." ABC (Raddatz) added, "It would be hard to exaggerate how high the stakes are for the President. Critics and supporters are both saying, this is his last chance to get this right. At his Pentagon briefing today with Joint Chiefs Chairman Peter Pace, and top military officials, it was clear the President understands the pressure he is under." Bush was shown saying, "I will be delivering my plans after a long deliberation, after steady deliberation. I'm not going to be rushed into making a difficult decision." Later in the broadcast, ABC showed footage of the President saying, "I've heard some ideas that would lead to defeat and I reject those ideas -- ideas such as leaving before the job is done."

The CBS Evening News (12/13, story 4, 2:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The President said he won't do anything that would lead to defeat," and NBC Nightly News (12/13, story 3, 2:20, Gregory, 9.87M) said that "while officials say the President made the 'strategic decisions on the way forward,' Mr. Bush and national security team are still grappling on whether to increase troop levels in Iraq and how to increase pressure on the Iraqi government to contain the sectarian fighting. Today, the President was the most critical yet for calls for troop withdrawal, notably the Iraq Study Group's recommendation for withdrawal of combat forces by 2008." Bush was shown saying, "If we lose our nerve, if we are not steadfast in our determination, to help the Iraqi government succeed, we will be handing Iraq over to an enemy that would do us harm." Bush also said, "In the months of October, November and December we have killed or captured nearly 5,900 of the enemy."

McClatchy (12/14, Hutcheson) reports that Bush, "acknowledging that 'our enemy is far from being defeated,'" told US troops "that he would come up with a better plan for victory in Iraq." The President's comments "offered clues to his thinking as he prepares to announce a revised policy for Iraq early next month. He said he's looking for a plan that combines military action, political reconciliation, economic development and diplomatic efforts to get more help from Iraq's regional neighbors. The resolute tone of his remarks may have delivered his clearest message: Standing with the Joint Chiefs of Staff at the Pentagon, Bush assured US troops that he has no intention of leaving Iraq until they finish the job of establishing a stable democracy. … That was in stark contrast to the tone of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group's report, unveiled last week. Its opening words: 'The situation in Iraq is grave and deteriorating.'" Yet, says the New York Times (12/14, Stout, 1.16M), Bush "avoided using the term 'victory' and referred instead to devising 'a strategy to succeed' and an approach to help American troops in Iraq 'achieve their mission.'"

Military Brass Wants Mission Redefined, But 7,000 More Troops Could Be Headed To Iraq. Meanwhile, the Washington Post (12/14, A1, Wright, Tyson, 690K) reports, "The nation's top uniformed leaders are recommending that the United States change its main military mission in Iraq from combating insurgents to supporting Iraqi troops and hunting terrorists, said sources familiar with the White House's ongoing Iraq policy review. … The chiefs do not favor adding significant numbers of troops to Iraq, said sources familiar with their thinking, but see strengthening the Iraqi army as pivotal to achieving some degree of stability." They also "are pressing for a much greater US effort on economic reconstruction and political reconciliation." The Post adds, "Sources said that Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top US commander in Iraq, is reviewing a plan to redefine the American military mission there: US troops would be pulled out of Iraqi cities and consolidated at a handful of US bases while day-to-day combat duty would be turned over to the Iraqi army. Casey is still considering whether to request more troops, possibly as part of an expanded training mission to help strengthen the Iraqi army."

USA Today (12/14, 1A, Brook, 2.27M) also reports, "A proposal developed by top US commanders in Iraq would significantly redeploy troops from a combat role to training and advising Iraqi forces, according to four administration officials. The proposal, requested by…Casey…calls for changing the mission during the next several months, said the officials." USA Today added, "All requested anonymity because they are not authorized to speak publicly about the proposal." This "is 'one of many plans'…Bush is considering as he weighs a new strategy for the war, said one of the officials, who works at the White House."

Additionally, the CBS Evening News (12/13, story 4, 2:15, Martin, 7.66M) reported, "As the President and his national security advisors met with the Joint Chiefs of Staff, a senior military officer directly involved in the deliberations over a new strategy said there probably will be a surge of US troops into Iraq in an attempt to keep the lid on violence in Baghdad. But he ruled out a massive buildup of combat forces, adding 'the Iraqis would never stand for that.' According to this officer, neither the number for the types of troops that would be sent into Baghdad have been decided." And NBC Nightly News (12/13, story 4, 2:10, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) said it had "learned the Army has drawn up orders to send an additional 7,000 combat troops to Iraq by early next year, part of a short-term surge of up to 35,000 combat forces used as military trainers embedded with Iraqi military and police. A second, and far more risky, proposal is what one official called the do-or-die option designed to force Iraqi government to get control over Shiite militias, responsible for most of the sectarian killings in Baghdad."

More Polls Show Bush Support At Record Lows. NBC Nightly News (12/13, story 2, 1:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported on a new NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll. NBC (Russert) added, "The words the Iraq Study Group used to describe the situation in Iraq, grave and deteriorating. Those are the words I would use to describe the President's political condition tonight. Look at these numbers. His approval rating is just 34%, [61% disapprove.] That's the lowest we've ever had in the six years of the Bush Presidency." Williams: "And all of it continues to revolve around this one issue." Russert: "Iraq. Look at this. Only 23% of the American people approve of his handling of the war. 71% disapprove. That is a decline of 11 points in just about two months."

The Wall Street Journal (12/14, A4, Harwood, 2.04M) reports the poll shows "Americans have grown more pessimistic after the Iraq Study Group report that the situation there has become 'dire.'" That "contributed to Mr. Bush's lowest-ever approval rating in the Journal/NBC poll…and turned Americans toward his Democratic adversaries. By 59% to 21%, Americans say Congress rather than Mr. Bush should take the lead in setting policy for the nation." Along similar lines, the Washington Post (12/14, A3, Babington, Cohen, 690K) reports on its own poll in a story titled "New Congress Is More Trusted Than President." Asked "whether they trusted Bush or Democrats in Congress 'to do a better job coping with the main problems the nation faces,' 57 percent of the respondents said congressional Democrats and 31 percent said Bush. When the question was broken down to specific problems, such as Iraq, the economy, immigration and the 'war on terrorism,' Democrats held clear majorities over Bush. Their lead was overwhelming in the area of health care: 64 percent to Bush's 26 percent."

Smith Urges Bush To Craft "Policy That Works." Sen. Gordon Smith said on MSNBC's Hardball (12/13, Matthews) that he wants Bush "to come up with a policy that works. … It has to be said about our troops that the conquests of the tyrannies in Afghanistan and Iraq, these were textbook operations. They did a remarkable job. I'm just not sure we had a Chapter Two to win as is the American tradition and to leave it better. We have unleashed or opened a Pandora's box of ancient hatreds which has devolved or mutated into a civil war. … That is not the American fight. We can't fix it. And that part is not our fault. But at the end of the day, the brutal truth is that they have to fight it out so we know who's in charge. And in the meantime, I don't want our soldiers being caught in the crossfire."

Maliki Considers Breaking With Sadr. The AP (12/14, Hendawi, Abdul-Zahra) reports, "Iraq's prime minister is weighing whether to sever his alliance with a radical Shiite cleric blamed for much of the country's sectarian violence, aides said Wednesday. But isolating Muqtada al-Sadr could lead to more deadly attacks, even if the strategy could produce a more stable administration over time." Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki "has been meeting over the last three days with a small circle of his Dawa Party stalwarts to discuss their options, according to his aides who spoke on condition of anonymity because the subject is sensitive. The meetings began after reports surfaced of a proposed realignment of the alliance supporting the governing coalition, the aides said." The White House "has acknowledged efforts to shore up al-Maliki's coalition but has denied that the move is aimed at replacing him, though some of his aides fear this is the goal. 'We've talked in recent days about a moderate bloc that has Sunni, Shia and Kurdish leaders,' White House spokesman Tony Snow said Wednesday." The Los Angeles Times (12/14, Daragahi, 850K) runs a similar report.

McClatchy (12/13, Allam, Hammoudi), meanwhile, reports that "even as Sadr presses for more land and power, his grasp over Baghdad remains tenuous. … These days, the safest route to Sadr's west Baghdad office runs through an obstacle course of both legal and dubious checkpoints in an area known for kidnappings and car bombings. … Gone are the peaceful seminary days. In their place, men in long overcoats hover, casting steely glares on anyone who enters the compound. The courtyard brims with new faces and dialects. Some were distraught Iraqis seeking financial or security help; others were militiamen or workers from Sadr's social programs."

US Denies Saudis Threatened To Back Iraqi Sunnis. AFP (12/14) reports Assistant Secretary of State Sean McCormack Wednesday "denied" a report in the New York Times claiming Saudi Arabia had warned it would financially back Iraq's Sunni community against the Shiite majority, if American troops were withdrawn. McCormack said such reports "ran counter to stated Saudi policy," which he said was aimed at securing the territorial integrity of Iraq and national reconciliation. "That has been their position; remains their position, because they believe that is in their national interest, and is not done out of charity," McCormack said. However, CNN meanwhile "quoted an unnamed senior US official as saying the King read Cheney the 'riot act' and expressed growing concern over Iraq's deterioration." White House spokesman Tony Snow refused to detail the content of Cheney's private conversations, but said the reports were "not something that has been described to me as something that is consistent with the conversations."

Saudi Leadership's Split Could Hurt US Efforts. The AP (12/14, Nasrawi) reports, "Saudi Arabia's royal family and government leaders are deeply divided over how to handle the growing crisis in Iraq and other looming Mideast problems like Iran, with some favoring strong aid to fellow Sunnis and others more cautious." The split "played a key role in this week's abrupt resignation of the Saudi ambassador to Washington. It also could hurt US efforts to forge a new overall strategy to calm Iraq." The AP adds, "More broadly, the internal dispute shows how Arab countries like Saudi Arabia, long key partners in U.S. efforts to stabilize the Middle East, are struggling to decide how to proceed as Iraq boils over and Iran gains influence. The tension in the region is straining Saudi relations with the United States, despite both countries' assertions that all is fine." The resignation of Prince Turki al-Faisal, "after just 15 months as ambassador to Washington, for example, came after Saudi officials concluded he was not succeeding at building strong ties with the United States, a Saudi official said Wednesday."

At Least 55 Killed In Iraq Yesterday. The AP (12/14, Wagner) reports, "A new round of car bombings and other violence struck Iraq on Wednesday, with 55 people killed or found dead as the Iraqi government unveiled a plan to assume responsibility for security in Baghdad by early next year." The "relentless attacks indicate how hard it may be for the Iraqis to replace US forces in the capital." The "scope of the problem was clear…from the first bombing at a bus stop during morning rush hour through the announcement at 9 p.m. that the tortured, bullet-ridden bodies of 21 kidnap victims had been found on the streets of the capital." The violence "came ahead of a national reconciliation conference scheduled for Saturday. The gathering is aimed at rallying ethnic, religious and political groups around a common strategy for handling Iraq's problems."

The New York Times (12/14, Semple, 1.16M) notes "four mortar shells hit an apartment block popular with Palestinians in the eastern neighborhood of Baladiat, killing one Palestinian and wounding six, the Interior Ministry official said." Palestinians in Iraq, "a population now concentrated in Baghdad, have been frequent victims of the Shiite militias this year. They carry the twin stigmas of being Sunni Arabs and of having enjoyed privileges under Saddam Hussein who, as part of his campaign to fashion himself into a Pan-Arab leader, was solicitous of their support. The housing complex that was attacked was created by the Baath Party for Palestinians who fled to Iraq following the creation of Israel in 1948." The Washington Post (12/14, A25, Trejos, 690K) runs a similar story.

Defying US Policy, Democratic Senator Meets With Syrian President. The AP (12/14, Flaherty) reports, "In a direct affront to the Bush administration, a Democratic senator spent an hour Wednesday with Syrian President Bashar Assad in Damascus, emerging from the meeting to say Assad was willing to help control the Iraq-Syrian border." Florida Sen. Bill Nelson, a member of the Armed Services and Foreign Relations committees, "met with Assad after the State Department said that it disapproved of his trip. The United States has limited diplomatic ties with Syria because of its support of Hezbollah and Hamas, which the US deems terrorist organizations, and President Bush has expressed reluctance to seek help from Damascus on Iraq until the Syrians curb that support and reduce their influence in Lebanon."

McClatchy (12/14, Clark) reports, "Midway through the Florida Democrat's conference call with reporters, however, the White House issued a statement denouncing the Syrian government's human rights record and calling on it to 'immediately free all political prisoners.' … The administration said the statement on Syria's human rights was unrelated to Nelson's visit, but White House spokesman Tony Snow said the administration didn't 'think that members of Congress ought to be going there.'" He also "said the White House had opposed Syria's involvement in Lebanon and noted that 'it's a real stretch to think the Syrians don't know where we stand or what we think.'"

On Fox News' Your World (12/13, Cavuto), Sen. Jon Kyl discussed Nelson's meeting with Assad. Kyl said, "Bill Nelson's a friend of mine and I don't mean to be too critical. But it does seem to me that each team has one quarterback. We elect a president to be our spokesman with foreign countries. And he does speak, through the State Department. And certainly, elected senators are not supposed to be part of that diplomatic team. … The Iraq Study Group is a nice group of people and they have given their advice to the President. He's taken it under advisement. That doesn't mean that it's now the policy of the United States government, or most especially, that 100 individual senators then decide to go off on their own and be the spokesman for the United States. Especially with a country like Syria, you've got to speak with a very clear message. And you can't do that if you've got 100 different people with different messages talking to him."

The Washington Times (12/14, Dinan, 88K) reports Sen. Christopher J. Dodd "said he is also planning a visit to Syria during his upcoming trip to the Middle East. 'When you've got governments like Syria which have influence on the course of events, it's important to engage with them,' he said."

Nearly 2,100 Taliban Fighters Killed Since September. The AP (12/14, Straziuso) reports, "Almost 2,100 militants have been killed in Afghanistan since Sept. 1 in operations involving coalition special forces soldiers, a US Army spokesman said. That means more than half of the country's insurgency-related deaths this year have come in the last three months." The AP adds, "About 900 of the 2,077 deaths came during Operation Medusa, a major offensive in September in the southern province of Kandahar. Special forces soldiers worked alongside conventional forces from Canada during the fight. The two primary missions for the US special forces soldiers in Afghanistan are conducting counterterrorism operations and supporting NATO troops, Master Sgt. Clifford Richardson said in an interview this week at Bagram, the main US base in Afghanistan."

NBC Nightly News (12/13, story 7, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "This year, the Taliban, which has made a dramatic comeback, has killed more than 150 US and NATO soldiers, up four times over last year." NBC (Maceda) added, "This is the new Taliban country, a no-man's land filled with fighters for hire, drug dealers, warlords and assorted criminals. In the towns of Waziristan, armed Islamic militants hold sway governing like a state within a state. Some call it the heart of 'Jihadistan.' Taliban and Al Qaeda fighters launch attacks inside Afghanistan and regroup back in Pakistan. They are using an Al Qaeda tactic, suicide bombers, often trained and equipped by recruiters in Pakistan. … The President of Pakistan Pervez Musharraf is under increasing US pressure to clean out the place. But some three years of military offensives by some 80,000 troops have failed. Another strategy that hasn't worked, pulling Pakistani troops back. That's led to even more cross border attacks. As the Taliban haven thrives, winning America's forgotten war next door becomes even harder."

State Department Offering Bonuses To Entice Service In Iraq, Afghanistan. The Washington Times (12/14, A1, Kralev, 88K) reports on its front page that "nearly two-thirds of the 276 Foreign Service members who volunteered to serve in Iraq next year were found unqualified for the jobs, aggravating a shortage that has left the State Department scrambling to fully staff its embassy and other operations in the country." As a result, the department is "now offering improved benefits and career-enhancing inducements in a bid to fill 49 vacancies in Iraq" and "all assignments to other foreign missions have been put on hold until openings in Iraq, Afghanistan and other high-priority posts are filled." In a cable to all US embassies and consulates earlier this month, State said "276 Foreign Service members applied for 160 positions in Iraq beginning next summer, but only 82 were approved," leaving some diplomats "perplexed by the department's decision to reject so many of its own, while so-called career-development officers are now scrambling to find 'clients' to volunteer for the jobs."

DOJ:

Grassley Recommends Three Iowans For US Attorney Nomination. The Des Moines Register (12/14, 160K) reports Sen. Charles Grassley yesterday recommended three nominees "to the White House…as candidates to become the new U.S. attorney for the Northern District of Iowa. … The current chief prosecutor, U.S. Attorney Charles W. Larson Sr., is retiring at the end of the year." The Register notes, "The candidates recommended by Grassley are: Matt Dummermuth, a native of Elgin who currently works for the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice in Washington, D.C. … Chadwicke Groover of Cedar Rapids, who has worked in in the Northern District office since April and served on the Senate Judiciary Committee staff for five years. … Lisa Krigsten, a native of Sioux City who currently works for the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice in Washington, D.C."

US Awards $45 Million Anti-Corruption Grant To Ukraine. Ukraine's Kyiv Post (12/14, Mashchenko) reports, "Ukrainian Economy Minister Volodymyr Makukha inked a $45 million anti-corruption grant from the U.S. during a recent trip to Washington D.C. The United States government has approved a $45 million grant to help Ukraine fight state graft, with another $500 million in the wings." The Post adds, "At a Dec. 12 press conference in Kyiv, Makukha outlined the components of the grant program: The strengthening of monitoring of civil society and exposure of public corruption; judicial reform; the monitoring and enforcement of ethical and administrative standards; the streamlining of enforcement of regulations; and combating corruption in higher education." The Post notes, "Millenium Challenge's assistance to Ukraine falls under what it refers to as its Threshold Program, an intermediary stage on the way to greater funding, known as Compact assistance. 'The Threshold Program assistance is used to help countries address the specific policy weaknesses indicated by the country's scores on 16 policy indicators,' reads a Millenium Challenge press release. … The Ukraine Threshold program targets many of these obstacles and will be administered by the United States Agency for International Development (USAID) and the U.S. Department of Justice."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Skilling Reports To Prison. The AP (12/14, Condon) reports, "This was what one of Wall Street's biggest success stories had come to. Jeffrey Skilling rode past a dozen waiting reporters and photographers, got out of the silver Jeep Liberty, hugged his wife and walked quietly into a life of imprisonment and menial jobs that will pay him less over the next two decades than he made for a single hour as chief executive of Enron. … This was nothing like metropolitan Houston, but rather a farm town in Minnesota. There was no $4.7 million Mediterranean-style mansion, but a one-time college dormitory room. Skilling reported to the Federal Correctional Institution on Wednesday." The AP notes, "Barring a successful appeal, even with time off for good behavior, the 53-year-old Skilling will be an old man at the end of his term -- 24 years, four months, more than twice as long as the sentence of any other Enron executive. … An important distinction, said former Task Force attorney Sam Buell, is that those below Skilling all pleaded guilty to some offenses, expressed remorse and in some cases went on to cooperate with the prosecution. In several instances, prosecutors recommended leniency in those sentences." NBC Nightly News (12/13, story 5, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) noted Skilling "was accompanied by his brother Mark and wife Rebecca as he arrived at the minimum security facility to begin his 24-year sentence for fraud and other crimes committed."

The Washington Post (12/14, D1, Johnson, 690K) reports, "Skilling's sentencing in October marked the last in a series of stiff penalties given to top executives convicted of corporate crimes committed in the booming '90s. His prison term is only a few months shorter than that of WorldCom founder Bernard J. Ebbers, who is serving a 25-year sentence in Louisiana for spearheading an accounting fraud at the telecommunications company he founded." The Post notes, "Skilling, who continues to profess his innocence and make the case that Enron was a healthy enterprise, will spend his time alongside 1,070 other inmates, most of whom were incarcerated for committing federal drug crimes, said Felicia Ponce, a prison spokeswoman. Skilling will be required to work 7 1/2 hours per day at one of a variety of institutional jobs, including food service worker, warehouse employee and groundskeeper. Inmates earn between 12 and 40 cents per hour."

The Houston Chronicle (12/14, A1, Hays, 530K) reports, "Sam Buell, a former prosecutor for the Justice Department's disbanded Enron Task Force who led the government's effort to secure the 2004 indictment against Skilling, said no one's incarceration is a cause for celebration, but 'following through on the law's word is absolutely necessary to making effective our most potent mechanism for deterring people from seriously harming others.'" Buell added "that whether a multidecade sentence is needed to achieve such deterrence should be debated. Skilling received by far the harshest punishment of anyone convicted of Enron-related crimes. 'For major fraud that did in a huge public company, the answer has to be at least a substantial number of years. Whether decades are really necessary is a question we ought to be discussing as a society,' Buell said."

Judge Rejects Scrushy-Siegelman Motion For Retrial. The Wall Street Journal (12/14, B7, Brooks, 2.04M) reports, "Richard M. Scrushy moved a step closer to a possible prison sentence as a federal judge rejected the HealthSouth Corp. founder's claim that jurors who convicted him of political-corruption charges were influenced by emails and a copy of an indictment downloaded from the Internet during deliberations." US District Judge Mark Fuller "refused to grant a motion for a new trial by Mr. Scrushy and former Alabama Gov. Don Siegelman, both found guilty in June of participation in a scheme to pay $500,000 bribes in return for a spot on a state regulatory panel. Both argued that two jurors used outside information to strong-arm the rest of the jury into a conviction." The Journal adds, "While the judge concluded that jurors were 'exposed' to the indictment and a description of jury-foreman responsibilities posted on the court's Web site, it made no difference in the outcome of the 11-day deliberations, he ruled." Scrushy lawyer Arthur Leach "said he plans to appeal yesterday's ruling."

Lawmakers Demand Hurd Explain H-P Options Timing. The AP (12/14, Robertson) reports, "The congressional panel investigating Hewlett-Packard Co.'s boardroom spying probe has demanded that CEO Mark Hurd explain $1.37 million worth of options he exercised just before the scandal became public. Hurd's cashout Aug. 25 — before HP disclosed the spying tactics in a Sept. 6 regulatory filing — did not appear to be part of a prescheduled program, the panel's ranking members, Reps. John Dingell and Bart Stupak…said in a letter to Hurd publicly released Wednesday. The activity came the same day Hurd was questioned by HP's outside attorneys investigating the circumstances surrounding the ill-fated effort to ferret out leaks by board members to the news media, the letter stated." The AP adds, "Dingell and Stupak also asked in the letter to 'please inform us whether any other HP officers or directors engaged in similar transactions during this period.' He was given until Dec. 21 to comply with the request." The Financial Times (12/14, Allison) notes that the letter said,

"Continuing revelations about widespread 'backdating' and 'spring-loading' abuses have raised questions about whether executives are cashing in ('bullet dodging') while in posession of potentially damaging material facts that shareholders do not know."

H-P Board Drops Prominent Legal Advisor. The New York Times (12/14, Darlin, 1.16M) reports, "Hewlett-Packard's board has ended a crucial advisory relationship with Larry W. Sonsini, the powerful Silicon Valley lawyer, according to a person with close connections to the board. … After the year's end, Mr. Sonsini and the firm he helped build, Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, will no longer serve as outside counsel to the board. The law firm will still do legal work for Hewlett-Packard." The Times notes, "Mr. Sonsini and his firm were not involved in the spying," but "he was caught up in the events, and was criticized for failing to prevent the incident from damaging the H.P. H.P.'s search for another lawyer to serve as outside counsel is expected to set off a scramble among Silicon Valley firms."

Hurd Tells Analysts H-P Continues To Diversify, Streamline. IDG News Service (12/13, Montalbano) reported, "Hewlett-Packard Co. continues to diversify and streamline its business according to goals CEO Mark Hurd set when he joined the company nearly two years ago. But the company still needs to cut costs to achieve operational efficiency, Hurd told financial analysts today. 'We are a company that is transforming, we are not a company that has transformed,' Hurd said, speaking at a meeting of securities analysts here. Hurd acknowledged that the cost of operations is still too high for the company to run as efficiently as it should, though the company has completed a 10% workforce reduction started last year as part of a huge restructuring effort." IDG noted, "Complicating this goal is HP's acquisition strategy, as the company is working to absorb companies it purchased in 2006."

SEC Eases Sarbanes-Oxley Rules Amid "Flurry" Of Deregulation Orders. The New York Times (12/14, Labaton, 1.16M) reports, "Responding to criticism that regulators had overreacted to years of major corporate scandals, the Securities and Exchange Commission on Wednesday issued a flurry of deregulatory orders and proposals intended to lower costs to public companies. It said the moves would not reduce investor protection. In a daylong proceeding, the commission proposed a loose interpretation for smaller companies of an auditing provision of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act," and it "proposed a rule to make it easier for foreign companies to withdraw their securities from American markets. … 'We hope these proposals, when combined, will make the U.S. markets more attractive and we will get more companies here,' said John W. White, director of the commission's division of corporation finance." SEC also proposed increasing "the financial qualifications for investors in hedge funds, to a net worth of $2.5 million from the current standard of $1 million," and suggested "a new provision on fraud to protect hedge fund investors." The Times notes, "The S.E.C.'s deregulatory push came a day after the Justice Department, in response to similar complaints, imposed new limits on federal prosecutors in white-collar corruption cases. … Like the decision at the Justice Department," the SEC changes "fell short of what some companies and groups had sought."

The Washington Post (12/14, D1, Johnson, 690K) reports the commission "voted 5 to 0…to instruct corporate managers to focus their reviews on the areas that pose the greatest risk of fraud on financial statements. … The rule, which cost businesses millions of dollars more than regulators anticipated, has been a lightning rod…becoming what SEC Chairman Christopher Cox called 'the single biggest challenge' in the accountability law. SEC staff members said that under the new proposal, they would urge corporate managers to use their best judgment in evaluating controls, rather than requiring them to scrutinize specific things such as the integrity of executives and the accuracy of petty cash accounts." Additionally, the Post notes, "Concerns are mounting that more average investors and pension funds are pouring money into the $1 trillion hedge fund industry, which is subject to little oversight. … 'We want to make sure that we send a strong signal . . . that caution is in order,' Cox said. 'We're taking steps to modernize the standard so it will be abundantly clear that these investments are not for mom and pop, unless mom and pop are very sophisticated investors.'"

The Wall Street Journal (12/14, C1, Scannell, 2.04M) reports that the e-proxy rule, also passed yesterday, "allows companies to distribute via the Internet annual reports and materials on board elections and other matters put before shareholders for a vote, while enabling investors to opt to continue to receive paper reports." The rule "will cut printing and mailing costs for corporations. But it will also make it cheaper for activist stockholders to launch fights against corporate boards, because shareholders of companies that distribute information to investors electronically will be able to do likewise. The agency said it plans to make the e-proxy model mandatory by January 2008, though some members expressed concern about doing that." The Journal also reports on the Sarbanes-Oxley changes and hedge fund proposal.

Monster Worldwide Discloses Improper Payments To Founder. Bloomberg (12/14) reports, "Monster Worldwide, owner of the most used online job-listing service, reduced past earnings by $271.9 million yesterday to correct stock-based compensation costs, and it disclosed more than $500,000 in improper payments to its founder, Andrew J. McKelvey. The restatements cut net income for 2005 by $9.24 million, for 2004 by $14.4 million, for 2003 by $27 million, for 2002 by $44.9 million, for 2001 by $65.6 million, and for the cumulative period of 1997 through 2000 by $110.8 million, the company said in a statement." Bloomberg notes, "From 1997 to 2003, options grants were misdated 'intentionally, by persons formerly in positions of responsibility,' to increase their value, the company said. … The company said in June that internal auditors, the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission had started reviewing options grants. … Investigators found that the company had paid for health care costs of nine relatives of Mr. McKelvey and nine people who were personally employed by him at varying times since 1997. It also granted stock options to four of his personal employees. Monster also disclosed payments of thousands of dollars in rent and aircraft fees to businesses owned or controlled by Mr. McKelvey."

Bloomberg Columnist Scoffs At Muni Market Investigation. In a Bloomberg (12/14) syndicated column, Joe Mysak writes, "This is how the government's case against the municipal market will look. The Department of Justice will put out a press release. It will read something like this: 'In the first prosecution of its kind, the Justice Department's Antitrust Division today brought criminal securities fraud charges against a securities brokerage firm for using fictitious noncompetitive bids and other misrepresentations during the restructuring of a municipal bond escrow account.' … Yet the above paragraph isn't a look into the future. Insert 'California' in front of 'securities brokerage firm' and 'Tampa, Florida,' in front of 'municipal bond escrow account,' and you have the wording of a Department of Justice press release sent out on Sept. 28, 1995," against Municipal Government Investment Associates. Mysak adds, "Here it is more than a decade later, and a full investigation and round of settlements later, and the government says it is still looking at bid-rigging, price-fixing, kickbacks and 'anticompetitive practices' in the municipal bond market's reinvestment of proceeds business. … Why didn't they finish the job? Is the market better off for the extra decade of profitable, unfathomable shenanigans? What happened?"

CRIMINAL LAW:

Gonzales Says DOJ Will Pursue Civil Commitments For Sex Offenders. In a front-page story, USA Today (12/14, Johnson, 2.27M) reports, "The Justice Department is planning to detain an undetermined number of violent sex offenders after they have completed their federal prison sentences as part of a program aimed at protecting children, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says. The initiative, modeled after 'civil commitment' laws in 18 states that have kept 2,000 sex offenders locked up for mental health treatment after they served their sentences, will identify federal inmates who authorities think would pose a threat if freed. It's unclear how officials will decide which offenders should be held past their sentences. … Congress has 'given us the right to pursue (civil commitments) and we are going to,' Gonzales told prosecutors…last week." USA notes, "Critics say that such programs unfairly extend punishments beyond sentences set by judges and juries. 'This is merely camouflage for lifetime sentences for some offenses,' says William Buckman of the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers."

Gonzales Waging "Historic" Battle Against Child Sexual Abuse. Under the headline "Gonzales Concentrates Outrage On Child Abuse," USA Today (12/14, 13A, Johnson, 2.27M) reports that shortly after being named Attorney General, Alberto Gonzales "stopped at Drew Oosterbaan's office a few blocks from the department's headquarters. What happened during the next hour, Gonzales says, haunts him to this day. … Gonzales watched silently as streaming video captured from the Internet showed fathers sexually assaulting their daughters, some younger than 10. … Rebecca Gonzales, the attorney general's wife, vividly recalls that day. The nation's top law enforcement officer, she says, arrived home clearly shaken." She noted, "It changed him. That day put fire in him." USA adds, "Passion and emotion aren't things the public sees much of from Gonzales," who, "unlike his predecessor…often fades into the background at his own news conferences," but "punishing abusers has become a particular passion with Gonzales, who is emphasizing the issue like no other attorney general before him. He has launched an energetic campaign by the Justice Department to confront sexual predators with new prosecution tactics, new programs and the promise of more money to combat the problem. Arrests and prosecutions…have risen sharply since Gonzales took office nearly two years ago." National Center for Missing and Exploited Children Ernie Allen "says Gonzales communicates a 'sense of urgency' no other public official of his rank has attempted. 'What he is doing,' Allen says, 'is historic.'" USA Today (12/14, 13A, 2.27M) also includes a brief "Gonzales File" sidebar.

Children's Magazine Editor Sentenced To Six Years In Prison For Solicitation. The AP (12/14, Ngowi) reports, "A former editor for the company that publishes the venerable Weekly Reader, a newspaper for elementary school children, was sentenced Wednesday to six years in prison for soliciting sex from a minor. Noel Neff, 47, of Norwalk, Conn., also was fined $2,500, barred from using the Internet to access child pornography sites and ordered not to associate with anyone under the age of 18 without supervision from an adult who is aware of his criminal record. … His attorney, Francis O'Reilly, said his client planned to appeal." The AP notes, "Investigators said he had arranged to meet with a 14-year-old boy named Chris for sex. Chris was actually an FBI agent who had been posing as a minor and exchanging instant messages with Neff for two months, according to authorities."

Illinois Church Camp Counselor Arrested On Child Porn, Solicitation Charges. The AP (12/14) reports from Columbia, Illinois, "A former church camp leader was arrested on child pornography charges and accused of trying to coax girls, at least one of them a former camper, to pose partly naked or perform a sex act. Aaron Niles, 20, began chatting with the girls online…after working at a Baptist summer camp in 2005, Columbia Police Chief Joe Edwards said Wednesday. He was arrested Tuesday on three counts of child pornography and one count of indecent solicitation of a child related to incidents in April and May." The AP adds, "Investigators were still combing through Niles' computer Wednesday, but 'once we complete this, the potential for additional charges are there,' Edwards said."

DOJ Posts Sex Offender Information On New Web Site. WNWO-TV Toledo (12/13) reported on its Web site, "The justice department has opened a web site which offers photographs and information about offenders, including the neighborhoods they live in and how close they are to schools. Currently, it has records from 22 states. The remaining records are expected to be online by the end of the year."

US Obtains Criminal Subpoena For Classified Document Leaked To ACLU. The Washington Post (12/14, A8, Eggen, 690K) reports, "Federal prosecutors are demanding that the American Civil Liberties Union turn over all copies of a secret document it has obtained, in what is apparently the first time a criminal grand jury subpoena has been used in an attempt to seize leaked material, the ACLU and legal experts said yesterday. Prosecutors obtained the subpoena Nov. 20, saying their demand was part of an investigation into an alleged violation of the Espionage Act of 1917. The ACLU says that the 3 1/2 -page document contains no information that should be classified and that the memo is only 'mildly embarrassing' to the government. Some legal scholars said the case bears similarities to events in the 'Pentagon Papers' case." The Post adds that the case "provides the latest example of the Justice Department's aggressive use of the anti-spying law," and "the ACLU called the subpoena an 'unprecedented abuse' of the government's grand-jury powers that violates the First Amendment." The Post notes, "The subpoena was issued after the ACLU refused a verbal demand from Assistant U.S. Attorney Jennifer G. Rodgers to turn over all copies of the memo, the group said."

The New York Times (12/14, Liptak, 1.16M) notes, "The novelty in the government's approach is in its broad use of a grand jury subpoena, which is typically a way to gather evidence, rather than to confiscate all traces of it. But the subpoena issued to the ACLU seeks 'any and all copies' of a document e-mailed to it unsolicited in October, indicating that the government also wants to prevent further dissemination of the information in the document." The Times adds, "The subpoena raised the possibility that the government had found a new tool to stop the dissemination of secrets, one that could avoid the all but absolute constitutional prohibition on prior restraints on publication."

Judge Sentences "Girls Gone Wild" Owner To Community Service, Fine. The AP (12/14, Nelson) reports, "The multimillionaire founder of the popular 'Girls Gone Wild' video empire was sentenced to community service on Wednesday after the company pleaded guilty to federal charges of failing to monitor the ages of the women it films. Mantra Films Inc. also agreed to pay $1.6 million in fines for using drunken 17-year-olds in videos it filed on Panama City Beach during Spring Break and failing to properly label its DVDs and videos as required by federal law. U.S. District Judge Richard Smoak told company founder Joe Francis he added the community service to the fine because it did not appear a fine would be a meaningful punishment to the 33-year-old Francis, who makes an estimated $40 million a year." The AP adds that "company president Scott Barbour also was ordered to complete eight hours of community service monthly for the next 30 months."

Boeing Laptop Stolen, Exposing 382,000 Employees, Retirees To ID Theft. The AP (12/14) reports, "A Boeing Co. laptop containing the names and Social Security numbers of 382,000 workers and retirees has been stolen, putting the employees at risk for identity theft and credit-card fraud. The theft, which was confirmed Tuesday, was the third such incident at Boeing in just over a year. Files on the computer also contained home addresses, phone numbers and birth dates. Some of the files listed salary information." Boeing spokesman Tim Neale said that "the laptop was stolen earlier this month when an employee left it unattended," but "no proprietary, customer or supplier data were on the computer."

Illegal Meatpacking Worker Probe Uncovered ID Theft Ring. USA Today (12/14, 3A, Leinwand, 2.27M) reports, "A federal investigation that ended Tuesday in a raid on six meatpacking plants has uncovered criminal groups around the country that steal real birth certificates, Social Security cards and other documents and sell them to illegal workers, federal officials said. One fraud ring mailed dozens of Puerto Rican birth certificates to a Worthington, Minn., man who resold them for as much as $1,000 to illegal workers as part of a set of identity documents. Some of the sets were bought by workers at the meatpacking plants, Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) spokesman Marc Raimondi said." USA notes, "In recent months, ICE agents have arrested members of document rings in Minnesota, Texas, Utah and Puerto Rico. Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said federal agents continue to investigate fraud rings tied to Tuesday's arrests" at Swift meatpacking plants."

Plea Of Pellicano Co-Defendant Could Benefit Prosecution. The Los Angeles Times (12/14, Krikorian, 850K) reports, "The federal investigation of Anthony Pellicano took a surprising turn Tuesday when one of his co-defendants pleaded guilty to using the former private eye to wiretap a Beverly Hills businessman six years ago." The Times continues, "In an appearance before U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer, Daniel Nicherie also pleaded guilty to three other felony counts of defrauding the Beverly Hills businessman and others through pension fraud, wire fraud and money laundering." It was unclear what impact his "plea will have on the ongoing Pellicano investigation because the U.S. government's allegations about Nicherie's actions would clearly make him a troubling witness for the prosecution." But he "could provide authorities with another example of how Pellicano illegally spied on others."

Tennessee Inmate At Center Of Debate Over Executing Mentally Impaired. The Wall Street Journal (12/14, A1, Fields, 2.04M) reports, "At 8:30 a.m., Gregory Thompson, his hands cuffed to his waist, has already swallowed eight of the 12 pills he takes a day. Mr. Thompson is on death row at the Riverbend Maximum Security Institution, and like many prison inmates, he is mentally ill." The Journal notes, "On New Year's Day 1985, he abducted Brenda Blanton Lane from a shopping-center parking lot in Shelbyville, Tenn., while stealing her car. He fatally stabbed the 28-year-old four times in the back. … Today, however, Mr. Thompson's case is at the center of a complex debate about the death penalty in the U.S. Recently, the Supreme Court ruled that mentally retarded defendants and juveniles cannot be sentenced to death. Mr. Thompson is asking the courts to decide whether mentally ill prisoners can be executed if rendered competent only by medication. His twice-delayed execution and similar cases are working through the judicial system; one will likely end up in front of the high court." The Journal adds, "Mr. Thompson is now arguing he is not competent to be executed because his mental condition has deteriorated. His appeal also tries to make the case that it's unconstitutional to execute a defendant made competent only through medication."

Mckinley, 1.16M) reports that at the Black Repertory Theater of Berkeley on Wednesday, actors reenacted "the execution of the convicted killer Stanley Tookie Williams, staged on the first anniversary of his death by lethal injection at San Quentin State Prison. The performance was written and produced by Barbara Becnel and Shirley Neal, two friends of Mr. Williams and death penalty opponents, who were unapologetic about their play's being agitprop. 'This is political theater in the extreme,' Ms. Becnel told a crowd of about 150 people who gathered to watch the performance." The Times notes, "The execution of Mr. Williams, 51, a founder of the Crips gang who was convicted of murdering four people in 1979, has continued to be a rallying point for death penalty opponents as well as a source of contention about the methods of lethal injection."

Dutch Counterfeit Goods Inspector Seen As Best In World. The Wall Street Journal (12/14, A1, Miller, 2.04M) reports, "From his perch at the North Sea port of Antwerp, Chris De Buysscher can look at thousands of 40-foot container units and pick out those most likely to contain fake Nikes, Marlboros or Dior jackets. When he's off work, the 51-year-old Belgian can spot a knockoff Louis Vuitton bag from across a crowded, smoke-filled room. Mr. De Buysscher is widely regarded among his peers as the best counterfeit-goods inspector in the world," and "the global boom in counterfeit goods has Mr. De Buysscher very busy. In the past two years, tiny Belgium has seized about 40 million counterfeit items, the most taken by any nation in the European Union. And about 90% of the Belgian seizures came from Mr. De Buysscher's three-person team policing the 22 miles of Antwerp docks." The Journal notes, "His skills are a low-tech blend of old-fashioned gumshoe detective work and intuition."

New York Judge's "Probation" System Raises Concerns. The New York Times (12/14, A1, Glaberson, 1.16M) reports from Keeseville, N.Y., "Like many teenagers in this bleak old mill village near Lake Champlain, Michael C. Burrell had been in trouble before. But when an attempted assault case landed him at age 19 in the courtroom of the village justice, the experience was unlike anything he had faced before. He said the justice, George J. Head, insisted that they meet each week outside court, in what people around here call his 'judge's probation' program. There is no such thing as judge's probation, and private sessions between a judge and a defendant facing jail violate rules of judicial conduct. But Justice Head seems to have stretched the rules in a number of ways. When he sentenced young men to regular probation, he sometimes drove them to their appointments. One young man was discovered driving the justice's car, and others say they met with the justice at his home. One said he even wound up moving in for eight months." The Times adds, "Now the system is under scrutiny by state officials, who are holding hearings and taking steps to fix some of its most glaring flaws. What has played out in this remote village in northeastern New York provides one more startling look at what can happen when meager training mixes with plenty of unchecked power. 'Judge Head rules Keeseville, and God help you if you oppose him,' said Diane Webster-Brady, the lawyer who handled Mr. Burrell's case."

Kevorkian To Be Paroled In June. The AP (12/14, Hoffman) reports, "Assisted suicide advocate Jack Kevorkian, the ailing former pathologist who claimed to have assisted in at least 130 deaths in the 1990s, will be paroled in June, state Corrections Department spokesman Leo Lalonde said Wednesday. … Kevorkian has promised he would not assist in a suicide if he was released from prison." The AP notes, "Mayer Morganroth, Kevorkian's attorney, said in July that his client had less than a year to live. Gov. Jennifer Granholm ordered corrections authorities to carry out an independent medical evaluation of Kevorkian, but did not commute the retired pathologist's sentence, as Morganroth had hoped."

Judge Approves Settlement In Alabama College Desegregation Case. The AP (12/14) reports, "U.S. District Judge Harold Murphy approved agreements settling the case, which has so far generated $210 million in state funds for the desegregation effort, most of it going to historically black Alabama A&M and Alabama State universities. In his order Tuesday, Murphy agreed with both sides that there is no reason for further action. He said the state, its historically white universities and other defendants have eliminated traces of segregation 'to the extent practicable and consistent with sound educational practice ... and have demonstrated their commitment to continuing to operate in a constitutional and nondiscriminatory fashion.'" The AP notes, "The U.S. Justice Department sued Alabama in 1981, after state officials and university administrators were unable to agree on a corrective plan. More plaintiffs were added over the years."

Suburban Chicago Town Settles Fair Housing Act Charges. The AP (12/14) reports South Elgin, Ill., "will allow Unity House Inc. to operate a home for up to seven residents recovering from drug or alcohol addiction under an agreement that settles allegations of Fair Housing Act violations, the U.S. Justice Department announced Wednesday. Federal prosecutors had argued the Village of South Elgin violated the act by refusing a permit for the establishment of a group home for alleged substance abusers. Village Attorney Derke Price said officials had been concerned about allowing a business in a residential area. The settlement also calls for South Elgin to pay $25,000 in damages to Unity House, $7,500 each to two residents who were not able to live in the home when the permit was denied and $15,000 to the United States as a civil penalty." The AP notes US Attorney Patrick J. Fitzgerald said in a statement, "This settlement should send a message to other communities that no municipality, driven by neighborhood opposition, can prohibit persons recovering from addictions from enjoying the benefits of living in the safe and supportive environment of a group home."

DNA Not Linked To Duke Lacrosse Players. The AP (12/14, Scott) reports, "DNA testing in the Duke lacrosse rape case found genetic material from several males in the accuser's body and her underwear -- but none from any team member, defense attorneys said in court papers Wednesday. The papers were filed by attorneys for the three lacrosse players charged, Reade Seligmann, Collin Finnerty and David Evans. They complained that the information about DNA from other men was not disclosed in a report prosecutors provided earlier this year to the defense." The AP adds, "In an interview, defense attorney Joseph Cheshire said the findings suggest the accuser had sex shortly before the March team party where she was hired to perform as a stripper. … District Attorney Mike Nifong declined to comment on the defense motion."

The Los Angeles Times (12/14, Zucchino, 850K) reports, "The DNA…was not mentioned in the lab's final report, submitted to the Durham district attorney's office in May and subsequently provided to the defense. Defense lawyers found references to the DNA while scouring 1,844 documents handed over by the lab Oct. 27 under a judge's order. DNA Security Inc. in Burlington, N.C., initially refused to provide them, citing cost and privacy." The Times notes, "Last week, U.S. Rep. Walter B. Jones…asked the Justice Department to investigate whether Nifong committed 'prosecutorial misconduct' and violated the defendants' civil rights."

Massachusetts Anti-Gay Marriage Amendment Supporters Sue Lawmakers. The AP (12/14, Leblanc) reports, "Supporters of an anti-gay marriage measure filed a lawsuit in federal court Wednesday seeking up to $5 million in damages from Massachusetts lawmakers who blocked a final vote on the proposed constitutional amendment last month. The lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court by the group VoteOnMarriage.org, claims the 109 state lawmakers violated the supporters' rights to free speech and right to petition the government." The AP adds, "The legislature is scheduled to take up the question again Jan. 2, the last day of the session. Supporters of the question fear lawmakers will again avoid taking a vote, killing the proposed amendment."

Lawmakers, Workers Concerned By Proposed Airline Mergers. ABC World News (12/13, story 2, 2:50, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "A lot of airlines these days are feeling the urge to merge. United wants Continental, US Airways wants Delta, Air Tran wants Midwest. No indication that any of the deals may come to fruition, indeed there are considerable obstacles to each one. There is an indication that airlines feel they need to combine to cut costs. For what this means to industry and more importantly to everyone who flies, here is ABC's Lisa Stark." ABC (Stark) added, "Airline analysts say this could be the start of a merger feeding frenzy. All the airlines are talking and no one wants to be the odd man out if the deal-making begins in earnest. The talks between United and Continental are characterized as very preliminary, but analysts say on paper combining the two makes sense." Jay Kuenzle, Delta pilot: "We are not interested at all with a US Air hostile takeover." Stark: "Delta employees today made their feelings quite clear, but many say mergers are inevitable. … The question is, when these corporate marriages might take place and who could end up together. "

The AP (12/14, Carpenter) reports, "A long-anticipated consolidation of U.S. airlines could mean higher fares for travelers as overlapping routes are eliminated, experts said Wednesday as talk of likely deals reverberated throughout the industry. That's one reason why any such buyouts could draw intensified regulatory scrutiny, along with the potential for increased labor and service disruptions, as some consumer advocates warn." The AP adds, "Numerous regulatory and other obstacles remain before any deal can occur, but industry observers said all the talks and recent airline restructurings have set the stage for big changes in the business next year." Rep. James Oberstar, "who will chair the House Transportation Committee in Congress next year, said he will not hesitate to hold hearings next year to 'expose the anti-competitive effects' of airline industry consolidation and to 'nudge the Justice Department' to use its power to stop potential acquisitions."

The New York Times (12/14, Bailey, 1.16M) reports, "Discussions about a possible deal between United Airlines and Continental Airlines came to light this week. And if one big merger goes through, other airlines will probably feel compelled to pair off as well or wind up at a competitive disadvantage because they have higher costs or smaller route networks. But less financial misery for airlines often means more bad news for their passengers — since, in this business, misery tends to be a zero-sum game." The Times also notes, "Concerned about rising fares and the potential for reduced air service to small communities," Oberstar "said yesterday that the Justice Department should block any major airline merger. If it does not, Mr. Oberstar said, he would call hearings before his committee to consider action to block such mergers (three steps are necessary to approve an airline deal: the Transportation Department must determine that a merger is financially viable, the Federal Aviation Administration must approve a certificate of safety, and the Justice Department must determine that there are no antitrust issues)."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (12/14, Hirschman, 379K) reports, "A raucous crowd of more than 3,000 Delta Air Lines workers alternately cheered, booed, clapped and hissed Wednesday as they loudly expressed opposition to a takeover bid by rival US Airways. Delta employee groups used the nearly two-hour rally to bash Tempe, Ariz.-based US Airways and its CEO, Doug Parker, in pointed, personal terms. He was compared to vilified airline raiders Carl Icahn and Frank Lorenzo and even the fictional Gordon Gekko from the movie 'Wall Street.'" The AJC adds, "Georgia's U.S. senators, Saxby Chambliss and Johnny Isakson, lauded the Delta workers and urged them to back management efforts to preserve Delta's history and independence. Chambliss said he told Parker in a Washington meeting that he and other members of the Georgia delegation stoutly oppose the deal and plan hearings to pressure the Justice Department to reject it as anti-competitive. … His argument may have been buttressed by reports Wednesday that United and Continental airlines are talking about a merger."

The KSL-TV Salt Lake City (12/13) reported on its Web site, "Utah legislators are concerned about the future of Delta Airlines, especially if the company merges with US Airways. Even though Delta has given no indication of a merger Utah officials are being proactive," the Utah House is "asking the Justice Department now to consider the risks such a move would pose for Utah's economy before approving a merger in the future." KSL noted, "When US Airways made the offer to Delta last month they assured Governor Huntsman the move would not adversely affect Utah. Legislators say their request to the Justice Department is just making sure that promise is kept."

USA Today (12/14, 1B, Reed, 2.27M) reports, "One small takeover bid — and the possibility of a much bigger one — rocked the airline world Wednesday, moving stock prices and fueling speculation about the future shape of the industry. Midwest Airlines…rejected a public offer of $290 million in stock and cash from Orlando-based AirTran," but "AirTran CEO Joe Leonard says he won't give up his pursuit, which has involved several previous, private offers that Midwest's board rebuffed. Meanwhile, continued speculation about a possible merger of United Airlines and Continental Airlines fueled a growing buzz about industry consolidation." USA notes, "Neither Continental nor United would confirm that they are in talks. Two industry sources with knowledge of the discussions, being conducted privately, said the merger talks are active. They cautioned that no announcement is imminent and that a merger may never occur."

The Chicago Tribune (12/14, Johnsson, 617K) reports, "Once the frenzy has subsided, and all the airline industry consolidation has been digested, Chicago could find itself home to the country's biggest carrier, a supersize United Airlines, or home to none at all. Passengers could be looking at higher fares or more bargains. They also could be in for a long, confusing period of service upheaval, industry analysts say." The Tribune notes, "When the dust settles, analysts think the six major airlines atop the U.S. market could meld into three megacarriers, though there is no guarantee any of the deals will get done. … Any deals must be approved by federal antitrust regulators, however, and they traditionally have been wary of large-scale consolidation."

Stock Arrangement Would Give Northwest Veto Over Continental-United Merger. The Washington Times (12/14, Lengell, 88K) reports Continental-United merger discussions "may be doomed as the result of an unusual relationship between Continental and a third airline. Northwest Airlines holds a special preferred 'golden share' of Continental Airlines stock, giving Northwest the right to block Continental from consolidating with another airline. The alliance dates to late 2000 when Northwest agreed to sell shares of Continental common stock back to Continental after the Justice Department accused Northwest of anti-competitive behavior." The Times adds, "Northwest declined to say whether it would consider exercising its veto. But airline analyst Anthony Tangorra said the Eagan, Minn., airline wouldn't hesitate because a Continental-United combination would create the world's largest carrier, dwarfing Northwest."

Continental Shares Soar Amid Merger Talk Reports. The AP (12/14) reports, "Shares of Continental Airlines Inc. soared to their highest level since before the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks, as the company talks with United Airlines about a possible combination to create a mega-carrier. … Prudential analyst Bob McAdoo wrote in a research report that he doubts Continental wants a deal, but it might do one contingent on the Delta/US Airways deal being approved by federal regulators." The AP notes, "Combinations would allow airlines to reduce available seats, giving them more pricing power to raise fares and boost profits amid high fuel prices. Such deals, though, would likely face tough federal antitrust scrutiny, analysts say."

Quantas Agrees To $8.7 Billion Takeover By International Consortium. The Financial Times (12/14, Tucker, Minder) reports, "Qantas has agreed to an A$11.1bn (US$8.7bn) takeover offer by a consortium including Australia's Macquarie Bank and Texas Pacific Group, a US buy-out fund. The airline rejected the consortium's opening offer on Wednesday but early on Thursday it recommended a sweetened A$5.60-a-share offer. Shares in Qantas jumped nearly 5 per cent to A$5.33 by early Thursday afternoon. The buy-out offer is 29 per cent more than the stock traded at November 21, when Qantas first said it had been approached." The Wall Street Journal (12/14, A3, Sender, Linebaugh, 2.04M) notes, "Under the terms of the deal, Qantas will be delisted from the Australian exchange -- but retain majority Australian ownership, as required by law, with Allco becoming the company's largest shareholder. … Australian Prime Minister John Howard said today the government will monitor the takeover bid, but the deal was ultimately a matter for the market"

The New York Times (12/14, Johnston, 1.16M) reports, "The consortium — Airline Partners Australia — includes Texas Pacific, Macquarie Bank, Allco Equity Partners and the Allco Finance Group of Australia, and Onex, the Canadian leveraged buyout company. The group also brings together an array of aviation talent, including David Bonderman of Texas Pacific; Rod Eddington of Allco Finance, the former chief executive of British Airways; and David Turnbull of Allco Finance, formerly of Cathay Pacific. Few analysts expect investors to block the deal."

Alltel Will Sell Four Minnesota Markets To Meet DOJ Requirements. The AP (12/14) reports, "Wireless carrier Alltel Corp. said Wednesday it agreed to sell four Minnesota markets to Rural Cellular Corp., in order to meet divestiture requirements established by the U.S. Department of Justice. Financial terms weren't disclosed. In October, the company received approval from the Justice Department for its $1.1 billion acquisition of Midwest Wireless on the condition that the combined company sell some assets in markets where they both operate."

DOJ Announces Indictment Of Stora Enso On Price-Fixing Charges. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (12/14, Dresang, 255K) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department announced an indictment Wednesday against a Wisconsin-based paper company in an investigation of price fixing for magazine paper. Justice officials said a federal grand jury in Connecticut indicted Stora Enso North America Corp. on charges of conspiring to set prices in consultation with competitors." The MJS notes, "According to Justice Department officials, the indictment claims that Stora Enso met with competitors and agreed to increase prices for coated publication papers used in magazines and high-volume catalogs. The indictment contends that Stora Enso sold paper 'at collusive and non-competitive prices' from August 2002 to June 2003."

The AP (12/14, Singer) reports, "The paper is primarily used to print magazines, news weeklies and high-volume catalogues. The company agreed to the scheme in a meeting with an unidentified competitor, according to the indictment. 'The price of coated paper used in magazines affects nearly every American,' said Thomas O. Barnett, assistant attorney general in charge of the Justice Department's antitrust division." The AP notes, "Stora Enso has sales offices in Connecticut, Georgia and other states. The conspiracy charged in the indictment, which was handed up in Hartford, was carried out in Connecticut and elsewhere, the Justice Department said. Violations occurring before June 22, 2004, carry a maximum fine of $10 million, which may be increased."

Citigroup To Buy Grupo Cuscatlan In $1.51 Billion Deal. The Wall Street Journal (12/14, C4, Enrich, 2.04M) reports, "Citigroup Inc. agreed to buy a Central American banking company in a $1.51 billion cash-and-stock deal that marks the latest in a series of recent overseas acquisitions. Citigroup said it is buying the subsidiaries of Grupo Cuscatlan from Corporacion UBC Internacional SA, a commercial- and corporate-banking group that does business in El Salvador, Guatemala, Costa Rica, Honduras and Panama. Citigroup also is acquiring the group's pension and insurance operations in El Salvador." The Journal notes, "The Central American deal, coming the day before top Citigroup executives host their annual investor day at their Park Avenue headquarters in New York, is Citigroup's second recent deal in the region and its fifth international deal this fall. … The moves illustrate a bet by Chief Executive Charles Prince that fast-growing overseas markets hold greater potential for the world's biggest bank in market value than the U.S. But it isn't clear the deals will quickly jump-start Citigroup's sluggish revenue streams, a source of angst among many Citigroup investors."

Hearst Expects To Complete California Newspaper Purchase This Week. The AP (12/14) reports, "Hearst Corp. expects to complete its purchase of the Daily Breeze on Friday as part of a deal to resell the newspaper to MediaNews Group Inc., according to a court document filed by the two newspaper operators. The document was filed Wednesday in a pending federal antitrust case involving Denver-based MediaNews and New York-based Hearst, owner of the San Francisco Chronicle, over their plans to consolidate some of the business operations of their San Francisco Bay area newspapers. A San Francisco investor is trying to block the deal, claiming such cooperation violates antitrust laws." The AP notes, "Under the agreement, Hearst will purchase the Torrance-based Breeze from The Copley Press Inc. and then sell it to MediaNews along with two other publications, the Monterey County (Calif.) Herald and the St. Paul (Minn.) Pioneer Press."

Italian, Spanish Toll-Road Companies Halt Merger Talks. The Wall Street Journal (12/14, Maxwell, Perez, 2.04M) reports, "Autostrade SpA of Italy and Abertis Infraestructuras SA of Spain halted an agreement to merge and create the world's largest toll-road operator, citing blocks imposed by Italy's government and transportation regulator. The companies said they remain convinced that a deal should be done, and said they hope to be back with a fresh plan at some point in the future. The companies struck a cash-and-shares deal to merge in April that would have resulted in a company with a market capitalization of €25 billion ($33.2 billion)." The Journal notes, "The failed merger highlights the fact that cross-border European mergers and acquisitions, agreed or hostile, stir up as much of a hornet's nest as ever, despite the European Union's best efforts to promote the notion of a single marketplace." However, "people familiar with the situation said the companies' commitment to the deal burns on."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Grassley Says FBI Stonewalling On Amerithrax Probe. Yesterday morning on Fox News' Fox & Friends program (12/13, 8:12AM, Carlson), Sen. Charles Grassley discussed the reasons why lawmakers wrote a letter to AG Alberto Gonzales requesting more information on the FBI's Amerithrax probe. Grassley said, "There has not been information to Congress for three years on the subject. Congress has asked for testimony from the agency's to be updated. In our constitutional power of oversight, because the new checks and balances of the government." Carlson: "Think they have information they are not disclosing or they just do not know?" Grassley: "They have implicated a person. That person has been suing the FBI because he has lost his job, does not have any income. When two senators are targeted, 3,000 people have been called before the grand jury, Congress should have an update on it, particularly the senators who were targeted." Grassley later added, "We're told in congress that there is leagues in congress, and that is why we will not get an update on the investigation. The New York times wrote about this and they got their information from the FBI. The FBI is worried about not informing congress because they might leak. The FBI has leaked to the New York times and the FBI should be investigated." Grassley concluded the interview saying, "It is just stonewalling. That is where the FBI gets into trouble. When they do what they are best set up to do, investigate and prosecute and put people away that are guilty, they never get egg on their face. They always get egg on their face when they try to worry about their public relations. It looks to me like they have something to hide, particularly when they are talking about leaks on Capitol Hill and their own agents are looking to the New York Times."

Leahy Dissatisfied With FBI Progress On Amerithrax Case. WCAX-TV in Burlington, VT (12/14, Perron) on its web site provides more details about recent congressional complaints about the FBI's handling of the Amerithrax probe. Focusing specifically on Sen. Patrick Leahy's concerns WCAX follows up yesterday's articles reporting, "Five years after anthrax attacks terrified Americans, the case remains unsolved. Now Congress is fighting with the FBI to get an update on the investigation." And Sen. Leahy "is demanding some answers." He "is calling for the FBI to release information gathered during the 5-year probe. So far, the bureau says no fearing it could compromise the investigation." Five years ago a number of Vermont businesses and post offices were the subject of anthrax scares and one "potentially lethal letter was mailed to the Vermont Senator." Leahy said, ""I am not satisfied with this investigation. I'm not satisfied with the briefings I've had. I'm not satisfied with the information I've received on it."

Rep. Holt Among Lawmakers Requesting Anthrax Update From Gonzales. WRNN- TV (12/13, 7:00 p.m.) broadcasts, "Rush Holt of New Jersey has been turning up the heat on Justice Department. Holt and six other new jersey lawmakers signed a critical bipartisan letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, asking for an update on the probe into the anthrax attacks that occurred in the fall of 2001."

Columnist Accuses FBI Of Lacking Accountability In Amerithrax Probe. Howard Goodman in a column titled "Anthrax investigation has no answers, but secrecy abounds" in the South Florida Sun-Sentinel (12/14, 237K) describes the impact of the anthrax attacks on Florida five years ago and the events since then including the toppling of the Taliban, the war in Iraq and the creation of the DHS and asks, "where are the updates on the only clear example of terrorism to hit America since 9-11, whose first victim was claimed in our backyard? The FBI ain't saying." The recent bipartisan request for more information on the investigation "was the sound of frustration boiling over. Congress is supposed to conduct oversight of federal agencies. Yet the FBI, as if taking a cue from its old nemesis the Mob, is practicing Omerta." It "is all too representative of how this administration conducts business. In secret. Giving its reasons as national security. For all we know, it's simply hiding its ineffectiveness or incompetence." In congressional testimony FBI Director Robert Mueller "said the FBI fears leaks if Congress were brought into its rightful job of overseeing the executive. Which is rich, considering that it was the FBI that leaked the name of Stephen Hatfield." Goodman states, "I guess it's just too shameful for the G-Men to have to look the country in the eye and say, 'Hey, we've tried and tried, but we don't know who sent the anthrax. And by the way, if you know where Osama bin Laden is, give us a call.'"

Top FBI Officials Accused Of Failing To Understand Terrorist Threat. The Houston Chronicle (12/13, Mittelstadt, 530K) reported that in the aftermath of criticism of Rep. Sylvester Reyes (D) who reportedly failed to answer simple questions by a CQ reporter about the terrorists threatening the US, "Some experts suggested Reyes is just one example of an American policy establishment that has paid little attention to the tricky nuances of politics, religion and sectarian differences that have riven the Middle East." The Chronicle states, "Top FBI counterterrorism officials have shown limited understanding and curiosity about Islam's two major branches. And at least two other House Intelligence Committee members failed the same questions that tripped up Reyes." University of Georgia professor Loch Johnson said, "When it comes to someone in a position of staff responsibility like an FBI counterterrorism specialist, really it's a little unnerving to discover that they don't know much about the subject."

Dukakis Says FBI Deceived In Rifleman Probe. The Boston Globe (12/14, Murphy, 413K) reports that in the civil trial over the imprisonment of Peter Limone, Joseph Salvati, Henry Tameleo and Louis Greco, "Former Governor Michael S. Dukakis testified Wednesday that he carefully considered every inmate's request for clemency in the 1980s, even reviewing case files at home at night before deciding whether they should be set free." Yet, "Dukakis said he only recalled one instance when the state's top federal prosecutor weighed in on a clemency petition -- in 1983, when then US Attorney William F. Weld urged him to reject Peter J. Limone's bid for freedom." Saying "how 'unusual' it was to get such a letter, Dukakis said he gave 'substantial' weight to Weld's warning that Limone would 'assume charge of the day-to-day operations of organized crime in this area' if released." After testifying, Dukakis told reporters, "Now that we know what was going on in the (FBI) office, we were all deceived. … In fact, the bureau itself was betrayed." He "acknowledged he knew nothing about allegations that then-FBI agent Dennis Condon was aware Barboza was lying and yet vouched for his credibility during the trial." Yet, "on the stand, Dukakis defended the integrity of Condon, who served as public safety commissioner during his administration. He later told reporters, 'There really wasn't a better public servant walking the earth, in my opinion.'"

The CBS4-TV in Boston (12/13) on its web site reported, "The lawyers for four men wrongfully convicted in the 1968 Gangland murder continue to build their case against the FBI." But "Dukakis defended another FBI agent who he believes may have been manipulated." Dukakis said, "You hate to think of yourself as having been manipulated. … It's pretty obvious, in retrospect, we had information about these folks that was false and that there was evidence which would have absolved them of the crime that was never disclosed by people who should of disclosed it." Meanwhile, F. Lee Bailey "testified that in 1970 Joe Barboza that he, with the help of FBI agents, had framed four innocent men for the Deegan murder." CBS4 added, "Barboza told Bailey that he wanted to recant his testimony in the Deegan murder trial. In court Wednesday Bailey said that Barbosa told him his false testimony was orchestrated and encouraged by H. Paul Rico, a former FBI agent."

FBI Relocating 300 Employees In Northern Virginia. The Washington Post (12/14, BW19, Kang, 690K) reports, "By the end of 2008, about 2.8 million square feet of office space will be available in Prince William County's Innovation business park and in surrounding properties, according to the county's Department of Economic Development." DEC spokesman Jason Grant "projects that over the next year to 18 months, more than 800 jobs will come to Innovation and the surrounding areas." Among others, the FBI "is moving its Northern Virginia field office from Tysons Corner, bringing about 300 to the county."

California Operation Targets Meth Suppliers, Nets 45 Suspected Gang Members. The Los Angeles Times (12/13, Reston, 850K) reported San Bernardino police and federal officials "confiscated $500,000 in cash and arrested 45 alleged gang members believed to be major suppliers of methamphetamine in San Bernardino and the surrounding area. The bust was the culmination of a seven-month investigation by San Bernardino police and the Los Angeles field office of the Drug Enforcement Administration. … During the seven months, officials arrested 119 people, including five men believed to be top Mexican Mafia associates in San Bernardino, police officials said. … San Bernardino police requested the assistance of the DEA to deal with the surge in methamphetamine and weapons trafficking by gangs in the city."

Local TV Coverage. KTTV-TV, Los Angeles (12/13, 6:00 a.m.) aired, "The Drug Enforcement Agency [is] cracking down on the Mexican mafia, making dozens of arrest here in southern California. Teaming up with area police in San Bernardino, authorities there confiscating weapons and drugs, mostly methamphetamine. The DEA targeted the Mexican mafia because they're behind much of the violent dealings in San Bernardino."

Authorities Bust Drug Ring Linked To Homicides In US, Mexico. The Arizona Daily Star (12/14, 128K) reports an international drug-trafficking organization that "brought violence and thousands of pounds of marijuana into Southern Arizona has been busted, according to court documents made public Wednesday. The organization, led by Carlos Molinares-Nuñez for the last five years, has been linked to homicides both in Mexico and the United States that appear to be drug-related, court documents state. An indictment filed in federal court in November was unsealed Wednesday, detailing the intricacies of the ring, which has at least 20 employees. … Many tons of marijuana would be transported at one time in modified vehicles that would enter the country by driving in between designated ports of entry to avoid law officers.

17 Arrested In New York Drug Sweep. The AP (12/14) reports a drug sweep "netted 17 arrests Wednesday. Most of the accused live in and around Plattsburgh and were suspected of dealing marijuana, heroin, methamphetamines, cocaine and crack. … The arrests came after months of investigation and surveillance, DEA Agent James Farnsworth said." Long Island Newsday used the AP story.

In Texas, More Than 30 Suspects Linked To Cocaine-Smuggling Ring. The San Antonio (TX) Express (12/14) reports, "If there were any doubts, federal authorities say, a kilo of cocaine that agents found in the underwear of 81-year-old Josefina Campos solidified a case targeting a large smuggling ring centered in San Antonio and Floresville. Campos' arrest Nov. 28 is but a piece of a puzzle that became more complete Wednesday as officials announced they had smashed a drug-smuggling cell that netted seizures of more than 210 kilograms of cocaine and $4.5 million in cash. … The ring is accused of transporting the cocaine primarily to the Ohio cities of Cleveland and Youngstown, while some loads of the drug hit the streets of San Antonio, Austin, Houston and other Texas cities, according to officials and court records. Most of the drugs were smuggled across the Mexico border at Eagle Pass-Piedras Negras, according to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration." A federal indictment unsealed Wednesday in San Antonio "names Campos and 37 other people."

On its Web site, WOAI-TV, San Antonio, Texas (12/14) reports agents "say the ring was working for the Arturo Beltran drug cartel in Mexico, and has been in operation since at least 2003. Investigators say the group moved between 200 to 400 kilos of cocaine a month from across the border into Texas, and then north as far as Cleveland, Ohio."

Six Arrested, 10 Houses Seized In New Hampshire Drug Sweep. Manchester's Union Leader (12/13) reported six people "have been arrested and ten 'mini-mansions' seized in southern New Hampshire after a joint state-federal drug investigation. An estimated 6,000 marijuana plants were confiscated with a possible value of $24 million. The operation was conducted by New Hampshire State Police, the federal Drug Enforcement Administration and the United States Attorney."

The Union Leader (12/14) today reports State Attorney General Kelly A. Ayotte "said the joint federal, state and local law enforcement effort disrupted 'what has to be the largest seizure of marijuana in this state's history.' … The alleged drug growers bypassed electric meters and apparently used electricians to install their own meters capable of supporting the extensive lighting and ventilation systems needed to grow the plants, which ranged from several hundred to 1,500 in a single home."

The AP (12/13) reported, "For the past two months, the New Hampshire State Police Narcotics and Investigations Unit, assisted by the United States Drug Enforcement Agency, the New Hampshire Attorney General's Drug Task Force, the U.S. Attorney's office in New Hampshire and numerous local police agencies have been investigating residential marijuana growing operations throughout the state. As a result of recent marijuana seizures in Hooksett and Epsom, investigators developed information that led to the identification of 10 other residences in Concord, Derry, Pembroke, Andover, Chester, Weare, Hopkinton, Londonderry, and Canterbury that were suspected of housing large-scale marijuana grow operations." The Boston Herald used the AP story.

On its Web site, CBS 4 Boston (12/14) reports police "said the 10 homes were purchased with the sole intent of growing marijuana."

Miami Police Chief's Son Sentenced In Marijuana Case. In Albany, New York, the AP (12/13) reported the son of Miami Police Chief John Timoney "was sentenced Wednesday to 18 months in federal prison for trying to buy 400 pounds of marijuana from an undercover agent in 2005. Sean Timoney pleaded guilty in December 2005 to giving an undercover Drug Enforcement Administration agent a gym bag filled with about $455,000 in cash as partial payment for what he and a partner believed would be the delivery of 400 pounds of marijuana." CNN, the Washington Post, Miami Herald, South Florida Sun-Sentinel, Long Island Newsday, and Philadelphia Inquirer used the AP story.

Texas Teacher Accused Of Helping Cocaine, Money-Laundering Ring. The Galveston County (12/14) reports a Galveston school teacher "was freed on bond Wednesday when officials released information about the multimillion-dollar cocaine and money-laundering ring in which she is accused of taking a part. Galveston Police Department vice/narcotics officer Joey Quiroga pulled Joette Natasha Barnes, 25, out of class last week and arrested her. … 'We believe she was a facilitator,' said Joe Arabit, assistant special agent in charge for the Drug Enforcement Administration's San Antonio office. 'Not to minimize it, but that was the role of several people in this operation — to hold drug proceeds for other defendants.'"

The Washington Times/UPI (12/14) reports law-enforcement authorities "have broken up a Texas-based ring that allegedly smuggled 400-pound quantities of cocaine into Ohio and Tennessee from Mexico. … The ring is accused of transporting cocaine to Ohio and Tennessee, among other states, after storing it in San Antonio between Jan. 1, 2004, and Dec. 6 of this year."

Federal Agents Seize $1 Million Cash From Alabama Traffic Stop. The AP (12/14) reports, "Federal agents confiscated $1 million in cash concealed in a pickup truck stopped for speeding by Alabama state troopers on Interstate 10, authorities said. Tom Wade, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's agent in Mobile, said the stacks of $20 bills packed in a concealed compartment were turned over to the U.S. Marshals Service. He said cash can be confiscated if investigators believe it was associated with criminal activity, but that $1 million is a 'significant' seizure for such a traffic stop." The AP notes, "Wade said Wednesday the DEA is investigating where the driver began his trip and his final destination. Officials said the driver could claim the cash and try to get it back through the courts, but that is rare in such seizure cases and it will likely be distributed to state and federal agencies."

Traffic Stop Leads To Georgia Stolen Weapons Arrest. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (12/14, Chidi, 379K) reports, "A lucky traffic stop by a Snellville police officer led to the arrest of two teens accused of stealing dozens of guns from a Lilburn pawn shop, police said Wednesday. Federal agents and local police arrested two Duluth teenagers late Tuesday night, Lilburn police said in a news release. Dwayne Allen Hickman, 17, and Jimar Shane O'Riley, 17, were charged with one count of armed robbery, with other state charges pending. Police said they could be charged as adults." The AJC adds, "Police said Wednesday that 53 guns had been stolen. Lilburn Police called in the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms to help investigate, but police caught a quick break in their investigation," when Snellville Police officer Greg Perry "searched the car and found a gun that had been registered as stolen five days earlier from Mr. Pawn. … ATF agents, Gwinnett County's SWAT team, Snellville and Lilburn police officers met the two. The initial investigation points to a possible gang connection in this case," Lilburn police spokesman Sgt. Tyler Thomas said."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Johnson Undergoes Brain Surgery. CNN (12/14) reports on its website, "Sen. Tim Johnson of South Dakota was undergoing brain surgery early Thursday at George Washington University Hospital after suffering stroke-like symptoms, two Democratic sources familiar with his condition told CNN." The Washington Post (12/14, A1, Babington, Weisman, 690K) also says Johnson "was in surgery last night after falling ill at the Capitol, introducing a note of uncertainty over control of the Senate just weeks before Democrats are to take over with a one-vote margin. … Given Johnson's narrow reelection win over Thune, and South Dakota's GOP tilt -- Bush carried the state by 22 percentage points in 2004 -- Republicans consider Johnson one of their top targets in the 2008 Senate elections. The leading candidate to oppose him" is GOP Gov. Mike Rounds, "who was reelected to a second term last month."

The Washington Times (12/14, Hurt, 88K) reports, "During a phone call with reporters yesterday, Mr. Johnson became disoriented, stuttering in response to a question. He appeared to recover, asking whether there were any additional questions and then signing off. According to his office, the Capitol physician examined the senator and advised that he be sent to a hospital."

The Los Angeles Times (12/14, Levey, 850K) says "the hospital would provide no details on his condition or the reason for the surgery." The Times also runs a statement from Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid, in which he says, "Sen. Johnson is a dear friend to me and to all of us here in the Senate." CQ (12/14) notes "Reid himself had what was described as a 'mini stroke' earlier this year, which had little impact on his overall health."

The Sioux Falls Argus Leader (12/14) reports on its website that Democratic Rep. Stephanie Herseth, "at the conclusion of a Sioux Falls meeting with board members of the Lewis and Clark water project, called the group back together around 3 p.m. and announced…Johnson had been taken to a hospital. In a shaking voice, she called on South Dakotans for their prayers." Herseth "said she believed it was a severe stroke." The Leader also reports rhe White House "issued a statement" wishing Johnson "a speedy recovery.

'Our thoughts and prayers are with Senator Johnson and his family,' said spokesman Alex Conant."

The Wall Street Journal (12/14, Lueck, Cummings, 2.04M) reports, "As Mr. Johnson's family gathered at the hospital last night, his office wasn't making public details of his condition." In late afternoon, "a brief statement said he had suffered a 'possible stroke' and was being evaluated by a stroke team. Later, a spokeswoman for Mr. Johnson said he hadn't suffered a stroke or a heart attack."

USA Today (12/14, Kiely, 2.27M) also reports Johnson's illness "has national ramifications because of the narrow political divide in the Senate that convenes Jan. 4. The November election gave Democrats a 51-49 edge. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut and Bernie Sanders of Vermont were elected as independents but have said they will vote with Democrats." If Johnson "were unable to complete the remaining two years of his term, South Dakota Gov. Mike Rounds, a Republican, could appoint a replacement, presumably another Republican. That would deadlock the Senate at 50-50 with Vice President Cheney, a Republican, holding the tie-breaking vote."

All three networks reported on Johnson's illness last night. On NBC Nightly News (12/13, lead story, 2:35, 9.87M), Tim Russert was asked to comment on the "political implications." They are "enormous," said Russert, "if the Republicans were to become the majority party in the Senate again, in terms of Iraq policy, Supreme Court nominees, environmental policy, tax policy. Very, very significant." The CBS Evening News (12/13, story 3, 1:50, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "A big change may be coming in the balance of power on Capitol Hill." On ABC World News (12/13, lead story, 2:00, 8.78M), George Stephanopoulos said, "If you look at history, it is very, very rare, in fact, no senator has ever been forced out for something like this. And several senators have served for several years, even after they suffered from a stroke."

The Financial Times (12/14, Luce) reports that as it "went to press…it was too early to tell the extent of Mr Johnson's impairment." The Times later says, "Any loss of Democratic control of the Senate would be less serious to the opposition party's agenda than loss of control of the House of Representatives, which operates under stricter conditions of party discipline and where the Democrats last month won a comfortable majority. Political analysts say the real majority number in the Senate is now sixty since that is the minimum vote required to impose cloture on a filibustered debate and move to a vote." The Democrats in both houses "have promised to usher in an era of greater bipartisan cooperation after several years of bitter partisanship."

The AP (12/14, Jalonick) reports "both Johnson and his wife have battled cancer." The senator "underwent prostate cancer treatment in 2004, and subsequent tests have shown him to be clear of the disease. Barb Johnson is a breast cancer survivor." The couple "have two sons and a daughter: Brooks, who served in the U.S. Army in Bosnia, Kosovo, South Korea, Afghanistan and Iraq; Brendan, a Sioux Falls lawyer, and Kelsey, who works in Washington."

The New York Times (12/14, Zernike, 1.16M) notes Johnson "is the second senator known to become ill since the November elections. Senator Craig Thomas of Wyoming, a Republican, is being treated for leukemia, but has been at work." The Times also reports, "According to information from the Senate historian cited on CQ.com, at least nine senators have taken extended absences from the Senate for health reasons since 1942. Robert F. Wagner, Democrat of New York, was unable to attend any sessions of the 80th or 81st Congress from 1947 to 1949 because of a heart ailment. Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., Democrat of Delaware, missed about seven months in 1988 after surgery for a brain aneurysm. And David Pryor, Democrat of Arkansas, suffered a heart attack in April 1991 and returned to the Senate in September that year." The Chicago Tribune (12/14, Parsons, 617K) reports, "Many members of Congress have stayed in office in spite of fragile health, including the late Sen. Strom Thurmond, a South Carolina Republican who held office beyond his 100th birthday." Democratic Rep. Lane Evans "has suffered from Parkinson's disease for years and went for several months this year without casting a vote. He is set to retire when the new Congress is sworn in."

US Urges Appeals Court To Reverse Ruling On Cheney Visitor Logs. The AP (12/14, Jordan) reports, "The Bush administration asked an appeals court Wednesday to overrule a federal judge and allow the White House to keep secret any records of visitors to Vice President Cheney's residence and office. To make the visitor records public would be an 'unprecedented intrusion into the daily operations of the vice presidency,' the Justice Department argued in a 57-page brief to the U.S. Court of Appeals in the District of Columbia. The government was responding to an October order, by U.S. District Judge Ricardo M. Urbina, to release two years of White House visitor logs to The Washington Post." The AP adds, "Attorneys for the Justice Department called Urbina's decision 'flatly inconsistent' with his ruling's acknowledgment that the Secret Service had only limited and temporary control over the visitor logs. Since the records are ultimately controlled by the vice president's office, the Secret Service is not authorized to release them, the government said. Moreover, Congress has excluded presidential and vice presidential records from the public's reach — making the visitor logs untouchable, the government said."

Bond Selected As Top Republican On Senate Intelligence Panel. McClatchy (12/14, Stearns) reports, "Missouri Sen. Christopher 'Kit' Bond will become the top Republican on the Senate Intelligence Committee." Over "the last few years he's gained an increasingly high profile on intelligence issues." For example, in 2006, "Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist assigned Bond to lead Senate Republican communications efforts in the war on terror." As political tensions rose over Iraq, "Bond frequently became the GOP's sound-bite bad cop, accusing Democrats of excessive partisanship, while outgoing chairman Pat Roberts of Kansas took a more reserved approach."

Reyes Dismisses Questions About Qualifications To Lead House Intelligence Panel. KFOX-TV in El Paso (12/12) on its web site reported that after a CQ reporter questioned Rep. Silvestre Reyes' (D) qualifications to become chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, Reyes defended himself saying "he actually does know the answers to the questions." Reyes said, "I certainly know Hezbollah because I am one of the few members of Congress that has actually been through a Hezbollah checkpoint, on the road from Damascus to Beirut." And "local experts have taken to the congressman's defense." UTEP associate professor John Bretting said, "It would be ridiculous to believe that our Congressman Silvestre Reyes is not qualified for this position." He "said Reyes is not the only one who has been taken by a reporter's pop quiz, even U.S. presidents have." Bretting added, "In the United States Congress, Congressman Reyes is one of the five or six most knowledgeable congresspersons when it comes to national security."

WSJournal Criticizes Selection Of Reyes For Intelligence Panel. The Wall Street Journal (12/14, 2.04M) editorializes, "As Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi's choice to be the next Chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, Texas Democrat Silvestre Reyes will share responsibility for the budgets and oversight of US spy agencies, as well as receive regular briefings on classified intelligence. But it appears he first needs a remedial course on America's terrorist enemies. In an interview with Congressional Quarterly, Mr. Reyes was unable to answer basic questions about the sectarian nature of both al Qaeda and Hezbollah. … So it appears America will fight the next two years of the war on terror with an important Congressional post occupied by a man who has no grasp at all of the dynamics of the conflicts in Iraq, Lebanon and the broader Middle East. This isn't an auspicious start by Democrats who hoped to campaign in 2008 having established some credibility on national security."

Judge Says Administration's Handling Of Katrina Housing Was "A Disaster." The New York Times/AP (12/14, Apuzzo) reports US District Judge Richard J. Leon "called the Bush administration's handling of a Hurricane Katrina housing program 'a legal disaster' Wednesday and ordered officials to explain a computer system that can neither precisely count evacuees nor provide reasons why they were denied aid." Judge Leon, "who ruled last month that the Federal Emergency Management Agency had violated evacuees' constitutional rights by eliminating their housing payments without notice, admonished the government for not moving fast enough to restart the program for between 3,600 and 5,500 storm victims." Leon "ruled that FEMA mishandled the transition from a short-term housing program to a longer-term program this spring and summer. Instead of explaining why funding was being cut, FEMA provided only computer-generated and sometimes conflicting program codes, Leon said." The judge "ordered FEMA to explain those decisions so thousands of evacuees can understand the reasoning and decide whether to appeal." The Washington Post (12/14, A29, 690K) also runs the AP story.

Many Katrina Victims "In Limbo" After Over A Year. In his New York Times column (12/14), Bob Herbert says they "look for all the world like internment camps," but "more than a year after the catastrophe of Hurricane Katrina, thousands of the poorest victims from New Orleans are still living in these trailer parks run by the Federal Emergency Management Agency. They have ironic names, like Mount Olive Gardens and Renaissance Village. A more accurate name would be Camp Depression, after the state of mind of most of the residents." Dr. Irwin Redlener, a professor at Columbia University and the author of "Americans at Risk: Why We Are Not Prepared for Megadisasters and What We Can Do," said "he was outraged that so many thousands of the poorest victims of Hurricane Katrina are still stuck in limbo — unable to find jobs or permanent housing, denied adequate medical and educational services and with no idea when, or if, they will be able to return to New Orleans."

US Geological Survey Scientists Object To New Administration Rules. The Washington Post (12/14, A29, Eilperin, 690K) reports, "A new Bush administration policy for reviewing scientific documents before publication has angered some US Geological Survey scientists, who say the elaborate internal review of their work may impede them from conveying information to the public." The new requirements, "which were unveiled in July but are still being put into practice, call for staff scientists to submit all reports and prepared talks to managers to determine whether they meet the agency's scientific standards. They also require researchers to alert the agency press office of any work involving 'potential high visibility products or policy-sensitive issues.'" P. Patrick Leahy, USGS associate director for geology, "said the agency spent more than two years drafting the rules to ensure all of it scientists are subject to the same sort of rigorous scientific review before they send their work to be published." But "James Estes, a marine biologist who has worked for more than 30 years at the USGS's Western Ecological Research Center in Santa Cruz, Calif., said that although he has not encountered problems in the past, he and his colleagues fear their work may be stifled."

Lawmakers Say Coast Guard Withheld Warnings About National Security Cutter. The New York Times (12/14, Lipton, 1.16M) reports the Coast Guard "withheld from Congress warnings raised more than two years ago by its chief engineer about structural design flaws in its new National Security Cutter, a $564 million ship now near completion in Mississippi, Democrats and Republicans said in interviews this week." The "lack of full disclosure about that and other problems in the Coast Guard's $24 billion modernization effort, known as Deepwater, has created a credibility gap that some members of Congress say now jeopardizes the endeavor." Sen. Olympia J. Snowe, "the chairwoman of the Senate panel that oversees the service's operations," said, "The Coast Guard clearly does not understand that transparency and accountability are essential to a program of this magnitude." The Times adds Snowe "and other Congressional leaders said they were unaware until this past week that the Coast Guard's chief engineer, Rear Adm. Erroll Brown, had written in March 2004 to the Coast Guard official in charge of the Deepwater program, Rear Adm. Patrick M. Stillman, to warn him that the design for the National Security Cutter had 'significant flaws' and that construction should not begin until they were addressed." Rep. Harold Rogers, "who heads the House panel that oversees the Coast Guard budget, said the lack of full disclosure was distressing." Democratic Rep. Bob Filner "said the shortcomings in the Deepwater program are so severe that the contract should be terminated. Two military contractors, Lockheed Martin and Northrop Grumman, were hired in 2002 to design the ships, build them and oversee most of the other project details."

NYTimes Criticizes Lack Of Oversight For Coast Guard. The New York Times (12/14, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "The Coast Guard, supposedly our first line of defense against water-borne terrorists and drug smugglers, has been staggered by a shipbuilding scandal of enormous proportions. A long-term modernization program to replace nearly all of the Coast Guard's ships, planes and helicopters — begun four years ago in the wake of 9/11 — is foundering while its projected costs are skyrocketing. In Iraq, lax government oversight and incompetence or profiteering by contractors have disabled reconstruction efforts. Now the same disease is undermining our coastal defenses." The "new Congress and the Department of Homeland Security, which is responsible for the Coast Guard, will need to keep a sharp eye on the Coast Guard's performance. The industrial contractors have proved they were not up to the job."

Corrected Financial Reports Show Fannie Mae Was Undercapitalized. The Washington Post (12/14, D1, Hilzenrath, 690K) reports, "Three years ago, Fannie Mae assured lawmakers that it had the required capital to cope with a broad variety of business setbacks." But it "turns out, the assurance was false. Last week, when the giant mortgage funding company corrected years of flawed financial reports, the new numbers showed that it fell short of a key capital requirement by billions of dollars in 2002 and 2003." Had it "been apparent at the time, the $7.3 billion shortfall at the end of 2002 could have put Fannie Mae on a different trajectory. Regulators might have intervened -- as they did later, when accounting problems came to light. Wall Street might have reevaluated Fannie Mae's vaunted management, not to mention the value of its stock. And Fannie Mae might have been forced to raise additional capital or liquidate investments, sacrificing profits." Instead, "based on Fannie Mae's financial reports, the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, which monitors Fannie Mae's financial safety and soundness, gave the company a passing grade."

Recently Passed Tax Bill Included 520 Tax Breaks For Corporations. The Washington Post (12/14, A6, Stephens, 690K) reports, "A huge tax bill that Congress passed last week contained a little-noticed gift for select corporations -- tens of millions of dollars in breaks on import tariffs. Early Saturday morning, in the frantic final hours of the 109th Congress, lawmakers rolled 520 tariff suspensions into the must-pass bill. The provisions will reduce or eliminate taxes on imported products as varied as shoes, camcorders and boiled oysters." The Post adds, "While such suspensions have been around for decades, the flurry of provisions pushed this Congress to a record of nearly 800 for the year. Corporate lobbyists often craft such suspensions to apply to just one product imported by just one company. Many of those companies and their executives have given millions of dollars to political campaigns. … Altogether, the suspensions passed this year could cost the Treasury hundreds of millions of dollars in lost revenue. The previous Congress approved about 440 new and extended suspensions, at an estimated cost of $172 million."

Congress' Failure To Renew Law Could Hit Rural Schools Hard. USA Today (12/14, Toppo, 2.27M) reports, "Rural school districts in 42 states could be forced to cut their budgets or close down altogether in coming months, advocates say, because Congress left Washington last week without renewing a little-known authorization for districts with large tracts of national forest land." The Secure Rural Schools and Community Act "subsidizes about 4,400 small school districts. Congress first approved it in 2000 to make up for declining revenue in timber-producing areas and to guarantee districts a steady income. The law was up for renewal this year, but lawmakers left Washington on Saturday without approving it, leaving many districts scrambling to replace funding that, in a few cases, amounts to more than half of their budgets."

Democrats Will Seek To Integrate War Spending Into Regular Budget. The New York Times (12/14, Hulse, 1.16M) reports, "Frustrated by the Bush administration's piecemeal financing of the Iraq war, Democrats are planning to assert more control over the billions of dollars a month being spent on the conflict when they take charge of Congress in January. In interviews, the incoming Democratic chairmen of the House and Senate Budget Committees said they would demand a better accounting of the war's cost and move toward integrating the spending into the regular federal budget, a signal of their intention to use the Congressional power of the purse more assertively to influence the White House's management of the war." The lawmakers, Senator Kent Conrad and Rep. John M. Spratt, "said the administration's approach of paying for extended military operations and related activities through a series of emergency requests had inhibited Congressional scrutiny of the spending and obscured the true price of the war."

Budget Outlook Places Constraints On Democratic Agenda. The Christian Science Monitor (12/14, Grier, 59K) reports, "Lower interest rates on student loans. More special forces for the military. Expanded prescription drug benefits for senior citizens. Greater federal support for renewable energy and alternative fuels." Congressional Democrats "have a long list of priorities they'd like to enact when they assume the power of the majority in January. After all, they've been wandering in the political wilderness for 12 years. They've had lots of time to scribble down stuff under the heading 'to do.'" But "faced with record federal deficits and the expense of the war in Iraq, Democrats have also vowed to be more fiscally responsible than their Republican predecessors. Handling this impending collision could be one of the first big tests for the party's House and Senate leadership teams." The Monitor adds, "As yet, Democrats have hung no price tag on their forthcoming agenda. Many of the high-priority items they have pledged to enact in the first 100 hours of the new Congress, such as an increase in the minimum wage, wouldn't cost Washington lots of money." In addition, "incoming Speaker Pelosi said in a statement last month that the party is committed to 'no new deficit spending.'"

Wyden Offers Universal Health Care Plan. The AP (12/14, Daly) reports, "Several business and labor leaders on Wednesday hailed a proposal to provide health care coverage to all Americans through a pool of private insurance plans. A dozen years after Congress rejected a Clinton administration plan for universal health care, Oregon Sen. Ron Wyden offered a plan he said would provide affordable, private health care coverage for all Americans, except those covered through Medicare or the military." Said Wyden, "Employer-based coverage is melting away like a Popsicle on the sidewalk in August." Wyden, "a Democrat and a member of the Senate Finance health care subcommittee, said his plan would 'guarantee health coverage for every American that is at least as good as members of Congress receive and can never be taken away.'" The plan, "dubbed the 'Healthy Americans Act,' would provide universal coverage for no more money than the country spends on health insurance today, Wyden said." The Los Angeles Times (12/14, , 850K) also reports on Wyden's proposal, and says that "considered liberal on social issues and moderate on economic policy," the senator "combined elements of reforms that have been proposed by Democrats and Republicans. His plan would guarantee coverage for all, including nearly 47 million uninsured, a Democratic objective." But "it would also limit employers' exposure to relentless cost increases and encourage workers to shop for cost-effective insurance plans -- ideas that have Republican support."

Three 527 Groups Fined For Campaign Finance Violations. The AP (12/14, Kuhnhenn) reports, "Swift Boat Veterans for Truth and MoveOn.org Voter Fund, two outside groups that played key roles in the 2004 presidential election, reached an agreement with the Federal Election Commission to pay nearly $450,000 for various violations." The two groups and the League of Conservation Voters "settled charges that they failed 'to register and file disclosure reports as federal political committees and accepted contributions in violation of federal limits and source prohibitions,' the FEC said in a statement Wednesday. The commission approved the three settlements on a vote of 6-0." The issue concerns the conduct of the 527 groups, which operated "as independent campaigns attacking Democratic nominee Sen. John Kerry or President Bush." Swift Boat Veterans and POWs for Truth "will pay $299,500. In the 2004 campaign, the group spent $20.4 million criticizing Kerry's military record in Vietnam. Much of the group's claims about Kerry's service were never substantiated." The MoveOn.org Voter Fund "will pay $150,000." The group "spent $14.6 million on television ads attacking Bush's record." The League of Conservation Voters "will pay $180,000. The group ran ads against Bush and other federal candidates, criticizing their stands on environmental issues."

USA Today (12/14, Schouten, 2.27M) reports the action "is the first clampdown on outside political groups, FEC Chairman Michael Toner said, and could diminish the role of such organizations." Toner said the groups "stepped over the line by either raising funds or by paying for activities that called for the election or defeat of the presidential contenders." Richard Hasen of Loyola Law School in Los Angeles said, "We would not see independent spending on the same scale in 2008 as we did in 2004 [if the FEC action survives legal challenges]."

The Washington Post (12/14, A5, Smith, 690K) reports the FEC "slapped heavy fines on three independent fundraising groups it said had illegally injected tens of millions of dollars into the 2004 presidential campaign, concluding unanimously that the funds were drawn from large donors and corporations in violation of election laws." The fines "raised new questions about the viability of using such '527' organizations as an indirect conduit for big-money donations meant to promote or undermine federal candidates." But "prominent election lawyers said the FEC's decision to fine the three groups was unlikely to slow such funding in the 2008 election. Although the fines imposed yesterday add new uncertainty for large donors, the underlying FEC rules remain so murky that the strength of the precedent is unclear, the lawyers said." GOP election lawyer Jan Baran said, "There is no clear standard."

Personnel News. In its "Special Interests" column, the Washington Post (12/14, A29, Sarasohn, 690K) reports the Investment Company Institute "snagged James R. Hart, a 30-year veteran of the Hill and most recently chief of staff to Rep. Carolyn McCarthy (D-N.Y.)." Robert C. Divine "has left his job as U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services chief counsel…and rejoined Baker, Donelson, Bearman, Caldwell & Berkowitz law firm." Meanwhile, "health-care specialist Stephen J. Northrup has joined Arent Fox in the law firm's government relations group." Gail MacKinnon, "senior vice president for government relations at the National Cable and Telecommunications Association, is leaving for Time Warner Inc., where she will be senior vice president for global public policy. Succeeding her will be Steve Vest."

OTHER NEWS:

Hill Says Pyongyang Appears Serious About Six-Party Talks. The Washington Times (12/14, Sands, 88K) reports, "Top US negotiator Christopher Hill said yesterday that he will push for 'measurable, concrete progress' to end North Korea's nuclear weapons programs when regional talks resume this weekend in Beijing after a break of more than a year. Just over two months after Pyongyang stunned the world by conducting its first nuclear test, Mr. Hill said in a State Department briefing that China has offered the United States 'unprecedented cooperation' in recent weeks in pressing the North to return to the stalled 'six-party talks.'" Negotiators for "the six countries -- the United States, China, North and South Korea, Japan and Russia -- are set to meet Sunday night in Beijing for the first time since Pyongyang's nuclear test." Hill "said he anticipated this round of talks would last at least a week and he hoped to be home by Christmas."

Fox Special Report (12/13, story 4, 3:15, Hume) reported Hill "appears hopeful." Fox (Rosen) added, "America's envoy...said recent exchanges with the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, as the north calls itself, suggest that when the talks resume Sunday night in Beijing, after more than a year's respite, real results might actually follow."

The AP (12/14) reports Hill stressed at yesterday's briefing that "the purpose of the six-party talks is not to talk," and said US negotiators are looking for "measurable" and "concrete progress" at the talks. He said it had not been determined how long the negotiations will last, but that talks would begin Sunday night and he would spend next week in Beijing. Hill said he would be meeting over the weekend with his negotiating counterparts, including the North Korean delegate. Hill also said cooperation with the Chinese in preparation for the meeting has been "unprecedented."

AFP (12/14, Millikin) reports the assistant secretary said Pyongyang has indicated it is ready to "deal in specifics" about abandoning its nuclear weapons program, but he predicted "very tough negotiations" next week. Hill said it was not clear if North Korea's leadership agreed to resume talks due to UN sanctions or "because they have exploded a nuclear device and they feel very strong as a result of that." But Hill said he had made clear to Pyongyang already that "we do not consider them a nuclear power and we will not consider them a nuclear power."

Negotiators Report Progress On UN Sanctions On Iran. AFP (12/14, Aziakou) reports negotiators "edged closer to agreeing UN sanctions against Iran…raising hopes that the Security Council could vote on a compromise package soon." After a new round of informal talks on a sanctions draft resolution early Wednesday, several participants emerged "reasonably upbeat." British Ambassador Emyr Jones Parry told reporters negotiators "made substantial progress," and "expressed hope that a compromise text would be agreed on this week," paving for the way for a Security Council vote "as soon as possible after that."

The Christian Science Monitor (12/14, LaFranchi, 59K) reports that "as prospects wane for tough international action against Iran, some countries in the region are expressing alarm at the pace of Tehran's progress toward mastery of the nuclear cycle. And they seem to be saying, "'f the international community is not going to do something about it, we will.' Such an attitude is raising fears of a Middle East arms race." The Monitor adds, "Noting that Saudi Arabia and other Gulf countries announced over the weekend their interest in developing a cooperative nuclear-energy program, former Middle East negotiator Dennis Ross said, 'Who is that message for? Let me tell you, it's not for Iran. It was for us.'"

Bolton To Seek Charges Against Ahmadinejad Over Israel Remarks. The Financial Times (12/14, Turner) reports Ambassador Bolton Thursday will "call for legal proceedings" against Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "for incitement to genocide." Bolton will join former Israeli Ambassador Dore Gold, former Canadian attorney-general Irwin Cotler, and Nobel peace prize winner Elie Wiesel "in claims that a series of public statements against Israel constitute a crime under the Genocide Convention." A 68-page study produced by the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs and the International Association of Jewish Lawyers and Jurists argues that Ahmadinejad's declaration that "Israel should be wiped off the map" is "part of a hate campaign punishable under international law." The Iranian mission to the UN dismissed the call as "a propaganda move, and an act without any substance. The international court of justice should give every priority to the real genocide of Palestinian people by Israeli leaders." Meanwhile, Juan Mendez, the UN's special adviser on the prevention of genocide, "said he did not plan to take any official action over the remarks because his job was to help vulnerable populations that could not defend themselves."

The New York Times (12/14, Slackman, 1.16M) reports, "Iran's so-called Holocaust conference this week was billed as a chance to force the West to reconsider the historical record and, thereby, the legitimacy of Israel. But why would the Iranians invite speakers with so little credibility in the West, including a former Ku Klux Klan grand wizard and disgraced European scholars? That question misses the point." Ahmadinejad "portrays participants like David Duke, the former Louisiana Klan leader, and Robert Faurisson of France, who has devoted his life to trying to prove that the Nazi gas chambers were a myth, as silenced truth-tellers whose stories expose Western leaders as the hypocrites he considers them to be. Just as Soviet leaders used to invite Americans who suffered racial or political discrimination to Moscow to embarrass Washington, Mr. Ahmadinejad seems to enjoy pointing out that countries like Germany, France and Austria claim to champion free debate yet have made Holocaust denial illegal." But "there is another important point. Mr. Ahmadinejad actually seems to believe that the volumes of documentation, testimony and living memory of the Nazi genocide are at best exaggerated and part of a Zionist conspiracy to falsify history so as to create the case for Israel."

Local Elections Present Test For Ahmadinejad. The New York Times (12/14, Fathi, 1.16M) reports Iranians will go to the polls on Friday in elections that "are expected to be a test of whether President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad still has the popular support that led to his victory 18 months ago." The elections are for city councils around the country and for the 86-member Assembly of Experts, which selects the country's supreme religious leader. The city councils exercise "substantial political leverage, especially in the capital, Tehran," where a slate affiliated with Ahmadinejad is running against "other radicals who have been sidelined by Mr. Ahamdiejad and against reformist politicians who are trying to make a comeback after three major defeats in the past three years." However, AFP (12/14, Eqbali) says "conservative-reformist power struggles or foreign policy are far from the minds" of many Iranian voters, who "are more concerned with unemployment and the cost of living."

Lebanon Standoff Seen As Key Test Of US Resolve, Credibility. McClatchy (12/14, Lasseter) reports, "For most Americans, the standoff between the militant Shiite Muslim group Hezbollah and Lebanon's government may look like inside politics in a country that's barely big enough to contain its name on most world maps." But "Hezbollah's two-week-old siege of Prime Minister Fuad Saniora's administration is, in many ways, a test of US power and credibility in the Middle East at a time when the Bush administration is struggling to regain the offensive in Iraq and Afghanistan. Analysts, Lebanese leaders and Western diplomats agree that the crisis is an outgrowth of a developing showdown between the United States, which backs Saniora, and Syria and Iran, which support Hezbollah." That "cold war can be seen across the region. In Iraq, Syria and Iran are helping forces aligned against US troops. In the Palestinian-Israeli conflict, Iran has pledged millions to help the Hamas-led Palestinian government - which the United States and Europe have cut off - and Syria continues to support Hamas and several Palestinian terrorist groups."

The Washington Post (12/14, A22, Shadid, 690K) reports, "For years, Fouad Siniora was a man of numbers more than rhetoric, as a banker, finance minister and friend to Rafiq al-Hariri, the billionaire former prime minister assassinated last year. This week, he stood before a crowd that included more than 1,800 women at his barricaded government headquarters, more populist than pragmatist, more agitator than accountant." The Post adds, "In the test of wills that Lebanon's crisis has become, the government is playing a game of perceptions. Ministers insist it is business as usual, while in almost daily scenes, busloads of supporters from elsewhere in Lebanon are ferried to the stately Serail, as Siniora's headquarters is known." The government, "in sometimes blunt ways, is mobilizing its sectarian constituencies -- usually Sunni Muslim -- as a veiled warning to Hezbollah and its Shiite Muslim followers not to go too far in a campaign the government's supporters variously portray as a coup d'etat, an attempt to grab power for the Shiite community or a ploy to deliver leverage here to Iran and Syria."

Meanwhile, the Washington Times (12/14, Behn, 88K) reports, "A Lebanese official yesterday said the leading government party was ready to accept an Arab League package of political solutions to defuse the crisis paralyzing the country." Arab League leader Amr Moussa "told reporters Tuesday that 'progress has been made' toward a compromise resolution, but that all parties would have to make concessions for a consensus to be reached." Amal Mudallali, "a foreign policy adviser to parliamentary majority leader Saad Hariri, said the package would grant the opposition more seats in the Cabinet but leave it one short of the veto power demanded by Hezbollah."

Hamas Commander Killed As Palestinians Infighting Intensifies. The New York Times (12/14, A16, Myre, 1.16M) reports as part of "renewed fighting among Palestinians, gunmen forced a prominent Hamas militant to his knees on Wednesday, then shot him dead outside a courthouse where he worked, in the southern Gaza Strip." Hamas said a Fatah "death squad" was responsible for the killing of the militant, Bassam al-Farra, in Khan Yunis. Fatah, however, denied involvement. Hamas spokesman Fauzi Barhoum cautioned that there is "a very dangerous situation" in Gaza, where "there has been an escalation in the violence and the chaos."

The AP (12/14, Barzak) says the "brazen daylight slaying forced Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas to rush home from a trip abroad and dampened already fading hopes for creating a national unity government and renewing peace talks with Israel." Meanwhile, both Hamas and Fatah "criticized President Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah for failing to halt the violence."

As Tensions Rise In Somalia, Regional War Feared. In a front page report, the New York Times (12/14, A1, Gettleman, Mazzetti, 1.16M) reports that the "inevitability of war hangs over Mogadishu" but "unlike the internal anarchy that has consumed the country for 15 years, the looming battle is now with Ethiopia, threatening to further destabilize the troubled Horn of Africa." Over the past week as Islamic militants strengthened their control of the city, "much of the rest of the country have begun a food drive, a money drive and an AK-47 assault rifle drive, and have sent doctors and nurses, along with countless young soldiers, to the front lines." Meanwhile, Ethiopia, "with tacit approval from the United States," has been "steadily slipping soldiers across the border, trying to hold off the Islamists and shore up Somalia's weak, unpopular and divided transitional government." Centcom Commander Gen. John Abizaid "recently flew to Ethiopia to meet with Prime Minister Meles Zenawi," who told American officials that he could cripple the Islamist forces "in one to two weeks." Abizaid "made it clear that a broad military invasion of Somalia could create a humanitarian crisis across the Horn of Africa," Centcom officials said, but "did not tell Ethiopian officials to pull their troops out."

The Washington Post (12/14, A19, McCrummen, 690K) reports as tensions rise "there is fear that an all-out conflict in the Horn of Africa may be unavoidable." For now, hopes for a peaceful resolution "are pinned on a UN Security Council resolution adopted last week, authorizing deployment of an African Union force, excluding troops from neighboring states" to Baidoa, the seat of Somalia's transitional government. Some analysts, however, "contend that the measure has already prompted" the Islamic militants to "push toward Baidoa and will ultimately serve as a rallying point for the movement's more radical factions."

Russia Poised To Cut Off Gas Supplies To Belarus, Georgia. The Financial Times (12/14, Buckley, Ostrovsky) reports, "Russia is preparing to cut off natural gas supplies to neighbouring Belarus and Georgia unless the two former Soviet republics agree by the year-end to pay much higher prices in 2007. Coming a year after Gazprom, the Russian gas giant, briefly cut gas to Ukraine in a similar pricing dispute, such a move could provoke further criticism that Moscow is using energy as a political tool." The Times adds, "Action against Belarus could affect supplies to Poland and Germany because a transit pipeline runs across the republic, though it carries only a third of the volumes running through a bigger export pipeline across Ukraine. ... Gazprom has made clear it is prepared to reduce price increases in exchange for stakes in the republics' gas distribution networks."

The Financial Times (12/14, Buckley) says, "Russia is set to deal a double blow to the economy of one of its closest allies – potentially making life much more difficult for the man the US has called 'Europe's last dictator.' As well as pressing for Belarus to pay much more for its natural gas, Moscow said this week it would slap an export duty on what are currently duty-free Russian crude oil exports to its close Slavic neighbour." The "measures could sharply reduce or wipe out the $4bn-plus effective annual subsidy Russia provides to Belarus, which has helped Alexander Lukashenko, its authoritarian president, deliver higher wages and living standards to his 10m people." Analysts "suggest Moscow is penalising Mr Lukashenko for not delivering on pledges of closer integration with Russia, including the currency union and selling half of Beltransgaz, the Belarusian gas distributor, to Gazprom."

Litivinenko's Poisoning Continues To Spark Commentary. In an editorial this morning, the Washington Post (12/14, A30, 690K) says "it's still not known how the former Russian KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko came to ingest the deadly dose of polonium-210 that killed him in London last month. But thanks to the radioactive trail left behind by the isotope, some important conclusions about the case are now possible. First, the polonium was smuggled into Britain from Russia, where most of the known global supply of the intensely toxic substance is produced. Second, the dose was almost certainly carried by one or both of the former Russian security operatives -- one of them also a KGB alumnus -- whom Mr. Litvinenko met at a London hotel Nov. 1." Also, "the government of Vladimir Putin is making it difficult for British and German investigators to question the suspects, who are now sequestered in Moscow hospitals." The case "should cause Western governments, including the Bush administration, to insist on some answers from Mr. Putin."

Oleg Gordievsky, a former who colonel in the Soviet KGB who defected to Britain in 1985, writes in the Washington Post (12/14, A31, 690K), "The KGB and its predecessors liquidated people abroad quite regularly in the 1920s and '30s and even after World War II. But after two embarrassing and highly publicized defections of assassins, in 1957 and 1959, these activities ceased. … There were no secret assassinations under Mikhail Gorbachev or Boris Yeltsin. But under Vladimir Putin, the militant element of the KGB (now known as the FSB) slowly began working to persuade the leadership to carry out such killings, according to my sources."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Leahy Vows "Real" Oversight Of FBI, DOJ Anti-Terror Tactics. The AP (12/14, Kellman) reports, "President Bush should expect tougher oversight of the war on terrorism and a closer look at his administration's policies on torture and other human rights issues, the incoming chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee said Wednesday." Sen. Patrick Leahy "said he would also deal with what he says are the administration's human rights abuses by creating a new subcommittee focused on legislation on such issues as torture and detainee treatment." The AP adds, "The incoming chairman should not count on big changes in regard to oversight of the Justice Department, according to a spokesman for the agency. 'As we have for the past six years, we're looking forward to working with the Senate Judiciary Committee,' said spokesman Brian Roehrkasse. The relationship, he added, includes 'working with the committee to provide information that it legitimately needs.' 'In the past, we've reached accommodations, and working together we expect we can do so in the future,' he said. Expecting resistance to his plans to examine the administration's use of executive power, Leahy said he would not hesitate to subpoena witnesses and documents. e said he expected to summon Attorney General Alberto Gonzales before his panel 'soon.'" The AP notes, "Roehrkasse maintained that the administration's domestic surveillance program and treatment of detainees fall within the bounds of U.S. and international law and are appropriate responses to the terrorist threat the nation faces."

McClatchy (12/14, Talev) reports Leahy "said Wednesday that he'll subpoena documents and testimony on U.S. terrorism, detainees and domestic-surveillance programs if Bush administration officials don't cooperate," but he "did not specify whom he might subpoena. … One document he may seek to subpoena, he said, is what's believed to be a 2002 memo listing authorized CIA interrogation techniques on suspected terrorists." Roehrkasse "did not address that memo specifically, but said his department had kept lawmakers sufficiently in the loop about terrorism matters. 'The department will continue to work closely with the Congress as they exercise their oversight functions, and we will appropriately respond to all requests in the spirit of that longstanding relationship,' Roehrkasse said." Bloomberg (12/14, Roberts) notes, "Leahy said he told…Gonzales two weeks ago that he will be asked to appear before the Senate panel to defend the administration's use of wiretapping without a court warrant, which Leahy said has eroded U.S. constitutional rights. 'I expect to get answers. If we don't then we'll use the subpoena,' Leahy said."

The Washington Times (12/14, Hurt, 88K) reports, "Though short on specifics, Mr. Leahy criticized the program of wiretapping without warrants and said he hopes to update the laws governing foreign intelligence warrants. 'With meaningful oversight and cooperation from this administration, we can achieve the right balance,' he said." The New York Times (12/14, Johnston, 1.16M) quotes Leahy saying, "This has been an unfortunate chapter in Congress's history. … I have never seen a Congress so willfully derelict in its duties as during this administration." Leahy also "accused the White House of 'corrosive unilateralism' in refusing to cooperate with Congress. After the September 2001 attacks, he said, 'the White House accelerated its power plays at the expense of the other branches of government -- all in the name of fighting terrorism.'" The Los Angeles Times (12/14, Schmidt, 850K), under the headline "Leahy Threatens To Subpoena Bush Officials," adds that Leahy's comments "represent the strongest and most specific statements yet directed at the White House on the investigative agenda of the Democratic leaders poised to assume control of Congress in January." Leahy's "threat shows the depth of frustration among Democrats who believe the administration has withheld crucial details about some of the most provocative anti-terrorism moves since the Sept. 11 attacks."

Fox News' Big Story with John Gibson (12/13, 5:31 p.m.) reported, "Senator Patrick Leahy said this election was an intervention by the American people, who he believes want change on everything from the war in Iraq to judicial nominees to the warrantless surveillance program. … He says he may call Attorney General Alberto Gonzales in to testify about the program again and says if he doesn't get the answers he wants, he'll subpoena them. Some conservative were quick to react saying he spent 99% of his speech bashing the President in order to lay a cracked foundation for pushing the left's political agenda through Congress." FNC Your World with Neil Cavuto (12/13, 4:07 p.m.) added that "Leahy left little doubt about the issues he will cover once assumed control of the committee on law and order. On his hit list, the warrant was wiretapped program. He sees the surveillance which targets the communications of suspected terrorists as an erosion of privacy and says it is time the administration is held accountable."

State Department Official Warns Terrorists May Target Satellites. The AP (12/14, Schweid) reports "the Bush administration warned Wednesday against threats by terrorist groups and other nations against US commercial and military satellites, and discounted the need for a treaty aimed at preventing an arms race in space." Undersecretary of State Robert G. Joseph also "reasserted US policy that it has a right to use force against hostile nations or terror groups that might try to attack American satellites or ground installations that support space programs. President Bush adopted a new US space policy earlier this year." Said Joseph, in prepared remarks to the George C. Marshall Institute, "We reserve the right to defend ourselves against hostile attacks and interference with our space assets." Joseph, "the senior arms control official at the State Department, said nations cannot all be counted on to use space purely for peaceful purposes." The Washington Times (12/14, Gertz, 88K) reports the story under the headline "US To Defend Space With Military Force," and quotes Joseph saying, "No nation, no non-state actor, should be under the illusion that the United States will tolerate a denial of our right to the use of space for peaceful purposes." The Times adds "US officials said the comments are an indirect warning to China, which has fired a ground-based laser gun at a US satellite that passed over its territory -- an event viewed as one sign of Beijing's efforts to develop space arms that can blind or destroy systems."

Pakistani Judge Dismisses Terror Charges Against Trans-Atlantic Plot Suspect. The New York Times (12/14, Masood, 1.16M) reports, "A judge threw out terrorism charges on Wednesday against Rashid Rauf, a Briton of Pakistani descent whom prosecutors depicted as a major figure in a plot to smuggle liquid explosives onto trans-Atlantic airliners and detonate the bombs in flight." The ruling "means there are now no terrorism charges against two people once accused of being linchpins of a major bombing plot by Al Qaeda. The other is Tayib Rauf, Mr. Rauf's younger brother, who was detained in Britain in August and was soon set free without charge." But "it was not clear whether the ruling would clear the way for Rashid Rauf's return to Britain for questioning on other charges."

Two ELF Terrorists To Plead Guilty To Vail Fire. The AP (12/14) reports, "Two of the people accused of taking part setting a fire at the Vail Ski Resort in 1998 are expected to plead guilty Thursday. Both "Chelsea Gerlach and Stanislaus Meyeroff are currently in Oregon, where they are being held as eco-terrorists in another case." They are members of the ELF, which "said it firebombed buildings and ski lifts at the Vail resort to protect the development of wild lynx."

Investors Urged To Press Corporations On Trade With Terror-Sponsoring States. Sarah Steelman, the state treasurer of Missouri, writes in today's Wall Street Journal (12/14, A21, 2.04M), "According to the independent research provider Conflict Securities Advisory Group (CSAG), there are some 485 publicly traded companies doing business with four regimes designated by the State Department as sponsors of terror. The activities of these mostly foreign-owned companies -- such as Total, Sinopec and BNP Paribas -- in terrorist-sponsoring states generate billions in revenues for the governments of Iran, Sudan, North Korea and Syria. By so doing, these companies create part of the cash flow that enables these nations to underwrite the activities that our armed forces are fighting around the world." Steelman adds, "In this case, shareholders -- citizens -- have the power to influence. If American investors in these businesses -- not only institutional investors such as public pension systems, money managers, investment trusts and university endowments, but also individuals -- pressure companies to sever such business relations, they can become change agents in the financial sector and force multipliers for our troops abroad."

Feinberg Calls For End To Impasse Over Compensation For 9/11 Injuries. Kenneth R. Feinberg, the former administrator of the federal Sept. 11 Victim Compensation Fund, writes in the New York Times (12/14, 1.16M), "Five years have passed since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, but the flood of litigation continues unabated in federal court in Manhattan. Some 6,000 people are suing New York City, the Port Authority and more than 100 private contractors for negligence in exposing workers to toxic dust and fumes after the collapse of the World Trade Center. Thousands of additional claims are expected in the next few months. Waiting in the wings are approximately 40,000 workers who cleaned up the site after Sept. 11, as well as residents of Lower Manhattan, observers of the cleanup effort and people who simply breathed the harmful air on their way to work -- all potential litigants. Some will probably eventually suffer the same ailments that have led to the current lawsuits." Feinberg goes to suggest that "the principles of the 9/11 fund" be used "as a blueprint to resolve the current litigation and get money into the hands of recovery workers and others quickly. More than $1 billion in public funds is currently available for distribution as part of the initial federal appropriation earmarked for New York City's 9/11 recovery."

Judge Rules Against Hamdan, Upholding Military Commissions Act. The AP (12/14, Apuzzo) reports, "A federal judge upheld the Bush administration's new terrorism law Wednesday, agreeing that Guantanamo Bay detainees do not have the right to challenge their imprisonment in US courts. The ruling by U.S. District Judge James Robertson is the first to address the new Military Commissions Act and is a legal victory for the Bush administration at a time when it has been fending off criticism of the law from Democrats and libertarians. Robertson rejected a legal challenge by Salim Ahmed Hamdan, a former driver for Osama bin Laden whose case prompted the Supreme Court to strike down the Bush administration's policy on detainees last year." The AP notes, "Justice Department spokeswoman Kathleen Blomquist said the agency was pleased with the ruling. Government lawyers have repeatedly argued that Guantanamo Bay detainees have no right to use U.S. courts. Blomquist noted that the new law allows detainees to challenge their detention before military tribunals, then contest the tribunal's ruling before a Washington appeals court."

The New York Times (12/14, Lewis, 1.16M) reports, "The judge said the Military Commissions Act, passed by Congress in September and signed into law by President Bush the following month, was unambiguous in denying Guantánamo detainees the use of a habeas corpus statute. Like Mr. Hamdan, hundreds of other prisoners at the base have challenged their detention, in similar cases." The Times adds that "in his decision Wednesday, the judge said circumstances had changed fundamentally with enactment of the new law. And not only is Mr. Hamdan barred from a challenge under the habeas statute, the judge said, he cannot follow the usual second avenue to bring a habeas challenge — invoking the Constitution — because it is unclear that noncitizens at Guantánamo have that right."

The Washington Post (12/14, Barnes, 690K) reports that "the quickly produced MCA, passed by Congress in late September" may be reviewed by the incoming Democratic Congress, "nevertheless, the Justice Department celebrated the dismissal of Hamdan's case by Robertson, a civil rights advocate in private practice who was appointed to the bench by President Bill Clinton. He was also the first judge to invalidate the Bush plan for war tribunals when he first considered Hamdan's case in 2004. 'We are pleased that Judge Robertson agreed that the Military Commissions Act removes federal court jurisdiction over this and similar cases, and that the Military Commissions Act is constitutional,' said Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse. 'The Constitution does not provide alien enemy combatants detained at Guantanamo Bay with the constitutional right to file a petition for habeas corpus in our civilian courts, and thus Congress may regulate those combatants' access to the courts,' he said."

The Los Angeles Times (12/14, Savage, 850K) notes, "The ruling clears the way for the Bush administration to go forward with a military trial of Hamdan. It is also likely to be the first of many decisions interpreting the new law." Sens. Patrick Leahy and Arlen Specter "also have announced they will seek to restore habeas rights for legal immigrants when the new Congress opens in January."

2004 Pentagon Report Found Possible Violations To US Detention Rules. The Washington Post (12/15, A1, Leonnig, 690K) reports, "A previously undisclosed Pentagon report concluded that the three terrorism suspects held at a brig in South Carolina were subjected to months of isolation, and it warned that their 'unique' solitary confinement could be viewed as violating US detention standards. According to a summary of the 2004 report obtained by The Washington Post, interrogators attempted to deprive one detainee, Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri, a Qatari citizen and former student in Peoria, Ill., of sleep and religious comfort by taking away his Koran, warm food, mattresses and pillow as part of an interrogation plan approved by the high-level Joint Forces Command." Interrogators also "prevented the International Committee of the Red Cross from visiting at least one detainee, according to the report, which noted evidence of other unspecified, unauthorized interrogation techniques." The report by the Navy's inspector general "was presented to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld in May 2004 and was declassified in 2005. It was the first to raise the question of mistreatment of alleged enemy combatants inside the United States."

Padilla Lawyers Want Judge, Not Doctor, To Determine Competency. The New York Times (12/14, Sontag, 1.16M) reports, "Saying that he was mentally damaged as a result of his three years and eight months in a naval brig in South Carolina, lawyers for Jose Padilla asked a federal judge in Miami yesterday to determine his competency to stand trial on terrorism conspiracy charges. … 'Jose's experience as a detainee was so traumatic that it's physically and mentally painful for him to answer the questions that we put to him,' said Orlando do Campo, a federal public defender in Miami. 'He just shuts down. We're covering a lot of the same area as his interrogators, and he doesn't want to relive it.'" The Times adds, "Saying that there was 'sufficient cause' to conduct a competency hearing, the government, in papers filed yesterday, urged the judge to do so." Padilla's lawyers "said he opposed this request that his competency be evaluated. Dr. Hegarty, one of two mental health professionals who examined him, said Mr. Padilla was 'fearful of being thought of as crazy.'"

Florida Terrorism Suspect Denies Charges He Planned Terror Attacks. WFOR-TV in Miami (12/13, Andrews) on its web site reported that Florida terrorism suspect Narseal Batiste, who was one of seven charged with conspiring to blow up the Sears Tower in Chicago and other Federal buildings, "wrote a 25-page letter to CBS4's Brian Andrews, in which he says he and his group never had terrorist intentions. Instead, he said he and his 'followers' were looking for money for their Liberty City religious organization." Batiste wrote, "I want you to know that I never had any intentions of doing a terrorist act. … My group and I never had reason to harm anyone." He claims "the FBI put drugs in food he and co-defendants Patrick Abraham were served by the FBI informant the night a surveillance tape was shot, on which Batiste talks about blowing up the Sears Tower. He wrote that he's simply telling the informant what he wanted to hear, just so he could get money from him for their church." He "says he and his group were desperate for money, and that last September, a convenience store owner from Yemen offered assistance. He says the North Miami Beach shopkeeper, whom Batiste identifies as Abbas, teamed up with the feds to get help for his own financial and immigration problems by concocting the lies that led to Batiste and six others being arrested."

The Washington Post/AP (12/14) in a widely distributed article reports, "Batiste said he only told an FBI informant posing as an al-Qaida operative he planned to blow up the Sears Towers because that's what he thought the man wanted to hear. Batiste said he was hoping to get money from the informant so he could help his organization, which he said was called the Universal Divine Saviours." Batiste wrote, "I made it up right then and there. … If you listen to the words I was saying, it's unrealistic, such as I need horses." He "also blames a convenience store owner from Yemen, who he says befriended him and later teamed up with the informants, feeding them lies to help his own financial and immigration problems." The Miami Herald (12/14, Weaver, 286K) in a brief story adds that Batiste "claims the FBI and its informant were bent on 'setting us up.' Authorities have denied the accusation, which will be a key defense issue at the trial set for Sept. 4, 2007."

Darleen Crawford, president of the Nationwide Tractor Trailer Driving School in Smithfield, R.I., contacted the Highway Watch's Information Sharing and Analysis Center and a "joint investigation was then launched by investigators from the Rhode Island State Fusion Center, the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force (JTTF) in Rhode Island, New York and New Jersey and the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement." They "learned that when Mullawala obtained his driver's license from the Rhode Island Registry of Motor Vehicles, he gave a false statement indicating he was a Rhode Island resident. ICE then determined he was a citizen of India and in the United States on an expired temporary student visa." He was arrested Tuesday and police are "studying a computer taken from one of Mullawala's residence," according to Major Steven O'Donnell with the Rhode Island State Police, who said Mullawala "apparently was a computer expert. They will look at his e-mails, as well as any Web sites he frequented. Any potential overseas connections will be handled by the FBI and DHS, O'Donnell said, although none have yet turned up." New York JTTF official "said he could not comment on the status of this or any ongoing investigation.

Columnist Warns Democrats May Hamper Successful Strategies In Stopping Terrorist Attacks. Pundit Michelle Malkin in an opinion piece available on Yahoo! News (12/14) writes that "it was enforcement of immigration laws that played a critical role in detaining" Mullawala. Similar to the 9/11 terrorists "and several al Qaeda operatives identified in the United States over the past decade, Mullawala was here on a temporary student visa that he had overstayed." Malkin notes, "Over the past two years, the FBI has put law enforcement officials on high alert for U.S.-based operatives connected to al Qaeda who may be in possession of commercial driver's licenses and may be planning to use truck bombs." But soon "Democrats led by Nancy Pelosi -- a staunch opponent of strengthened ID laws and strict immigration enforcement -- will reassume power in Washington. An open borders-friendly White House has expressed willingness to deal with them. So we know who supports illegal alien workers and potential terrorist drivers waiting for amnesty. But who will stand up for us?"

WAR NEWS:

Bush Says He Will Not Be Rushed On Iraq Strategy. The Los Angeles Times (12/14, Spiegel, Barnes, 850K) reports that President Bush yesterday "defended his decision to put off his widely anticipated shift in Iraq policy until early next year, saying he wanted his new Defense secretary to weigh in and warning he would not be rushed into making a decision on how to proceed." As part of his review, Bush "held another round of discussions with senior officials involved in Iraq planning, this time meeting the Joint Chiefs of Staff at the Pentagon, along with outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and his successor, former CIA Director Robert M. Gates." The Times adds, "Although Bush declined to comment on the advice he received from the military leaders, Pentagon officials have said in recent days that top uniformed officers largely have rejected recommendations made by the Iraq Study Group to withdraw most combat forces over the next 15 months, a rejection Bush appeared to agree with."

The AP (12/14, Loven) notes "Bush's meeting at the Pentagon lasted more than 90 minutes." The President "pledged anew to work with the Democratic-controlled Congress that convenes in January 'to forge greater bipartisan consensus' on Iraq policy."

ABC World News (12/13, story 3, 2:40, Gibson, 8.78M) reported the President "sounded a note of defiance saying he's rejected some ideas that would lead to defeat." ABC (Raddatz) added, "It would be hard to exaggerate how high the stakes are for the President. Critics and supporters are both saying, this is his last chance to get this right. At his Pentagon briefing today with Joint Chiefs Chairman Peter Pace, and top military officials, it was clear the President understands the pressure he is under." Bush was shown saying, "I will be delivering my plans after a long deliberation, after steady deliberation. I'm not going to be rushed into making a difficult decision." Later in the broadcast, ABC showed footage of the President saying, "I've heard some ideas that would lead to defeat and I reject those ideas -- ideas such as leaving before the job is done."

The CBS Evening News (12/13, story 4, 2:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The President said he won't do anything that would lead to defeat," and NBC Nightly News (12/13, story 3, 2:20, Gregory, 9.87M) said that "while officials say the President made the 'strategic decisions on the way forward,' Mr. Bush and national security team are still grappling on whether to increase troop levels in Iraq and how to increase pressure on the Iraqi government to contain the sectarian fighting. Today, the President was the most critical yet for calls for troop withdrawal, notably the Iraq Study Group's recommendation for withdrawal of combat forces by 2008." Bush was shown saying, "If we lose our nerve, if we are not steadfast in our determination, to help the Iraqi government succeed, we will be handing Iraq over to an enemy that would do us harm." Bush also said, "In the months of October, November and December we have killed or captured nearly 5,900 of the enemy."

McClatchy (12/14, Hutcheson) reports that Bush, "acknowledging that 'our enemy is far from being defeated,'" told US troops "that he would come up with a better plan for victory in Iraq." The President's comments "offered clues to his thinking as he prepares to announce a revised policy for Iraq early next month. He said he's looking for a plan that combines military action, political reconciliation, economic development and diplomatic efforts to get more help from Iraq's regional neighbors. The resolute tone of his remarks may have delivered his clearest message: Standing with the Joint Chiefs of Staff at the Pentagon, Bush assured US troops that he has no intention of leaving Iraq until they finish the job of establishing a stable democracy. … That was in stark contrast to the tone of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group's report, unveiled last week. Its opening words: 'The situation in Iraq is grave and deteriorating.'" Yet, says the New York Times (12/14, Stout, 1.16M), Bush "avoided using the term 'victory' and referred instead to devising 'a strategy to succeed' and an approach to help American troops in Iraq 'achieve their mission.'"

Military Brass Wants Mission Redefined, But 7,000 More Troops Could Be Headed To Iraq. Meanwhile, the Washington Post (12/14, A1, Wright, Tyson, 690K) reports, "The nation's top uniformed leaders are recommending that the United States change its main military mission in Iraq from combating insurgents to supporting Iraqi troops and hunting terrorists, said sources familiar with the White House's ongoing Iraq policy review. … The chiefs do not favor adding significant numbers of troops to Iraq, said sources familiar with their thinking, but see strengthening the Iraqi army as pivotal to achieving some degree of stability." They also "are pressing for a much greater US effort on economic reconstruction and political reconciliation." The Post adds, "Sources said that Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top US commander in Iraq, is reviewing a plan to redefine the American military mission there: US troops would be pulled out of Iraqi cities and consolidated at a handful of US bases while day-to-day combat duty would be turned over to the Iraqi army. Casey is still considering whether to request more troops, possibly as part of an expanded training mission to help strengthen the Iraqi army."

USA Today (12/14, 1A, Brook, 2.27M) also reports, "A proposal developed by top US commanders in Iraq would significantly redeploy troops from a combat role to training and advising Iraqi forces, according to four administration officials. The proposal, requested by…Casey…calls for changing the mission during the next several months, said the officials." USA Today added, "All requested anonymity because they are not authorized to speak publicly about the proposal." This "is 'one of many plans'…Bush is considering as he weighs a new strategy for the war, said one of the officials, who works at the White House."

Additionally, the CBS Evening News (12/13, story 4, 2:15, Martin, 7.66M) reported, "As the President and his national security advisors met with the Joint Chiefs of Staff, a senior military officer directly involved in the deliberations over a new strategy said there probably will be a surge of US troops into Iraq in an attempt to keep the lid on violence in Baghdad. But he ruled out a massive buildup of combat forces, adding 'the Iraqis would never stand for that.' According to this officer, neither the number for the types of troops that would be sent into Baghdad have been decided." And NBC Nightly News (12/13, story 4, 2:10, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) said it had "learned the Army has drawn up orders to send an additional 7,000 combat troops to Iraq by early next year, part of a short-term surge of up to 35,000 combat forces used as military trainers embedded with Iraqi military and police. A second, and far more risky, proposal is what one official called the do-or-die option designed to force Iraqi government to get control over Shiite militias, responsible for most of the sectarian killings in Baghdad."

More Polls Show Bush Support At Record Lows. NBC Nightly News (12/13, story 2, 1:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported on a new NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll. NBC (Russert) added, "The words the Iraq Study Group used to describe the situation in Iraq, grave and deteriorating. Those are the words I would use to describe the President's political condition tonight. Look at these numbers. His approval rating is just 34%, [61% disapprove.] That's the lowest we've ever had in the six years of the Bush Presidency." Williams: "And all of it continues to revolve around this one issue." Russert: "Iraq. Look at this. Only 23% of the American people approve of his handling of the war. 71% disapprove. That is a decline of 11 points in just about two months."

The Wall Street Journal (12/14, A4, Harwood, 2.04M) reports the poll shows "Americans have grown more pessimistic after the Iraq Study Group report that the situation there has become 'dire.'" That "contributed to Mr. Bush's lowest-ever approval rating in the Journal/NBC poll…and turned Americans toward his Democratic adversaries. By 59% to 21%, Americans say Congress rather than Mr. Bush should take the lead in setting policy for the nation." Along similar lines, the Washington Post (12/14, A3, Babington, Cohen, 690K) reports on its own poll in a story titled "New Congress Is More Trusted Than President." Asked "whether they trusted Bush or Democrats in Congress 'to do a better job coping with the main problems the nation faces,' 57 percent of the respondents said congressional Democrats and 31 percent said Bush. When the question was broken down to specific problems, such as Iraq, the economy, immigration and the 'war on terrorism,' Democrats held clear majorities over Bush. Their lead was overwhelming in the area of health care: 64 percent to Bush's 26 percent."

Smith Urges Bush To Craft "Policy That Works." Sen. Gordon Smith said on MSNBC's Hardball (12/13, Matthews) that he wants Bush "to come up with a policy that works. … It has to be said about our troops that the conquests of the tyrannies in Afghanistan and Iraq, these were textbook operations. They did a remarkable job. I'm just not sure we had a Chapter Two to win as is the American tradition and to leave it better. We have unleashed or opened a Pandora's box of ancient hatreds which has devolved or mutated into a civil war. … That is not the American fight. We can't fix it. And that part is not our fault. But at the end of the day, the brutal truth is that they have to fight it out so we know who's in charge. And in the meantime, I don't want our soldiers being caught in the crossfire."

Maliki Considers Breaking With Sadr. The AP (12/14, Hendawi, Abdul-Zahra) reports, "Iraq's prime minister is weighing whether to sever his alliance with a radical Shiite cleric blamed for much of the country's sectarian violence, aides said Wednesday. But isolating Muqtada al-Sadr could lead to more deadly attacks, even if the strategy could produce a more stable administration over time." Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki "has been meeting over the last three days with a small circle of his Dawa Party stalwarts to discuss their options, according to his aides who spoke on condition of anonymity because the subject is sensitive. The meetings began after reports surfaced of a proposed realignment of the alliance supporting the governing coalition, the aides said." The White House "has acknowledged efforts to shore up al-Maliki's coalition but has denied that the move is aimed at replacing him, though some of his aides fear this is the goal. 'We've talked in recent days about a moderate bloc that has Sunni, Shia and Kurdish leaders,' White House spokesman Tony Snow said Wednesday." The Los Angeles Times (12/14, Daragahi, 850K) runs a similar report.

McClatchy (12/13, Allam, Hammoudi), meanwhile, reports that "even as Sadr presses for more land and power, his grasp over Baghdad remains tenuous. … These days, the safest route to Sadr's west Baghdad office runs through an obstacle course of both legal and dubious checkpoints in an area known for kidnappings and car bombings. … Gone are the peaceful seminary days. In their place, men in long overcoats hover, casting steely glares on anyone who enters the compound. The courtyard brims with new faces and dialects. Some were distraught Iraqis seeking financial or security help; others were militiamen or workers from Sadr's social programs."

US Denies Saudis Threatened To Back Iraqi Sunnis. AFP (12/14) reports Assistant Secretary of State Sean McCormack Wednesday "denied" a report in the New York Times claiming Saudi Arabia had warned it would financially back Iraq's Sunni community against the Shiite majority, if American troops were withdrawn. McCormack said such reports "ran counter to stated Saudi policy," which he said was aimed at securing the territorial integrity of Iraq and national reconciliation. "That has been their position; remains their position, because they believe that is in their national interest, and is not done out of charity," McCormack said. However, CNN meanwhile "quoted an unnamed senior US official as saying the King read Cheney the 'riot act' and expressed growing concern over Iraq's deterioration." White House spokesman Tony Snow refused to detail the content of Cheney's private conversations, but said the reports were "not something that has been described to me as something that is consistent with the conversations."

Saudi Leadership's Split Could Hurt US Efforts. The AP (12/14, Nasrawi) reports, "Saudi Arabia's royal family and government leaders are deeply divided over how to handle the growing crisis in Iraq and other looming Mideast problems like Iran, with some favoring strong aid to fellow Sunnis and others more cautious." The split "played a key role in this week's abrupt resignation of the Saudi ambassador to Washington. It also could hurt US efforts to forge a new overall strategy to calm Iraq." The AP adds, "More broadly, the internal dispute shows how Arab countries like Saudi Arabia, long key partners in U.S. efforts to stabilize the Middle East, are struggling to decide how to proceed as Iraq boils over and Iran gains influence. The tension in the region is straining Saudi relations with the United States, despite both countries' assertions that all is fine." The resignation of Prince Turki al-Faisal, "after just 15 months as ambassador to Washington, for example, came after Saudi officials concluded he was not succeeding at building strong ties with the United States, a Saudi official said Wednesday."

At Least 55 Killed In Iraq Yesterday. The AP (12/14, Wagner) reports, "A new round of car bombings and other violence struck Iraq on Wednesday, with 55 people killed or found dead as the Iraqi government unveiled a plan to assume responsibility for security in Baghdad by early next year." The "relentless attacks indicate how hard it may be for the Iraqis to replace US forces in the capital." The "scope of the problem was clear…from the first bombing at a bus stop during morning rush hour through the announcement at 9 p.m. that the tortured, bullet-ridden bodies of 21 kidnap victims had been found on the streets of the capital." The violence "came ahead of a national reconciliation conference scheduled for Saturday. The gathering is aimed at rallying ethnic, religious and political groups around a common strategy for handling Iraq's problems."

The New York Times (12/14, Semple, 1.16M) notes "four mortar shells hit an apartment block popular with Palestinians in the eastern neighborhood of Baladiat, killing one Palestinian and wounding six, the Interior Ministry official said." Palestinians in Iraq, "a population now concentrated in Baghdad, have been frequent victims of the Shiite militias this year. They carry the twin stigmas of being Sunni Arabs and of having enjoyed privileges under Saddam Hussein who, as part of his campaign to fashion himself into a Pan-Arab leader, was solicitous of their support. The housing complex that was attacked was created by the Baath Party for Palestinians who fled to Iraq following the creation of Israel in 1948." The Washington Post (12/14, A25, Trejos, 690K) runs a similar story.

Defying US Policy, Democratic Senator Meets With Syrian President. The AP (12/14, Flaherty) reports, "In a direct affront to the Bush administration, a Democratic senator spent an hour Wednesday with Syrian President Bashar Assad in Damascus, emerging from the meeting to say Assad was willing to help control the Iraq-Syrian border." Florida Sen. Bill Nelson, a member of the Armed Services and Foreign Relations committees, "met with Assad after the State Department said that it disapproved of his trip. The United States has limited diplomatic ties with Syria because of its support of Hezbollah and Hamas, which the US deems terrorist organizations, and President Bush has expressed reluctance to seek help from Damascus on Iraq until the Syrians curb that support and reduce their influence in Lebanon."

McClatchy (12/14, Clark) reports, "Midway through the Florida Democrat's conference call with reporters, however, the White House issued a statement denouncing the Syrian government's human rights record and calling on it to 'immediately free all political prisoners.' … The administration said the statement on Syria's human rights was unrelated to Nelson's visit, but White House spokesman Tony Snow said the administration didn't 'think that members of Congress ought to be going there.'" He also "said the White House had opposed Syria's involvement in Lebanon and noted that 'it's a real stretch to think the Syrians don't know where we stand or what we think.'"

On Fox News' Your World (12/13, Cavuto), Sen. Jon Kyl discussed Nelson's meeting with Assad. Kyl said, "Bill Nelson's a friend of mine and I don't mean to be too critical. But it does seem to me that each team has one quarterback. We elect a president to be our spokesman with foreign countries. And he does speak, through the State Department. And certainly, elected senators are not supposed to be part of that diplomatic team. … The Iraq Study Group is a nice group of people and they have given their advice to the President. He's taken it under advisement. That doesn't mean that it's now the policy of the United States government, or most especially, that 100 individual senators then decide to go off on their own and be the spokesman for the United States. Especially with a country like Syria, you've got to speak with a very clear message. And you can't do that if you've got 100 different people with different messages talking to him."

The Washington Times (12/14, Dinan, 88K) reports Sen. Christopher J. Dodd "said he is also planning a visit to Syria during his upcoming trip to the Middle East. 'When you've got governments like Syria which have influence on the course of events, it's important to engage with them,' he said."

Nearly 2,100 Taliban Fighters Killed Since September. The AP (12/14, Straziuso) reports, "Almost 2,100 militants have been killed in Afghanistan since Sept. 1 in operations involving coalition special forces soldiers, a US Army spokesman said. That means more than half of the country's insurgency-related deaths this year have come in the last three months." The AP adds, "About 900 of the 2,077 deaths came during Operation Medusa, a major offensive in September in the southern province of Kandahar. Special forces soldiers worked alongside conventional forces from Canada during the fight. The two primary missions for the US special forces soldiers in Afghanistan are conducting counterterrorism operations and supporting NATO troops, Master Sgt. Clifford Richardson said in an interview this week at Bagram, the main US base in Afghanistan."

NBC Nightly News (12/13, story 7, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "This year, the Taliban, which has made a dramatic comeback, has killed more than 150 US and NATO soldiers, up four times over last year." NBC (Maceda) added, "This is the new Taliban country, a no-man's land filled with fighters for hire, drug dealers, warlords and assorted criminals. In the towns of Waziristan, armed Islamic militants hold sway governing like a state within a state. Some call it the heart of 'Jihadistan.' Taliban and Al Qaeda fighters launch attacks inside Afghanistan and regroup back in Pakistan. They are using an Al Qaeda tactic, suicide bombers, often trained and equipped by recruiters in Pakistan. … The President of Pakistan Pervez Musharraf is under increasing US pressure to clean out the place. But some three years of military offensives by some 80,000 troops have failed. Another strategy that hasn't worked, pulling Pakistani troops back. That's led to even more cross border attacks. As the Taliban haven thrives, winning America's forgotten war next door becomes even harder."

State Department Offering Bonuses To Entice Service In Iraq, Afghanistan. The Washington Times (12/14, A1, Kralev, 88K) reports on its front page that "nearly two-thirds of the 276 Foreign Service members who volunteered to serve in Iraq next year were found unqualified for the jobs, aggravating a shortage that has left the State Department scrambling to fully staff its embassy and other operations in the country." As a result, the department is "now offering improved benefits and career-enhancing inducements in a bid to fill 49 vacancies in Iraq" and "all assignments to other foreign missions have been put on hold until openings in Iraq, Afghanistan and other high-priority posts are filled." In a cable to all US embassies and consulates earlier this month, State said "276 Foreign Service members applied for 160 positions in Iraq beginning next summer, but only 82 were approved," leaving some diplomats "perplexed by the department's decision to reject so many of its own, while so-called career-development officers are now scrambling to find 'clients' to volunteer for the jobs."

DOJ:

Grassley Recommends Three Iowans For US Attorney Nomination. The Des Moines Register (12/14, 160K) reports Sen. Charles Grassley yesterday recommended three nominees "to the White House…as candidates to become the new U.S. attorney for the Northern District of Iowa. … The current chief prosecutor, U.S. Attorney Charles W. Larson Sr., is retiring at the end of the year." The Register notes, "The candidates recommended by Grassley are: Matt Dummermuth, a native of Elgin who currently works for the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice in Washington, D.C. … Chadwicke Groover of Cedar Rapids, who has worked in in the Northern District office since April and served on the Senate Judiciary Committee staff for five years. … Lisa Krigsten, a native of Sioux City who currently works for the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice in Washington, D.C."

US Awards $45 Million Anti-Corruption Grant To Ukraine. Ukraine's Kyiv Post (12/14, Mashchenko) reports, "Ukrainian Economy Minister Volodymyr Makukha inked a $45 million anti-corruption grant from the U.S. during a recent trip to Washington D.C. The United States government has approved a $45 million grant to help Ukraine fight state graft, with another $500 million in the wings." The Post adds, "At a Dec. 12 press conference in Kyiv, Makukha outlined the components of the grant program: The strengthening of monitoring of civil society and exposure of public corruption; judicial reform; the monitoring and enforcement of ethical and administrative standards; the streamlining of enforcement of regulations; and combating corruption in higher education." The Post notes, "Millenium Challenge's assistance to Ukraine falls under what it refers to as its Threshold Program, an intermediary stage on the way to greater funding, known as Compact assistance. 'The Threshold Program assistance is used to help countries address the specific policy weaknesses indicated by the country's scores on 16 policy indicators,' reads a Millenium Challenge press release. … The Ukraine Threshold program targets many of these obstacles and will be administered by the United States Agency for International Development (USAID) and the U.S. Department of Justice."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Skilling Reports To Prison. The AP (12/14, Condon) reports, "This was what one of Wall Street's biggest success stories had come to. Jeffrey Skilling rode past a dozen waiting reporters and photographers, got out of the silver Jeep Liberty, hugged his wife and walked quietly into a life of imprisonment and menial jobs that will pay him less over the next two decades than he made for a single hour as chief executive of Enron. … This was nothing like metropolitan Houston, but rather a farm town in Minnesota. There was no $4.7 million Mediterranean-style mansion, but a one-time college dormitory room. Skilling reported to the Federal Correctional Institution on Wednesday." The AP notes, "Barring a successful appeal, even with time off for good behavior, the 53-year-old Skilling will be an old man at the end of his term -- 24 years, four months, more than twice as long as the sentence of any other Enron executive. … An important distinction, said former Task Force attorney Sam Buell, is that those below Skilling all pleaded guilty to some offenses, expressed remorse and in some cases went on to cooperate with the prosecution. In several instances, prosecutors recommended leniency in those sentences." NBC Nightly News (12/13, story 5, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) noted Skilling "was accompanied by his brother Mark and wife Rebecca as he arrived at the minimum security facility to begin his 24-year sentence for fraud and other crimes committed."

The Washington Post (12/14, D1, Johnson, 690K) reports, "Skilling's sentencing in October marked the last in a series of stiff penalties given to top executives convicted of corporate crimes committed in the booming '90s. His prison term is only a few months shorter than that of WorldCom founder Bernard J. Ebbers, who is serving a 25-year sentence in Louisiana for spearheading an accounting fraud at the telecommunications company he founded." The Post notes, "Skilling, who continues to profess his innocence and make the case that Enron was a healthy enterprise, will spend his time alongside 1,070 other inmates, most of whom were incarcerated for committing federal drug crimes, said Felicia Ponce, a prison spokeswoman. Skilling will be required to work 7 1/2 hours per day at one of a variety of institutional jobs, including food service worker, warehouse employee and groundskeeper. Inmates earn between 12 and 40 cents per hour."

The Houston Chronicle (12/14, A1, Hays, 530K) reports, "Sam Buell, a former prosecutor for the Justice Department's disbanded Enron Task Force who led the government's effort to secure the 2004 indictment against Skilling, said no one's incarceration is a cause for celebration, but 'following through on the law's word is absolutely necessary to making effective our most potent mechanism for deterring people from seriously harming others.'" Buell added "that whether a multidecade sentence is needed to achieve such deterrence should be debated. Skilling received by far the harshest punishment of anyone convicted of Enron-related crimes. 'For major fraud that did in a huge public company, the answer has to be at least a substantial number of years. Whether decades are really necessary is a question we ought to be discussing as a society,' Buell said."

Judge Rejects Scrushy-Siegelman Motion For Retrial. The Wall Street Journal (12/14, B7, Brooks, 2.04M) reports, "Richard M. Scrushy moved a step closer to a possible prison sentence as a federal judge rejected the HealthSouth Corp. founder's claim that jurors who convicted him of political-corruption charges were influenced by emails and a copy of an indictment downloaded from the Internet during deliberations." US District Judge Mark Fuller "refused to grant a motion for a new trial by Mr. Scrushy and former Alabama Gov. Don Siegelman, both found guilty in June of participation in a scheme to pay $500,000 bribes in return for a spot on a state regulatory panel. Both argued that two jurors used outside information to strong-arm the rest of the jury into a conviction." The Journal adds, "While the judge concluded that jurors were 'exposed' to the indictment and a description of jury-foreman responsibilities posted on the court's Web site, it made no difference in the outcome of the 11-day deliberations, he ruled." Scrushy lawyer Arthur Leach "said he plans to appeal yesterday's ruling."

Lawmakers Demand Hurd Explain H-P Options Timing. The AP (12/14, Robertson) reports, "The congressional panel investigating Hewlett-Packard Co.'s boardroom spying probe has demanded that CEO Mark Hurd explain $1.37 million worth of options he exercised just before the scandal became public. Hurd's cashout Aug. 25 — before HP disclosed the spying tactics in a Sept. 6 regulatory filing — did not appear to be part of a prescheduled program, the panel's ranking members, Reps. John Dingell and Bart Stupak…said in a letter to Hurd publicly released Wednesday. The activity came the same day Hurd was questioned by HP's outside attorneys investigating the circumstances surrounding the ill-fated effort to ferret out leaks by board members to the news media, the letter stated." The AP adds, "Dingell and Stupak also asked in the letter to 'please inform us whether any other HP officers or directors engaged in similar transactions during this period.' He was given until Dec. 21 to comply with the request." The Financial Times (12/14, Allison) notes that the letter said, "Continuing revelations about widespread 'backdating' and 'spring-loading' abuses have raised questions about whether executives are cashing in ('bullet dodging') while in posession of potentially damaging material facts that shareholders do not know."

H-P Board Drops Prominent Legal Advisor. The New York Times (12/14, Darlin, 1.16M) reports, "Hewlett-Packard's board has ended a crucial advisory relationship with Larry W. Sonsini, the powerful Silicon Valley lawyer, according to a person with close connections to the board. … After the year's end, Mr. Sonsini and the firm he helped build, Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, will no longer serve as outside counsel to the board. The law firm will still do legal work for Hewlett-Packard." The Times notes, "Mr. Sonsini and his firm were not involved in the spying," but "he was caught up in the events, and was criticized for failing to prevent the incident from damaging the H.P. H.P.'s search for another lawyer to serve as outside counsel is expected to set off a scramble among Silicon Valley firms."

Hurd Tells Analysts H-P Continues To Diversify, Streamline. IDG News Service (12/13, Montalbano) reported, "Hewlett-Packard Co. continues to diversify and streamline its business according to goals CEO Mark Hurd set when he joined the company nearly two years ago. But the company still needs to cut costs to achieve operational efficiency, Hurd told financial analysts today. 'We are a company that is transforming, we are not a company that has transformed,' Hurd said, speaking at a meeting of securities analysts here. Hurd acknowledged that the cost of operations is still too high for the company to run as efficiently as it should, though the company has completed a 10% workforce reduction started last year as part of a huge restructuring effort." IDG noted, "Complicating this goal is HP's acquisition strategy, as the company is working to absorb companies it purchased in 2006."

SEC Eases Sarbanes-Oxley Rules Amid "Flurry" Of Deregulation Orders. The New York Times (12/14, Labaton, 1.16M) reports, "Responding to criticism that regulators had overreacted to years of major corporate scandals, the Securities and Exchange Commission on Wednesday issued a flurry of deregulatory orders and proposals intended to lower costs to public companies. It said the moves would not reduce investor protection. In a daylong proceeding, the commission proposed a loose interpretation for smaller companies of an auditing provision of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act," and it "proposed a rule to make it easier for foreign companies to withdraw their securities from American markets. … 'We hope these proposals, when combined, will make the U.S. markets more attractive and we will get more companies here,' said John W. White, director of the commission's division of corporation finance." SEC also proposed increasing "the financial qualifications for investors in hedge funds, to a net worth of $2.5 million from the current standard of $1 million," and suggested "a new provision on fraud to protect hedge fund investors." The Times notes, "The S.E.C.'s deregulatory push came a day after the Justice Department, in response to similar complaints, imposed new limits on federal prosecutors in white-collar corruption cases. … Like the decision at the Justice Department," the SEC changes "fell short of what some companies and groups had sought."

The Washington Post (12/14, D1, Johnson, 690K) reports the commission "voted 5 to 0…to instruct corporate managers to focus their reviews on the areas that pose the greatest risk of fraud on financial statements. … The rule, which cost businesses millions of dollars more than regulators anticipated, has been a lightning rod…becoming what SEC Chairman Christopher Cox called 'the single biggest challenge' in the accountability law. SEC staff members said that under the new proposal, they would urge corporate managers to use their best judgment in evaluating controls, rather than requiring them to scrutinize specific things such as the integrity of executives and the accuracy of petty cash accounts." Additionally, the Post notes, "Concerns are mounting that more average investors and pension funds are pouring money into the $1 trillion hedge fund industry, which is subject to little oversight. … 'We want to make sure that we send a strong signal . . . that caution is in order,' Cox said. 'We're taking steps to modernize the standard so it will be abundantly clear that these investments are not for mom and pop, unless mom and pop are very sophisticated investors.'"

The Wall Street Journal (12/14, C1, Scannell, 2.04M) reports that the e-proxy rule, also passed yesterday, "allows companies to distribute via the Internet annual reports and materials on board elections and other matters put before shareholders for a vote, while enabling investors to opt to continue to receive paper reports." The rule "will cut printing and mailing costs for corporations. But it will also make it cheaper for activist stockholders to launch fights against corporate boards, because shareholders of companies that distribute information to investors electronically will be able to do likewise. The agency said it plans to make the e-proxy model mandatory by January 2008, though some members expressed concern about doing that." The Journal also reports on the Sarbanes-Oxley changes and hedge fund proposal.

Monster Worldwide Discloses Improper Payments To Founder. Bloomberg (12/14) reports, "Monster Worldwide, owner of the most used online job-listing service, reduced past earnings by $271.9 million yesterday to correct stock-based compensation costs, and it disclosed more than $500,000 in improper payments to its founder, Andrew J. McKelvey. The restatements cut net income for 2005 by $9.24 million, for 2004 by $14.4 million, for 2003 by $27 million, for 2002 by $44.9 million, for 2001 by $65.6 million, and for the cumulative period of 1997 through 2000 by $110.8 million, the company said in a statement." Bloomberg notes, "From 1997 to 2003, options grants were misdated 'intentionally, by persons formerly in positions of responsibility,' to increase their value, the company said. … The company said in June that internal auditors, the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission had started reviewing options grants. … Investigators found that the company had paid for health care costs of nine relatives of Mr. McKelvey and nine people who were personally employed by him at varying times since 1997. It also granted stock options to four of his personal employees. Monster also disclosed payments of thousands of dollars in rent and aircraft fees to businesses owned or controlled by Mr. McKelvey."

Bloomberg Columnist Scoffs At Muni Market Investigation. In a Bloomberg (12/14) syndicated column, Joe Mysak writes, "This is how the government's case against the municipal market will look. The Department of Justice will put out a press release. It will read something like this: 'In the first prosecution of its kind, the Justice Department's Antitrust Division today brought criminal securities fraud charges against a securities brokerage firm for using fictitious noncompetitive bids and other misrepresentations during the restructuring of a municipal bond escrow account.' … Yet the above paragraph isn't a look into the future. Insert 'California' in front of 'securities brokerage firm' and 'Tampa, Florida,' in front of 'municipal bond escrow account,' and you have the wording of a Department of Justice press release sent out on Sept. 28, 1995," against Municipal Government Investment Associates. Mysak adds, "Here it is more than a decade later, and a full investigation and round of settlements later, and the government says it is still looking at bid-rigging, price-fixing, kickbacks and 'anticompetitive practices' in the municipal bond market's reinvestment of proceeds business. … Why didn't they finish the job? Is the market better off for the extra decade of profitable, unfathomable shenanigans? What happened?"

CRIMINAL LAW:

Gonzales Says DOJ Will Pursue Civil Commitments For Sex Offenders. In a front-page story, USA Today (12/14, Johnson, 2.27M) reports, "The Justice Department is planning to detain an undetermined number of violent sex offenders after they have completed their federal prison sentences as part of a program aimed at protecting children, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says. The initiative, modeled after 'civil commitment' laws in 18 states that have kept 2,000 sex offenders locked up for mental health treatment after they served their sentences, will identify federal inmates who authorities think would pose a threat if freed. It's unclear how officials will decide which offenders should be held past their sentences. … Congress has 'given us the right to pursue (civil commitments) and we are going to,' Gonzales told prosecutors…last week." USA notes, "Critics say that such programs unfairly extend punishments beyond sentences set by judges and juries. 'This is merely camouflage for lifetime sentences for some offenses,' says William Buckman of the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers."

Gonzales Waging "Historic" Battle Against Child Sexual Abuse. Under the headline "Gonzales Concentrates Outrage On Child Abuse," USA Today (12/14, 13A, Johnson, 2.27M) reports that shortly after being named Attorney General, Alberto Gonzales "stopped at Drew Oosterbaan's office a few blocks from the department's headquarters. What happened during the next hour, Gonzales says, haunts him to this day. … Gonzales watched silently as streaming video captured from the Internet showed fathers sexually assaulting their daughters, some younger than 10. … Rebecca Gonzales, the attorney general's wife, vividly recalls that day. The nation's top law enforcement officer, she says, arrived home clearly shaken." She noted, "It changed him. That day put fire in him." USA adds, "Passion and emotion aren't things the public sees much of from Gonzales," who, "unlike his predecessor…often fades into the background at his own news conferences," but "punishing abusers has become a particular passion with Gonzales, who is emphasizing the issue like no other attorney general before him. He has launched an energetic campaign by the Justice Department to confront sexual predators with new prosecution tactics, new programs and the promise of more money to combat the problem. Arrests and prosecutions…have risen sharply since Gonzales took office nearly two years ago." National Center for Missing and Exploited Children Ernie Allen "says Gonzales communicates a 'sense of urgency' no other public official of his rank has attempted. 'What he is doing,' Allen says, 'is historic.'" USA Today (12/14, 13A, 2.27M) also includes a brief "Gonzales File" sidebar.

Children's Magazine Editor Sentenced To Six Years In Prison For Solicitation. The AP (12/14, Ngowi) reports, "A former editor for the company that publishes the venerable Weekly Reader, a newspaper for elementary school children, was sentenced Wednesday to six years in prison for soliciting sex from a minor. Noel Neff, 47, of Norwalk, Conn., also was fined $2,500, barred from using the Internet to access child pornography sites and ordered not to associate with anyone under the age of 18 without supervision from an adult who is aware of his criminal record. … His attorney, Francis O'Reilly, said his client planned to appeal." The AP notes, "Investigators said he had arranged to meet with a 14-year-old boy named Chris for sex. Chris was actually an FBI agent who had been posing as a minor and exchanging instant messages with Neff for two months, according to authorities."

Illinois Church Camp Counselor Arrested On Child Porn, Solicitation Charges. The AP (12/14) reports from Columbia, Illinois, "A former church camp leader was arrested on child pornography charges and accused of trying to coax girls, at least one of them a former camper, to pose partly naked or perform a sex act. Aaron Niles, 20, began chatting with the girls online…after working at a Baptist summer camp in 2005, Columbia Police Chief Joe Edwards said Wednesday. He was arrested Tuesday on three counts of child pornography and one count of indecent solicitation of a child related to incidents in April and May." The AP adds, "Investigators were still combing through Niles' computer Wednesday, but 'once we complete this, the potential for additional charges are there,' Edwards said."

DOJ Posts Sex Offender Information On New Web Site. WNWO-TV Toledo (12/13) reported on its Web site, "The justice department has opened a web site which offers photographs and information about offenders, including the neighborhoods they live in and how close they are to schools. Currently, it has records from 22 states. The remaining records are expected to be online by the end of the year."

US Obtains Criminal Subpoena For Classified Document Leaked To ACLU. The Washington Post (12/14, A8, Eggen, 690K) reports, "Federal prosecutors are demanding that the American Civil Liberties Union turn over all copies of a secret document it has obtained, in what is apparently the first time a criminal grand jury subpoena has been used in an attempt to seize leaked material, the ACLU and legal experts said yesterday. Prosecutors obtained the subpoena Nov. 20, saying their demand was part of an investigation into an alleged violation of the Espionage Act of 1917. The ACLU says that the 3 1/2 -page document contains no information that should be classified and that the memo is only 'mildly embarrassing' to the government. Some legal scholars said the case bears similarities to events in the 'Pentagon Papers' case." The Post adds that the case "provides the latest example of the Justice Department's aggressive use of the anti-spying law," and "the ACLU called the subpoena an 'unprecedented abuse' of the government's grand-jury powers that violates the First Amendment." The Post notes, "The subpoena was issued after the ACLU refused a verbal demand from Assistant U.S. Attorney Jennifer G. Rodgers to turn over all copies of the memo, the group said."

The New York Times (12/14, Liptak, 1.16M) notes, "The novelty in the government's approach is in its broad use of a grand jury subpoena, which is typically a way to gather evidence, rather than to confiscate all traces of it. But the subpoena issued to the ACLU seeks 'any and all copies' of a document e-mailed to it unsolicited in October, indicating that the government also wants to prevent further dissemination of the information in the document." The Times adds, "The subpoena raised the possibility that the government had found a new tool to stop the dissemination of secrets, one that could avoid the all but absolute constitutional prohibition on prior restraints on publication."

Judge Sentences "Girls Gone Wild" Owner To Community Service, Fine. The AP (12/14, Nelson) reports, "The multimillionaire founder of the popular 'Girls Gone Wild' video empire was sentenced to community service on Wednesday after the company pleaded guilty to federal charges of failing to monitor the ages of the women it films. Mantra Films Inc. also agreed to pay $1.6 million in fines for using drunken 17-year-olds in videos it filed on Panama City Beach during Spring Break and failing to properly label its DVDs and videos as required by federal law. U.S. District Judge Richard Smoak told company founder Joe Francis he added the community service to the fine because it did not appear a fine would be a meaningful punishment to the 33-year-old Francis, who makes an estimated $40 million a year." The AP adds that "company president Scott Barbour also was ordered to complete eight hours of community service monthly for the next 30 months."

Boeing Laptop Stolen, Exposing 382,000 Employees, Retirees To ID Theft. The AP (12/14) reports, "A Boeing Co. laptop containing the names and Social Security numbers of 382,000 workers and retirees has been stolen, putting the employees at risk for identity theft and credit-card fraud. The theft, which was confirmed Tuesday, was the third such incident at Boeing in just over a year. Files on the computer also contained home addresses, phone numbers and birth dates. Some of the files listed salary information." Boeing spokesman Tim Neale said that "the laptop was stolen earlier this month when an employee left it unattended," but "no proprietary, customer or supplier data were on the computer."

Illegal Meatpacking Worker Probe Uncovered ID Theft Ring. USA Today (12/14, 3A, Leinwand, 2.27M) reports, "A federal investigation that ended Tuesday in a raid on six meatpacking plants has uncovered criminal groups around the country that steal real birth certificates, Social Security cards and other documents and sell them to illegal workers, federal officials said. One fraud ring mailed dozens of Puerto Rican birth certificates to a Worthington, Minn., man who resold them for as much as $1,000 to illegal workers as part of a set of identity documents. Some of the sets were bought by workers at the meatpacking plants, Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) spokesman Marc Raimondi said." USA notes, "In recent months, ICE agents have arrested members of document rings in Minnesota, Texas, Utah and Puerto Rico. Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said federal agents continue to investigate fraud rings tied to Tuesday's arrests" at Swift meatpacking plants."

Plea Of Pellicano Co-Defendant Could Benefit Prosecution. The Los Angeles Times (12/14, Krikorian, 850K) reports, "The federal investigation of Anthony Pellicano took a surprising turn Tuesday when one of his co-defendants pleaded guilty to using the former private eye to wiretap a Beverly Hills businessman six years ago." The Times continues, "In an appearance before U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer, Daniel Nicherie also pleaded guilty to three other felony counts of defrauding the Beverly Hills businessman and others through pension fraud, wire fraud and money laundering." It was unclear what impact his "plea will have on the ongoing Pellicano investigation because the U.S. government's allegations about Nicherie's actions would clearly make him a troubling witness for the prosecution." But he "could provide authorities with another example of how Pellicano illegally spied on others."

Tennessee Inmate At Center Of Debate Over Executing Mentally Impaired. The Wall Street Journal (12/14, A1, Fields, 2.04M) reports, "At 8:30 a.m., Gregory Thompson, his hands cuffed to his waist, has already swallowed eight of the 12 pills he takes a day. Mr. Thompson is on death row at the Riverbend Maximum Security Institution, and like many prison inmates, he is mentally ill." The Journal notes, "On New Year's Day 1985, he abducted Brenda Blanton Lane from a shopping-center parking lot in Shelbyville, Tenn., while stealing her car. He fatally stabbed the 28-year-old four times in the back. … Today, however, Mr. Thompson's case is at the center of a complex debate about the death penalty in the U.S. Recently, the Supreme Court ruled that mentally retarded defendants and juveniles cannot be sentenced to death. Mr. Thompson is asking the courts to decide whether mentally ill prisoners can be executed if rendered competent only by medication. His twice-delayed execution and similar cases are working through the judicial system; one will likely end up in front of the high court." The Journal adds, "Mr. Thompson is now arguing he is not competent to be executed because his mental condition has deteriorated. His appeal also tries to make the case that it's unconstitutional to execute a defendant made competent only through medication."

Anti-Death Penalty Activists Stage Reenactment Of Williams Execution. The New York Times (12/14, Mckinley, 1.16M) reports that at the Black Repertory Theater of Berkeley on Wednesday, actors reenacted "the execution of the convicted killer Stanley Tookie Williams, staged on the first anniversary of his death by lethal injection at San Quentin State Prison. The performance was written and produced by Barbara Becnel and Shirley Neal, two friends of Mr. Williams and death penalty opponents, who were unapologetic about their play's being agitprop. 'This is political theater in the extreme,' Ms. Becnel told a crowd of about 150 people who gathered to watch the performance." The Times notes, "The execution of Mr. Williams, 51, a founder of the Crips gang who was convicted of murdering four people in 1979, has continued to be a rallying point for death penalty opponents as well as a source of contention about the methods of lethal injection."

Dutch Counterfeit Goods Inspector Seen As Best In World. The Wall Street Journal (12/14, A1, Miller, 2.04M) reports, "From his perch at the North Sea port of Antwerp, Chris De Buysscher can look at thousands of 40-foot container units and pick out those most likely to contain fake Nikes, Marlboros or Dior jackets. When he's off work, the 51-year-old Belgian can spot a knockoff Louis Vuitton bag from across a crowded, smoke-filled room. Mr. De Buysscher is widely regarded among his peers as the best counterfeit-goods inspector in the world," and "the global boom in counterfeit goods has Mr. De Buysscher very busy. In the past two years, tiny Belgium has seized about 40 million counterfeit items, the most taken by any nation in the European Union. And about 90% of the Belgian seizures came from Mr. De Buysscher's three-person team policing the 22 miles of Antwerp docks." The Journal notes, "His skills are a low-tech blend of old-fashioned gumshoe detective work and intuition."

New York Judge's "Probation" System Raises Concerns. The New York Times (12/14, A1, Glaberson, 1.16M) reports from Keeseville, N.Y., "Like many teenagers in this bleak old mill village near Lake Champlain, Michael C. Burrell had been in trouble before. But when an attempted assault case landed him at age 19 in the courtroom of the village justice, the experience was unlike anything he had faced before. He said the justice, George J. Head, insisted that they meet each week outside court, in what people around here call his 'judge's probation' program. There is no such thing as judge's probation, and private sessions between a judge and a defendant facing jail violate rules of judicial conduct. But Justice Head seems to have stretched the rules in a number of ways. When he sentenced young men to regular probation, he sometimes drove them to their appointments. One young man was discovered driving the justice's car, and others say they met with the justice at his home. One said he even wound up moving in for eight months." The Times adds, "Now the system is under scrutiny by state officials, who are holding hearings and taking steps to fix some of its most glaring flaws. What has played out in this remote village in northeastern New York provides one more startling look at what can happen when meager training mixes with plenty of unchecked power. 'Judge Head rules Keeseville, and God help you if you oppose him,' said Diane Webster-Brady, the lawyer who handled Mr. Burrell's case."

Kevorkian To Be Paroled In June. The AP (12/14, Hoffman) reports, "Assisted suicide advocate Jack Kevorkian, the ailing former pathologist who claimed to have assisted in at least 130 deaths in the 1990s, will be paroled in June, state Corrections Department spokesman Leo Lalonde said Wednesday. … Kevorkian has promised he would not assist in a suicide if he was released from prison." The AP notes, "Mayer Morganroth, Kevorkian's attorney, said in July that his client had less than a year to live. Gov. Jennifer Granholm ordered corrections authorities to carry out an independent medical evaluation of Kevorkian, but did not commute the retired pathologist's sentence, as Morganroth had hoped."

Judge Approves Settlement In Alabama College Desegregation Case. The AP (12/14) reports, "U.S. District Judge Harold Murphy approved agreements settling the case, which has so far generated $210 million in state funds for the desegregation effort, most of it going to historically black Alabama A&M and Alabama State universities. In his order Tuesday, Murphy agreed with both sides that there is no reason for further action. He said the state, its historically white universities and other defendants have eliminated traces of segregation 'to the extent practicable and consistent with sound educational practice ... and have demonstrated their commitment to continuing to operate in a constitutional and nondiscriminatory fashion.'" The AP notes, "The U.S. Justice Department sued Alabama in 1981, after state officials and university administrators were unable to agree on a corrective plan. More plaintiffs were added over the years."

Suburban Chicago Town Settles Fair Housing Act Charges. The AP (12/14) reports South Elgin, Ill., "will allow Unity House Inc. to operate a home for up to seven residents recovering from drug or alcohol addiction under an agreement that settles allegations of Fair Housing Act violations, the U.S. Justice Department announced Wednesday. Federal prosecutors had argued the Village of South Elgin violated the act by refusing a permit for the establishment of a group home for alleged substance abusers. Village Attorney Derke Price said officials had been concerned about allowing a business in a residential area. The settlement also calls for South Elgin to pay $25,000 in damages to Unity House, $7,500 each to two residents who were not able to live in the home when the permit was denied and $15,000 to the United States as a civil penalty." The AP notes US Attorney Patrick J. Fitzgerald said in a statement, "This settlement should send a message to other communities that no municipality, driven by neighborhood opposition, can prohibit persons recovering from addictions from enjoying the benefits of living in the safe and supportive environment of a group home."

DNA Not Linked To Duke Lacrosse Players. The AP (12/14, Scott) reports, "DNA testing in the Duke lacrosse rape case found genetic material from several males in the accuser's body and her underwear -- but none from any team member, defense attorneys said in court papers Wednesday. The papers were filed by attorneys for the three lacrosse players charged, Reade Seligmann, Collin Finnerty and David Evans. They complained that the information about DNA from other men was not disclosed in a report prosecutors provided earlier this year to the defense." The AP adds, "In an interview, defense attorney Joseph Cheshire said the findings suggest the accuser had sex shortly before the March team party where she was hired to perform as a stripper. … District Attorney Mike Nifong declined to comment on the defense motion."

The Los Angeles Times (12/14, Zucchino, 850K) reports, "The DNA…was not mentioned in the lab's final report, submitted to the Durham district attorney's office in May and subsequently provided to the defense. Defense lawyers found references to the DNA while scouring 1,844 documents handed over by the lab Oct. 27 under a judge's order. DNA Security Inc. in Burlington, N.C., initially refused to provide them, citing cost and privacy." The Times notes, "Last week, U.S. Rep. Walter B. Jones…asked the Justice Department to investigate whether Nifong committed 'prosecutorial misconduct' and violated the defendants' civil rights."

Massachusetts Anti-Gay Marriage Amendment Supporters Sue Lawmakers. The AP (12/14, Leblanc) reports, "Supporters of an anti-gay marriage measure filed a lawsuit in federal court Wednesday seeking up to $5 million in damages from Massachusetts lawmakers who blocked a final vote on the proposed constitutional amendment last month. The lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court by the group VoteOnMarriage.org, claims the 109 state lawmakers violated the supporters' rights to free speech and right to petition the government." The AP adds, "The legislature is scheduled to take up the question again Jan. 2, the last day of the session. Supporters of the question fear lawmakers will again avoid taking a vote, killing the proposed amendment."

ANTITRUST:

Lawmakers, Workers Concerned By Proposed Airline Mergers. ABC World News (12/13, story 2, 2:50, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "A lot of airlines these days are feeling the urge to merge. United wants Continental, US Airways wants Delta, Air Tran wants Midwest. No indication that any of the deals may come to fruition, indeed there are considerable obstacles to each one. There is an indication that airlines feel they need to combine to cut costs. For what this means to industry and more importantly to everyone who flies, here is ABC's Lisa Stark." ABC (Stark) added, "Airline analysts say this could be the start of a merger feeding frenzy. All the airlines are talking and no one wants to be the odd man out if the deal-making begins in earnest. The talks between United and Continental are characterized as very preliminary, but analysts say on paper combining the two makes sense." Jay Kuenzle, Delta pilot: "We are not interested at all with a US Air hostile takeover." Stark: "Delta employees today made their feelings quite clear, but many say mergers are inevitable. … The question is, when these corporate marriages might take place and who could end up together. "

The AP (12/14, Carpenter) reports, "A long-anticipated consolidation of U.S. airlines could mean higher fares for travelers as overlapping routes are eliminated, experts said Wednesday as talk of likely deals reverberated throughout the industry. That's one reason why any such buyouts could draw intensified regulatory scrutiny, along with the potential for increased labor and service disruptions, as some consumer advocates warn." The AP adds, "Numerous regulatory and other obstacles remain before any deal can occur, but industry observers said all the talks and recent airline restructurings have set the stage for big changes in the business next year." Rep. James Oberstar, "who will chair the House Transportation Committee in Congress next year, said he will not hesitate to hold hearings next year to 'expose the anti-competitive effects' of airline industry consolidation and to 'nudge the Justice Department' to use its power to stop potential acquisitions."

The New York Times (12/14, Bailey, 1.16M) reports, "Discussions about a possible deal between United Airlines and Continental Airlines came to light this week. And if one big merger goes through, other airlines will probably feel compelled to pair off as well or wind up at a competitive disadvantage because they have higher costs or smaller route networks. But less financial misery for airlines often means more bad news for their passengers — since, in this business, misery tends to be a zero-sum game." The Times also notes, "Concerned about rising fares and the potential for reduced air service to small communities," Oberstar "said yesterday that the Justice Department should block any major airline merger. If it does not, Mr. Oberstar said, he would call hearings before his committee to consider action to block such mergers (three steps are necessary to approve an airline deal: the Transportation Department must determine that a merger is financially viable, the Federal Aviation Administration must approve a certificate of safety, and the Justice Department must determine that there are no antitrust issues)."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (12/14, Hirschman, 379K) reports, "A raucous crowd of more than 3,000 Delta Air Lines workers alternately cheered, booed, clapped and hissed Wednesday as they loudly expressed opposition to a takeover bid by rival US Airways. Delta employee groups used the nearly two-hour rally to bash Tempe, Ariz.-based US Airways and its CEO, Doug Parker, in pointed, personal terms. He was compared to vilified airline raiders Carl Icahn and Frank Lorenzo and even the fictional Gordon Gekko from the movie 'Wall Street.'" The AJC adds, "Georgia's U.S. senators, Saxby Chambliss and Johnny Isakson, lauded the Delta workers and urged them to back management efforts to preserve Delta's history and independence. Chambliss said he told Parker in a Washington meeting that he and other members of the Georgia delegation stoutly oppose the deal and plan hearings to pressure the Justice Department to reject it as anti-competitive. … His argument may have been buttressed by reports Wednesday that United and Continental airlines are talking about a merger."

The KSL-TV Salt Lake City (12/13) reported on its Web site, "Utah legislators are concerned about the future of Delta Airlines, especially if the company merges with US Airways. Even though Delta has given no indication of a merger Utah officials are being proactive," the Utah House is "asking the Justice Department now to consider the risks such a move would pose for Utah's economy before approving a merger in the future." KSL noted, "When US Airways made the offer to Delta last month they assured Governor Huntsman the move would not adversely affect Utah. Legislators say their request to the Justice Department is just making sure that promise is kept."

USA Today (12/14, 1B, Reed, 2.27M) reports, "One small takeover bid — and the possibility of a much bigger one — rocked the airline world Wednesday, moving stock prices and fueling speculation about the future shape of the industry. Midwest Airlines…rejected a public offer of $290 million in stock and cash from Orlando-based AirTran," but "AirTran CEO Joe Leonard says he won't give up his pursuit, which has involved several previous, private offers that Midwest's board rebuffed. Meanwhile, continued speculation about a possible merger of United Airlines and Continental Airlines fueled a growing buzz about industry consolidation." USA notes, "Neither Continental nor United would confirm that they are in talks. Two industry sources with knowledge of the discussions, being conducted privately, said the merger talks are active. They cautioned that no announcement is imminent and that a merger may never occur."

The Chicago Tribune (12/14, Johnsson, 617K) reports, "Once the frenzy has subsided, and all the airline industry consolidation has been digested, Chicago could find itself home to the country's biggest carrier, a supersize United Airlines, or home to none at all. Passengers could be looking at higher fares or more bargains. They also could be in for a long, confusing period of service upheaval, industry analysts say." The Tribune notes, "When the dust settles, analysts think the six major airlines atop the U.S. market could meld into three megacarriers, though there is no guarantee any of the deals will get done. … Any deals must be approved by federal antitrust regulators, however, and they traditionally have been wary of large-scale consolidation."

Stock Arrangement Would Give Northwest Veto Over Continental-United Merger. The Washington Times (12/14, Lengell, 88K) reports Continental-United merger discussions "may be doomed as the result of an unusual relationship between Continental and a third airline. Northwest Airlines holds a special preferred 'golden share' of Continental Airlines stock, giving Northwest the right to block Continental from consolidating with another airline. The alliance dates to late 2000 when Northwest agreed to sell shares of Continental common stock back to Continental after the Justice Department accused Northwest of anti-competitive behavior." The Times adds, "Northwest declined to say whether it would consider exercising its veto. But airline analyst Anthony Tangorra said the Eagan, Minn., airline wouldn't hesitate because a Continental-United combination would create the world's largest carrier, dwarfing Northwest."

Continental Shares Soar Amid Merger Talk Reports. The AP (12/14) reports, "Shares of Continental Airlines Inc. soared to their highest level since before the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks, as the company talks with United Airlines about a possible combination to create a mega-carrier. … Prudential analyst Bob McAdoo wrote in a research report that he doubts Continental wants a deal, but it might do one contingent on the Delta/US Airways deal being approved by federal regulators." The AP notes, "Combinations would allow airlines to reduce available seats, giving them more pricing power to raise fares and boost profits amid high fuel prices. Such deals, though, would likely face tough federal antitrust scrutiny, analysts say."

Quantas Agrees To $8.7 Billion Takeover By International Consortium. The Financial Times (12/14, Tucker, Minder) reports, "Qantas has agreed to an A$11.1bn (US$8.7bn) takeover offer by a consortium including Australia's Macquarie Bank and Texas Pacific Group, a US buy-out fund. The airline rejected the consortium's opening offer on Wednesday but early on Thursday it recommended a sweetened A$5.60-a-share offer. Shares in Qantas jumped nearly 5 per cent to A$5.33 by early Thursday afternoon. The buy-out offer is 29 per cent more than the stock traded at November 21, when Qantas first said it had been approached." The Wall Street Journal (12/14, A3, Sender, Linebaugh, 2.04M) notes, "Under the terms of the deal, Qantas will be delisted from the Australian exchange -- but retain majority Australian ownership, as required by law, with Allco becoming the company's largest shareholder. … Australian Prime Minister John Howard said today the government will monitor the takeover bid, but the deal was ultimately a matter for the market"

The New York Times (12/14, Johnston, 1.16M) reports, "The consortium — Airline Partners Australia — includes Texas Pacific, Macquarie Bank, Allco Equity Partners and the Allco Finance Group of Australia, and Onex, the Canadian leveraged buyout company. The group also brings together an array of aviation talent, including David Bonderman of Texas Pacific; Rod Eddington of Allco Finance, the former chief executive of British Airways; and David Turnbull of Allco Finance, formerly of Cathay Pacific. Few analysts expect investors to block the deal."

Alltel Will Sell Four Minnesota Markets To Meet DOJ Requirements. The AP (12/14) reports, "Wireless carrier Alltel Corp. said Wednesday it agreed to sell four Minnesota markets to Rural Cellular Corp., in order to meet divestiture requirements established by the U.S. Department of Justice. Financial terms weren't disclosed. In October, the company received approval from the Justice Department for its $1.1 billion acquisition of Midwest Wireless on the condition that the combined company sell some assets in markets where they both operate."

DOJ Announces Indictment Of Stora Enso On Price-Fixing Charges. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (12/14, Dresang, 255K) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department announced an indictment Wednesday against a Wisconsin-based paper company in an investigation of price fixing for magazine paper. Justice officials said a federal grand jury in Connecticut indicted Stora Enso North America Corp. on charges of conspiring to set prices in consultation with competitors." The MJS notes, "According to Justice Department officials, the indictment claims that Stora Enso met with competitors and agreed to increase prices for coated publication papers used in magazines and high-volume catalogs. The indictment contends that Stora Enso sold paper 'at collusive and non-competitive prices' from August 2002 to June 2003."

The AP (12/14, Singer) reports, "The paper is primarily used to print magazines, news weeklies and high-volume catalogues. The company agreed to the scheme in a meeting with an unidentified competitor, according to the indictment. 'The price of coated paper used in magazines affects nearly every American,' said Thomas O. Barnett, assistant attorney general in charge of the Justice Department's antitrust division." The AP notes, "Stora Enso has sales offices in Connecticut, Georgia and other states. The conspiracy charged in the indictment, which was handed up in Hartford, was carried out in Connecticut and elsewhere, the Justice Department said. Violations occurring before June 22, 2004, carry a maximum fine of $10 million, which may be increased."

Citigroup To Buy Grupo Cuscatlan In $1.51 Billion Deal. The Wall Street Journal (12/14, C4, Enrich, 2.04M) reports, "Citigroup Inc. agreed to buy a Central American banking company in a $1.51 billion cash-and-stock deal that marks the latest in a series of recent overseas acquisitions. Citigroup said it is buying the subsidiaries of Grupo Cuscatlan from Corporacion UBC Internacional SA, a commercial- and corporate-banking group that does business in El Salvador, Guatemala, Costa Rica, Honduras and Panama. Citigroup also is acquiring the group's pension and insurance operations in El Salvador." The Journal notes, "The Central American deal, coming the day before top Citigroup executives host their annual investor day at their Park Avenue headquarters in New York, is Citigroup's second recent deal in the region and its fifth international deal this fall. … The moves illustrate a bet by Chief Executive Charles Prince that fast-growing overseas markets hold greater potential for the world's biggest bank in market value than the U.S. But it isn't clear the deals will quickly jump-start Citigroup's sluggish revenue streams, a source of angst among many Citigroup investors."

Hearst Expects To Complete California Newspaper Purchase This Week. The AP (12/14) reports, "Hearst Corp. expects to complete its purchase of the Daily Breeze on Friday as part of a deal to resell the newspaper to MediaNews Group Inc., according to a court document filed by the two newspaper operators. The document was filed Wednesday in a pending federal antitrust case involving Denver-based MediaNews and New York-based Hearst, owner of the San Francisco Chronicle, over their plans to consolidate some of the business operations of their San Francisco Bay area newspapers. A San Francisco investor is trying to block the deal, claiming such cooperation violates antitrust laws." The AP notes, "Under the agreement, Hearst will purchase the Torrance-based Breeze from The Copley Press Inc. and then sell it to MediaNews along with two other publications, the Monterey County (Calif.) Herald and the St. Paul (Minn.) Pioneer Press."

Italian, Spanish Toll-Road Companies Halt Merger Talks. The Wall Street Journal (12/14, Maxwell, Perez, 2.04M) reports, "Autostrade SpA of Italy and Abertis Infraestructuras SA of Spain halted an agreement to merge and create the world's largest toll-road operator, citing blocks imposed by Italy's government and transportation regulator. The companies said they remain convinced that a deal should be done, and said they hope to be back with a fresh plan at some point in the future. The companies struck a cash-and-shares deal to merge in April that would have resulted in a company with a market capitalization of €25 billion ($33.2 billion)." The Journal notes, "The failed merger highlights the fact that cross-border European mergers and acquisitions, agreed or hostile, stir up as much of a hornet's nest as ever, despite the European Union's best efforts to promote the notion of a single marketplace." However, "people familiar with the situation said the companies' commitment to the deal burns on."

Grassley Says FBI Stonewalling On Amerithrax Probe. Yesterday morning on Fox News' Fox & Friends program (12/13, 8:12AM, Carlson), Sen. Charles Grassley discussed the reasons why lawmakers wrote a letter to AG Alberto Gonzales requesting more information on the FBI's Amerithrax probe. Grassley said, "There has not been information to Congress for three years on the subject. Congress has asked for testimony from the agency's to be updated. In our constitutional power of oversight, because the new checks and balances of the government." Carlson: "Think they have information they are not disclosing or they just do not know?" Grassley: "They have implicated a person. That person has been suing the FBI because he has lost his job, does not have any income. When two senators are targeted, 3,000 people have been called before the grand jury, Congress should have an update on it, particularly the senators who were targeted." Grassley later added, "We're told in congress that there is leagues in congress, and that is why we will not get an update on the investigation. The New York times wrote about this and they got their information from the FBI. The FBI is worried about not informing congress because they might leak. The FBI has leaked to the New York times and the FBI should be investigated." Grassley concluded the interview saying, "It is just stonewalling. That is where the FBI gets into trouble. When they do what they are best set up to do, investigate and prosecute and put people away that are guilty, they never get egg on their face. They always get egg on their face when they try to worry about their public relations. It looks to me like they have something to hide, particularly when they are talking about leaks on Capitol Hill and their own agents are looking to the New York Times."

Leahy Dissatisfied With FBI Progress On Amerithrax Case. WCAX-TV in Burlington, VT (12/14, Perron) on its web site provides more details about recent congressional complaints about the FBI's handling of the Amerithrax probe. Focusing specifically on Sen. Patrick Leahy's concerns WCAX follows up yesterday's articles reporting, "Five years after anthrax attacks terrified Americans, the case remains unsolved. Now Congress is fighting with the FBI to get an update on the investigation." And Sen. Leahy "is demanding some answers." He "is calling for the FBI to release information gathered during the 5-year probe. So far, the bureau says no fearing it could compromise the investigation." Five years ago a number of Vermont businesses and post offices were the subject of anthrax scares and one "potentially lethal letter was mailed to the Vermont Senator." Leahy said, ""I am not satisfied with this investigation. I'm not satisfied with the briefings I've had. I'm not satisfied with the information I've received on it."

Rep. Holt Among Lawmakers Requesting Anthrax Update From Gonzales. WRNN- TV (12/13, 7:00 p.m.) broadcasts, "Rush Holt of New Jersey has been turning up the heat on Justice Department. Holt and six other new jersey lawmakers signed a critical bipartisan letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, asking for an update on the probe into the anthrax attacks that occurred in the fall of 2001."

Columnist Accuses FBI Of Lacking Accountability In Amerithrax Probe. Howard Goodman in a column titled "Anthrax investigation has no answers, but secrecy abounds" in the South Florida Sun-Sentinel (12/14, 237K) describes the impact of the anthrax attacks on Florida five years ago and the events since then including the toppling of the Taliban, the war in Iraq and the creation of the DHS and asks, "where are the updates on the only clear example of terrorism to hit America since 9-11, whose first victim was claimed in our backyard? The FBI ain't saying." The recent bipartisan request for more information on the investigation "was the sound of frustration boiling over. Congress is supposed to conduct oversight of federal agencies. Yet the FBI, as if taking a cue from its old nemesis the Mob, is practicing Omerta." It "is all too representative of how this administration conducts business. In secret. Giving its reasons as national security. For all we know, it's simply hiding its ineffectiveness or incompetence." In congressional testimony FBI Director Robert Mueller "said the FBI fears leaks if Congress were brought into its rightful job of overseeing the executive. Which is rich, considering that it was the FBI that leaked the name of Stephen Hatfield." Goodman states, "I guess it's just too shameful for the G-Men to have to look the country in the eye and say, 'Hey, we've tried and tried, but we don't know who sent the anthrax. And by the way, if you know where Osama bin Laden is, give us a call.'"

Top FBI Officials Accused Of Failing To Understand Terrorist Threat. The Houston Chronicle (12/13, Mittelstadt, 530K) reported that in the aftermath of criticism of Rep. Sylvester Reyes (D) who reportedly failed to answer simple questions by a CQ reporter about the terrorists threatening the US, "Some experts suggested Reyes is just one example of an American policy establishment that has paid little attention to the tricky nuances of politics, religion and sectarian differences that have riven the Middle East." The Chronicle states, "Top FBI counterterrorism officials have shown limited understanding and curiosity about Islam's two major branches. And at least two other House Intelligence Committee members failed the same questions that tripped up Reyes." University of Georgia professor Loch Johnson said, "When it comes to someone in a position of staff responsibility like an FBI counterterrorism specialist, really it's a little unnerving to discover that they don't know much about the subject."

Dukakis Says FBI Deceived In Rifleman Probe. The Boston Globe (12/14, Murphy, 413K) reports that in the civil trial over the imprisonment of Peter Limone, Joseph Salvati, Henry Tameleo and Louis Greco, "Former Governor Michael S. Dukakis testified Wednesday that he carefully considered every inmate's request for clemency in the 1980s, even reviewing case files at home at night before deciding whether they should be set free." Yet, "Dukakis said he only recalled one instance when the state's top federal prosecutor weighed in on a clemency petition -- in 1983, when then US Attorney William F. Weld urged him to reject Peter J. Limone's bid for freedom." Saying "how 'unusual' it was to get such a letter, Dukakis said he gave 'substantial' weight to Weld's warning that Limone would 'assume charge of the day-to-day operations of organized crime in this area' if released." After testifying, Dukakis told reporters, "Now that we know what was going on in the (FBI) office, we were all deceived. … In fact, the bureau itself was betrayed." He "acknowledged he knew nothing about allegations that then-FBI agent Dennis Condon was aware Barboza was lying and yet vouched for his credibility during the trial." Yet, "on the stand, Dukakis defended the integrity of Condon, who served as public safety commissioner during his administration. He later told reporters, 'There really wasn't a better public servant walking the earth, in my opinion.'"

The CBS4-TV in Boston (12/13) on its web site reported, "The lawyers for four men wrongfully convicted in the 1968 Gangland murder continue to build their case against the FBI." But "Dukakis defended another FBI agent who he believes may have been manipulated." Dukakis said, "You hate to think of yourself as having been manipulated. … It's pretty obvious, in retrospect, we had information about these folks that was false and that there was evidence which would have absolved them of the crime that was never disclosed by people who should of disclosed it." Meanwhile, F. Lee Bailey "testified that in 1970 Joe Barboza that he, with the help of FBI agents, had framed four innocent men for the Deegan murder." CBS4 added, "Barboza told Bailey that he wanted to recant his testimony in the Deegan murder trial. In court Wednesday Bailey said that Barbosa told him his false testimony was orchestrated and encouraged by H. Paul Rico, a former FBI agent."

FBI Relocating 300 Employees In Northern Virginia. The Washington Post (12/14, BW19, Kang, 690K) reports, "By the end of 2008, about 2.8 million square feet of office space will be available in Prince William County's Innovation business park and in surrounding properties, according to the county's Department of Economic Development." DEC spokesman Jason Grant "projects that over the next year to 18 months, more than 800 jobs will come to Innovation and the surrounding areas." Among others, the FBI "is moving its Northern Virginia field office from Tysons Corner, bringing about 300 to the county."

California Operation Targets Meth Suppliers, Nets 45 Suspected Gang Members. The Los Angeles Times (12/13, Reston, 850K) reported San Bernardino police and federal officials "confiscated $500,000 in cash and arrested 45 alleged gang members believed to be major suppliers of methamphetamine in San Bernardino and the surrounding area. The bust was the culmination of a seven-month investigation by San Bernardino police and the Los Angeles field office of the Drug Enforcement Administration. … During the seven months, officials arrested 119 people, including five men believed to be top Mexican Mafia associates in San Bernardino, police officials said. … San Bernardino police requested the assistance of the DEA to deal with the surge in methamphetamine and weapons trafficking by gangs in the city."

Local TV Coverage. KTTV-TV, Los Angeles (12/13, 6:00 a.m.) aired, "The Drug Enforcement Agency [is] cracking down on the Mexican mafia, making dozens of arrest here in southern California. Teaming up with area police in San Bernardino, authorities there confiscating weapons and drugs, mostly methamphetamine. The DEA targeted the Mexican mafia because they're behind much of the violent dealings in San Bernardino."

Authorities Bust Drug Ring Linked To Homicides In US, Mexico. The Arizona Daily Star (12/14, 128K) reports an international drug-trafficking organization that "brought violence and thousands of pounds of marijuana into Southern Arizona has been busted, according to court documents made public Wednesday. The organization, led by Carlos Molinares-Nuñez for the last five years, has been linked to homicides both in Mexico and the United States that appear to be drug-related, court documents state. An indictment filed in federal court in November was unsealed Wednesday, detailing the intricacies of the ring, which has at least 20 employees. … Many tons of marijuana would be transported at one time in modified vehicles that would enter the country by driving in between designated ports of entry to avoid law officers.

17 Arrested In New York Drug Sweep. The AP (12/14) reports a drug sweep "netted 17 arrests Wednesday. Most of the accused live in and around Plattsburgh and were suspected of dealing marijuana, heroin, methamphetamines, cocaine and crack. … The arrests came after months of investigation and surveillance, DEA Agent James Farnsworth said." Long Island Newsday used the AP story.

In Texas, More Than 30 Suspects Linked To Cocaine-Smuggling Ring. The San Antonio (TX) Express (12/14) reports, "If there were any doubts, federal authorities say, a kilo of cocaine that agents found in the underwear of 81-year-old Josefina Campos solidified a case targeting a large smuggling ring centered in San Antonio and Floresville. Campos' arrest Nov. 28 is but a piece of a puzzle that became more complete Wednesday as officials announced they had smashed a drug-smuggling cell that netted seizures of more than 210 kilograms of cocaine and $4.5 million in cash. … The ring is accused of transporting the cocaine primarily to the Ohio cities of Cleveland and Youngstown, while some loads of the drug hit the streets of San Antonio, Austin, Houston and other Texas cities, according to officials and court records. Most of the drugs were smuggled across the Mexico border at Eagle Pass-Piedras Negras, according to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration." A federal indictment unsealed Wednesday in San Antonio "names Campos and 37 other people."

On its Web site, WOAI-TV, San Antonio, Texas (12/14) reports agents "say the ring was working for the Arturo Beltran drug cartel in Mexico, and has been in operation since at least 2003. Investigators say the group moved between 200 to 400 kilos of cocaine a month from across the border into Texas, and then north as far as Cleveland, Ohio."

Six Arrested, 10 Houses Seized In New Hampshire Drug Sweep. Manchester's Union Leader (12/13) reported six people "have been arrested and ten 'mini-mansions' seized in southern New Hampshire after a joint state-federal drug investigation. An estimated 6,000 marijuana plants were confiscated with a possible value of $24 million. The operation was conducted by New Hampshire State Police, the federal Drug Enforcement Administration and the United States Attorney."

The Union Leader (12/14) today reports State Attorney General Kelly A. Ayotte "said the joint federal, state and local law enforcement effort disrupted 'what has to be the largest seizure of marijuana in this state's history.' … The alleged drug growers bypassed electric meters and apparently used electricians to install their own meters capable of supporting the extensive lighting and ventilation systems needed to grow the plants, which ranged from several hundred to 1,500 in a single home."

The AP (12/13) reported, "For the past two months, the New Hampshire State Police Narcotics and Investigations Unit, assisted by the United States Drug Enforcement Agency, the New Hampshire Attorney General's Drug Task Force, the U.S. Attorney's office in New Hampshire and numerous local police agencies have been investigating residential marijuana growing operations throughout the state. As a result of recent marijuana seizures in Hooksett and Epsom, investigators developed information that led to the identification of 10 other residences in Concord, Derry, Pembroke, Andover, Chester, Weare, Hopkinton, Londonderry, and Canterbury that were suspected of housing large-scale marijuana grow operations." The Boston Herald used the AP story.

On its Web site, CBS 4 Boston (12/14) reports police "said the 10 homes were purchased with the sole intent of growing marijuana."

Miami Police Chief's Son Sentenced In Marijuana Case. In Albany, New York, the AP (12/13) reported the son of Miami Police Chief John Timoney "was sentenced Wednesday to 18 months in federal prison for trying to buy 400 pounds of marijuana from an undercover agent in 2005. Sean Timoney pleaded guilty in December 2005 to giving an undercover Drug Enforcement Administration agent a gym bag filled with about $455,000 in cash as partial payment for what he and a partner believed would be the delivery of 400 pounds of marijuana." CNN, the Washington Post, Miami Herald, South Florida Sun-Sentinel, Long Island Newsday, and Philadelphia Inquirer used the AP story.

Texas Teacher Accused Of Helping Cocaine, Money-Laundering Ring. The Galveston County (12/14) reports a Galveston school teacher "was freed on bond Wednesday when officials released information about the multimillion-dollar cocaine and money-laundering ring in which she is accused of taking a part. Galveston Police Department vice/narcotics officer Joey Quiroga pulled Joette Natasha Barnes, 25, out of class last week and arrested her. … 'We believe she was a facilitator,' said Joe Arabit, assistant special agent in charge for the Drug Enforcement Administration's San Antonio office. 'Not to minimize it, but that was the role of several people in this operation — to hold drug proceeds for other defendants.'"

The Washington Times/UPI (12/14) reports law-enforcement authorities "have broken up a Texas-based ring that allegedly smuggled 400-pound quantities of cocaine into Ohio and Tennessee from Mexico. … The ring is accused of transporting cocaine to Ohio and Tennessee, among other states, after storing it in San Antonio between Jan. 1, 2004, and Dec. 6 of this year."

Federal Agents Seize $1 Million Cash From Alabama Traffic Stop. The AP (12/14) reports, "Federal agents confiscated $1 million in cash concealed in a pickup truck stopped for speeding by Alabama state troopers on Interstate 10, authorities said. Tom Wade, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's agent in Mobile, said the stacks of $20 bills packed in a concealed compartment were turned over to the U.S. Marshals Service. He said cash can be confiscated if investigators believe it was associated with criminal activity, but that $1 million is a 'significant' seizure for such a traffic stop." The AP notes, "Wade said Wednesday the DEA is investigating where the driver began his trip and his final destination. Officials said the driver could claim the cash and try to get it back through the courts, but that is rare in such seizure cases and it will likely be distributed to state and federal agencies."

Traffic Stop Leads To Georgia Stolen Weapons Arrest. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (12/14, Chidi, 379K) reports, "A lucky traffic stop by a Snellville police officer led to the arrest of two teens accused of stealing dozens of guns from a Lilburn pawn shop, police said Wednesday. Federal agents and local police arrested two Duluth teenagers late Tuesday night, Lilburn police said in a news release. Dwayne Allen Hickman, 17, and Jimar Shane O'Riley, 17, were charged with one count of armed robbery, with other state charges pending. Police said they could be charged as adults." The AJC adds, "Police said Wednesday that 53 guns had been stolen. Lilburn Police called in the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms to help investigate, but police caught a quick break in their investigation," when Snellville Police officer Greg Perry "searched the car and found a gun that had been registered as stolen five days earlier from Mr. Pawn. … ATF agents, Gwinnett County's SWAT team, Snellville and Lilburn police officers met the two. The initial investigation points to a possible gang connection in this case," Lilburn police spokesman Sgt. Tyler Thomas said."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Johnson Undergoes Brain Surgery. CNN (12/14) reports on its website, "Sen. Tim Johnson of South Dakota was undergoing brain surgery early Thursday at George Washington University Hospital after suffering stroke-like symptoms, two Democratic sources familiar with his condition told CNN." The Washington Post (12/14, A1, Babington, Weisman, 690K) also says Johnson "was in surgery last night after falling ill at the Capitol, introducing a note of uncertainty over control of the Senate just weeks before Democrats are to take over with a one-vote margin. … Given Johnson's narrow reelection win over Thune, and South Dakota's GOP tilt -- Bush carried the state by 22 percentage points in 2004 -- Republicans consider Johnson one of their top targets in the 2008 Senate elections. The leading candidate to oppose him" is GOP Gov. Mike Rounds, "who was reelected to a second term last month."

The Washington Times (12/14, Hurt, 88K) reports, "During a phone call with reporters yesterday, Mr. Johnson became disoriented, stuttering in response to a question. He appeared to recover, asking whether there were any additional questions and then signing off. According to his office, the Capitol physician examined the senator and advised that he be sent to a hospital."

The Los Angeles Times (12/14, Levey, 850K) says "the hospital would provide no details on his condition or the reason for the surgery." The Times also runs a statement from Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid, in which he says, "Sen. Johnson is a dear friend to me and to all of us here in the Senate." CQ (12/14) notes "Reid himself had what was described as a 'mini stroke' earlier this year, which had little impact on his overall health."

The Sioux Falls Argus Leader (12/14) reports on its website that Democratic Rep. Stephanie Herseth, "at the conclusion of a Sioux Falls meeting with board members of the Lewis and Clark water project, called the group back together around 3 p.m. and announced…Johnson had been taken to a hospital. In a shaking voice, she called on South Dakotans for their prayers." Herseth "said she believed it was a severe stroke." The Leader also reports rhe White House "issued a statement" wishing Johnson "a speedy recovery. 'Our thoughts and prayers are with Senator Johnson and his family,' said spokesman Alex Conant."

The Wall Street Journal (12/14, Lueck, Cummings, 2.04M) reports, "As Mr. Johnson's family gathered at the hospital last night, his office wasn't making public details of his condition." In late afternoon, "a brief statement said he had suffered a 'possible stroke' and was being evaluated by a stroke team. Later, a spokeswoman for Mr. Johnson said he hadn't suffered a stroke or a heart attack."

USA Today (12/14, Kiely, 2.27M) also reports Johnson's illness "has national ramifications because of the narrow political divide in the Senate that convenes Jan. 4. The November election gave Democrats a 51-49 edge. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut and Bernie Sanders of Vermont were elected as independents but have said they will vote with Democrats." If Johnson "were unable to complete the remaining two years of his term, South Dakota Gov. Mike Rounds, a Republican, could appoint a replacement, presumably another Republican. That would deadlock the Senate at 50-50 with Vice President Cheney, a Republican, holding the tie-breaking vote."

All three networks reported on Johnson's illness last night. On NBC Nightly News (12/13, lead story, 2:35, 9.87M), Tim Russert was asked to comment on the "political implications." They are "enormous," said Russert, "if the Republicans were to become the majority party in the Senate again, in terms of Iraq policy, Supreme Court nominees, environmental policy, tax policy. Very, very significant." The CBS Evening News (12/13, story 3, 1:50, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "A big change may be coming in the balance of power on Capitol Hill." On ABC World News (12/13, lead story, 2:00, 8.78M), George Stephanopoulos said, "If you look at history, it is very, very rare, in fact, no senator has ever been forced out for something like this. And several senators have served for several years, even after they suffered from a stroke."

The Financial Times (12/14, Luce) reports that as it "went to press…it was too early to tell the extent of Mr Johnson's impairment." The Times later says, "Any loss of Democratic control of the Senate would be less serious to the opposition party's agenda than loss of control of the House of Representatives, which operates under stricter conditions of party discipline and where the Democrats last month won a comfortable majority. Political analysts say the real majority number in the Senate is now sixty since that is the minimum vote required to impose cloture on a filibustered debate and move to a vote." The Democrats in both houses "have promised to usher in an era of greater bipartisan cooperation after several years of bitter partisanship."

The AP (12/14, Jalonick) reports "both Johnson and his wife have battled cancer." The senator "underwent prostate cancer treatment in 2004, and subsequent tests have shown him to be clear of the disease. Barb Johnson is a breast cancer survivor." The couple "have two sons and a daughter: Brooks, who served in the U.S. Army in Bosnia, Kosovo, South Korea, Afghanistan and Iraq; Brendan, a Sioux Falls lawyer, and Kelsey, who works in Washington."

The New York Times (12/14, Zernike, 1.16M) notes Johnson "is the second senator known to become ill since the November elections. Senator Craig Thomas of Wyoming, a Republican, is being treated for leukemia, but has been at work." The Times also reports, "According to information from the Senate historian cited on CQ.com, at least nine senators have taken extended absences from the Senate for health reasons since 1942. Robert F. Wagner, Democrat of New York, was unable to attend any sessions of the 80th or 81st Congress from 1947 to 1949 because of a heart ailment. Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., Democrat of Delaware, missed about seven months in 1988 after surgery for a brain aneurysm. And David Pryor, Democrat of Arkansas, suffered a heart attack in April 1991 and returned to the Senate in September that year." The Chicago Tribune (12/14, Parsons, 617K) reports, "Many members of Congress have stayed in office in spite of fragile health, including the late Sen. Strom Thurmond, a South Carolina Republican who held office beyond his 100th birthday." Democratic Rep. Lane Evans "has suffered from Parkinson's disease for years and went for several months this year without casting a vote. He is set to retire when the new Congress is sworn in."

US Urges Appeals Court To Reverse Ruling On Cheney Visitor Logs. The AP (12/14, Jordan) reports, "The Bush administration asked an appeals court Wednesday to overrule a federal judge and allow the White House to keep secret any records of visitors to Vice President Cheney's residence and office. To make the visitor records public would be an 'unprecedented intrusion into the daily operations of the vice presidency,' the Justice Department argued in a 57-page brief to the U.S. Court of Appeals in the District of Columbia. The government was responding to an October order, by U.S. District Judge Ricardo M. Urbina, to release two years of White House visitor logs to The Washington Post." The AP adds, "Attorneys for the Justice Department called Urbina's decision 'flatly inconsistent' with his ruling's acknowledgment that the Secret Service had only limited and temporary control over the visitor logs. Since the records are ultimately controlled by the vice president's office, the Secret Service is not authorized to release them, the government said. Moreover, Congress has excluded presidential and vice presidential records from the public's reach — making the visitor logs untouchable, the government said."

Bond Selected As Top Republican On Senate Intelligence Panel. McClatchy (12/14, Stearns) reports, "Missouri Sen. Christopher 'Kit' Bond will become the top Republican on the Senate Intelligence Committee." Over "the last few years he's gained an increasingly high profile on intelligence issues." For example, in 2006, "Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist assigned Bond to lead Senate Republican communications efforts in the war on terror." As political tensions rose over Iraq, "Bond frequently became the GOP's sound-bite bad cop, accusing Democrats of excessive partisanship, while outgoing chairman Pat Roberts of Kansas took a more reserved approach."

Reyes Dismisses Questions About Qualifications To Lead House Intelligence Panel. KFOX-TV in El Paso (12/12) on its web site reported that after a CQ reporter questioned Rep. Silvestre Reyes' (D) qualifications to become chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, Reyes defended himself saying "he actually does know the answers to the questions." Reyes said, "I certainly know Hezbollah because I am one of the few members of Congress that has actually been through a Hezbollah checkpoint, on the road from Damascus to Beirut." And "local experts have taken to the congressman's defense." UTEP associate professor John Bretting said, "It would be ridiculous to believe that our Congressman Silvestre Reyes is not qualified for this position." He "said Reyes is not the only one who has been taken by a reporter's pop quiz, even U.S. presidents have." Bretting added, "In the United States Congress, Congressman Reyes is one of the five or six most knowledgeable congresspersons when it comes to national security."

WSJournal Criticizes Selection Of Reyes For Intelligence Panel. The Wall Street Journal (12/14, 2.04M) editorializes, "As Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi's choice to be the next Chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, Texas Democrat Silvestre Reyes will share responsibility for the budgets and oversight of US spy agencies, as well as receive regular briefings on classified intelligence. But it appears he first needs a remedial course on America's terrorist enemies. In an interview with Congressional Quarterly, Mr. Reyes was unable to answer basic questions about the sectarian nature of both al Qaeda and Hezbollah. … So it appears America will fight the next two years of the war on terror with an important Congressional post occupied by a man who has no grasp at all of the dynamics of the conflicts in Iraq, Lebanon and the broader Middle East. This isn't an auspicious start by Democrats who hoped to campaign in 2008 having established some credibility on national security."

Judge Says Administration's Handling Of Katrina Housing Was "A Disaster." The New York Times/AP (12/14, Apuzzo) reports US District Judge Richard J. Leon "called the Bush administration's handling of a Hurricane Katrina housing program 'a legal disaster' Wednesday and ordered officials to explain a computer system that can neither precisely count evacuees nor provide reasons why they were denied aid." Judge Leon, "who ruled last month that the Federal Emergency Management Agency had violated evacuees' constitutional rights by eliminating their housing payments without notice, admonished the government for not moving fast enough to restart the program for between 3,600 and 5,500 storm victims." Leon "ruled that FEMA mishandled the transition from a short-term housing program to a longer-term program this spring and summer. Instead of explaining why funding was being cut, FEMA provided only computer-generated and sometimes conflicting program codes, Leon said." The judge "ordered FEMA to explain those decisions so thousands of evacuees can understand the reasoning and decide whether to appeal." The Washington Post (12/14, A29, 690K) also runs the AP story.

Many Katrina Victims "In Limbo" After Over A Year. In his New York Times column (12/14), Bob Herbert says they "look for all the world like internment camps," but "more than a year after the catastrophe of Hurricane Katrina, thousands of the poorest victims from New Orleans are still living in these trailer parks run by the Federal Emergency Management Agency. They have ironic names, like Mount Olive Gardens and Renaissance Village. A more accurate name would be Camp Depression, after the state of mind of most of the residents." Dr. Irwin Redlener, a professor at Columbia University and the author of "Americans at Risk: Why We Are Not Prepared for Megadisasters and What We Can Do," said "he was outraged that so many thousands of the poorest victims of Hurricane Katrina are still stuck in limbo — unable to find jobs or permanent housing, denied adequate medical and educational services and with no idea when, or if, they will be able to return to New Orleans."

US Geological Survey Scientists Object To New Administration Rules. The Washington Post (12/14, A29, Eilperin, 690K) reports, "A new Bush administration policy for reviewing scientific documents before publication has angered some US Geological Survey scientists, who say the elaborate internal review of their work may impede them from conveying information to the public." The new requirements, "which were unveiled in July but are still being put into practice, call for staff scientists to submit all reports and prepared talks to managers to determine whether they meet the agency's scientific standards. They also require researchers to alert the agency press office of any work involving 'potential high visibility products or policy-sensitive issues.'" P. Patrick Leahy, USGS associate director for geology, "said the agency spent more than two years drafting the rules to ensure all of it scientists are subject to the same sort of rigorous scientific review before they send their work to be published." But "James Estes, a marine biologist who has worked for more than 30 years at the USGS's Western Ecological Research Center in Santa Cruz, Calif., said that although he has not encountered problems in the past, he and his colleagues fear their work may be stifled."

Lawmakers Say Coast Guard Withheld Warnings About National Security Cutter. The New York Times (12/14, Lipton, 1.16M) reports the Coast Guard "withheld from Congress warnings raised more than two years ago by its chief engineer about structural design flaws in its new National Security Cutter, a $564 million ship now near completion in Mississippi, Democrats and Republicans said in interviews this week." The "lack of full disclosure about that and other problems in the Coast Guard's $24 billion modernization effort, known as Deepwater, has created a credibility gap that some members of Congress say now jeopardizes the endeavor." Sen. Olympia J. Snowe, "the chairwoman of the Senate panel that oversees the service's operations," said, "The Coast Guard clearly does not understand that transparency and accountability are essential to a program of this magnitude." The Times adds Snowe "and other Congressional leaders said they were unaware until this past week that the Coast Guard's chief engineer, Rear Adm. Erroll Brown, had written in March 2004 to the Coast Guard official in charge of the Deepwater program, Rear Adm. Patrick M. Stillman, to warn him that the design for the National Security Cutter had 'significant flaws' and that construction should not begin until they were addressed." Rep. Harold Rogers, "who heads the House panel that oversees the Coast Guard budget, said the lack of full disclosure was distressing." Democratic Rep. Bob Filner "said the shortcomings in the Deepwater program are so severe that the contract should be terminated. Two military contractors, Lockheed Martin and Northrop Grumman, were hired in 2002 to design the ships, build them and oversee most of the other project details."

NYTimes Criticizes Lack Of Oversight For Coast Guard. The New York Times (12/14, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "The Coast Guard, supposedly our first line of defense against water-borne terrorists and drug smugglers, has been staggered by a shipbuilding scandal of enormous proportions. A long-term modernization program to replace nearly all of the Coast Guard's ships, planes and helicopters — begun four years ago in the wake of 9/11 — is foundering while its projected costs are skyrocketing. In Iraq, lax government oversight and incompetence or profiteering by contractors have disabled reconstruction efforts. Now the same disease is undermining our coastal defenses." The "new Congress and the Department of Homeland Security, which is responsible for the Coast Guard, will need to keep a sharp eye on the Coast Guard's performance. The industrial contractors have proved they were not up to the job."

Corrected Financial Reports Show Fannie Mae Was Undercapitalized. The Washington Post (12/14, D1, Hilzenrath, 690K) reports, "Three years ago, Fannie Mae assured lawmakers that it had the required capital to cope with a broad variety of business setbacks." But it "turns out, the assurance was false. Last week, when the giant mortgage funding company corrected years of flawed financial reports, the new numbers showed that it fell short of a key capital requirement by billions of dollars in 2002 and 2003." Had it "been apparent at the time, the $7.3 billion shortfall at the end of 2002 could have put Fannie Mae on a different trajectory. Regulators might have intervened -- as they did later, when accounting problems came to light. Wall Street might have reevaluated Fannie Mae's vaunted management, not to mention the value of its stock. And Fannie Mae might have been forced to raise additional capital or liquidate investments, sacrificing profits." Instead, "based on Fannie Mae's financial reports, the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, which monitors Fannie Mae's financial safety and soundness, gave the company a passing grade."

Recently Passed Tax Bill Included 520 Tax Breaks For Corporations. The Washington Post (12/14, A6, Stephens, 690K) reports, "A huge tax bill that Congress passed last week contained a little-noticed gift for select corporations -- tens of millions of dollars in breaks on import tariffs. Early Saturday morning, in the frantic final hours of the 109th Congress, lawmakers rolled 520 tariff suspensions into the must-pass bill. The provisions will reduce or eliminate taxes on imported products as varied as shoes, camcorders and boiled oysters." The Post adds, "While such suspensions have been around for decades, the flurry of provisions pushed this Congress to a record of nearly 800 for the year. Corporate lobbyists often craft such suspensions to apply to just one product imported by just one company. Many of those companies and their executives have given millions of dollars to political campaigns. … Altogether, the suspensions passed this year could cost the Treasury hundreds of millions of dollars in lost revenue. The previous Congress approved about 440 new and extended suspensions, at an estimated cost of $172 million."

Congress' Failure To Renew Law Could Hit Rural Schools Hard. USA Today (12/14, Toppo, 2.27M) reports, "Rural school districts in 42 states could be forced to cut their budgets or close down altogether in coming months, advocates say, because Congress left Washington last week without renewing a little-known authorization for districts with large tracts of national forest land." The Secure Rural Schools and Community Act "subsidizes about 4,400 small school districts. Congress first approved it in 2000 to make up for declining revenue in timber-producing areas and to guarantee districts a steady income. The law was up for renewal this year, but lawmakers left Washington on Saturday without approving it, leaving many districts scrambling to replace funding that, in a few cases, amounts to more than half of their budgets."

Democrats Will Seek To Integrate War Spending Into Regular Budget. The New York Times (12/14, Hulse, 1.16M) reports, "Frustrated by the Bush administration's piecemeal financing of the Iraq war, Democrats are planning to assert more control over the billions of dollars a month being spent on the conflict when they take charge of Congress in January. In interviews, the incoming Democratic chairmen of the House and Senate Budget Committees said they would demand a better accounting of the war's cost and move toward integrating the spending into the regular federal budget, a signal of their intention to use the Congressional power of the purse more assertively to influence the White House's management of the war." The lawmakers, Senator Kent Conrad and Rep. John M. Spratt, "said the administration's approach of paying for extended military operations and related activities through a series of emergency requests had inhibited Congressional scrutiny of the spending and obscured the true price of the war."

Budget Outlook Places Constraints On Democratic Agenda. The Christian Science Monitor (12/14, Grier, 59K) reports, "Lower interest rates on student loans. More special forces for the military. Expanded prescription drug benefits for senior citizens. Greater federal support for renewable energy and alternative fuels." Congressional Democrats "have a long list of priorities they'd like to enact when they assume the power of the majority in January. After all, they've been wandering in the political wilderness for 12 years. They've had lots of time to scribble down stuff under the heading 'to do.'" But "faced with record federal deficits and the expense of the war in Iraq, Democrats have also vowed to be more fiscally responsible than their Republican predecessors. Handling this impending collision could be one of the first big tests for the party's House and Senate leadership teams." The Monitor adds, "As yet, Democrats have hung no price tag on their forthcoming agenda. Many of the high-priority items they have pledged to enact in the first 100 hours of the new Congress, such as an increase in the minimum wage, wouldn't cost Washington lots of money." In addition, "incoming Speaker Pelosi said in a statement last month that the party is committed to 'no new deficit spending.'"

Wyden Offers Universal Health Care Plan. The AP (12/14, Daly) reports, "Several business and labor leaders on Wednesday hailed a proposal to provide health care coverage to all Americans through a pool of private insurance plans. A dozen years after Congress rejected a Clinton administration plan for universal health care, Oregon Sen. Ron Wyden offered a plan he said would provide affordable, private health care coverage for all Americans, except those covered through Medicare or the military." Said Wyden, "Employer-based coverage is melting away like a Popsicle on the sidewalk in August." Wyden, "a Democrat and a member of the Senate Finance health care subcommittee, said his plan would 'guarantee health coverage for every American that is at least as good as members of Congress receive and can never be taken away.'" The plan, "dubbed the 'Healthy Americans Act,' would provide universal coverage for no more money than the country spends on health insurance today, Wyden said." The Los Angeles Times (12/14, , 850K) also reports on Wyden's proposal, and says that "considered liberal on social issues and moderate on economic policy," the senator "combined elements of reforms that have been proposed by Democrats and Republicans. His plan would guarantee coverage for all, including nearly 47 million uninsured, a Democratic objective." But "it would also limit employers' exposure to relentless cost increases and encourage workers to shop for cost-effective insurance plans -- ideas that have Republican support."

Three 527 Groups Fined For Campaign Finance Violations. The AP (12/14, Kuhnhenn) reports, "Swift Boat Veterans for Truth and MoveOn.org Voter Fund, two outside groups that played key roles in the 2004 presidential election, reached an agreement with the Federal Election Commission to pay nearly $450,000 for various violations." The two groups and the League of Conservation Voters "settled charges that they failed 'to register and file disclosure reports as federal political committees and accepted contributions in violation of federal limits and source prohibitions,' the FEC said in a statement Wednesday. The commission approved the three settlements on a vote of 6-0." The issue concerns the conduct of the 527 groups, which operated "as independent campaigns attacking Democratic nominee Sen. John Kerry or President Bush." Swift Boat Veterans and POWs for Truth "will pay $299,500. In the 2004 campaign, the group spent $20.4 million criticizing Kerry's military record in Vietnam. Much of the group's claims about Kerry's service were never substantiated." The MoveOn.org Voter Fund "will pay $150,000." The group "spent $14.6 million on television ads attacking Bush's record." The League of Conservation Voters "will pay $180,000. The group ran ads against Bush and other federal candidates, criticizing their stands on environmental issues."

USA Today (12/14, Schouten, 2.27M) reports the action "is the first clampdown on outside political groups, FEC Chairman Michael Toner said, and could diminish the role of such organizations." Toner said the groups "stepped over the line by either raising funds or by paying for activities that called for the election or defeat of the presidential contenders." Richard Hasen of Loyola Law School in Los Angeles said, "We would not see independent spending on the same scale in 2008 as we did in 2004 [if the FEC action survives legal challenges]."

The Washington Post (12/14, A5, Smith, 690K) reports the FEC "slapped heavy fines on three independent fundraising groups it said had illegally injected tens of millions of dollars into the 2004 presidential campaign, concluding unanimously that the funds were drawn from large donors and corporations in violation of election laws." The fines "raised new questions about the viability of using such '527' organizations as an indirect conduit for big-money donations meant to promote or undermine federal candidates." But "prominent election lawyers said the FEC's decision to fine the three groups was unlikely to slow such funding in the 2008 election. Although the fines imposed yesterday add new uncertainty for large donors, the underlying FEC rules remain so murky that the strength of the precedent is unclear, the lawyers said." GOP election lawyer Jan Baran said, "There is no clear standard."

Personnel News. In its "Special Interests" column, the Washington Post (12/14, A29, Sarasohn, 690K) reports the Investment Company Institute "snagged James R. Hart, a 30-year veteran of the Hill and most recently chief of staff to Rep. Carolyn McCarthy (D-N.Y.)." Robert C. Divine "has left his job as U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services chief counsel…and rejoined Baker, Donelson, Bearman, Caldwell & Berkowitz law firm." Meanwhile, "health-care specialist Stephen J. OTHER NEWS:

Hill Says Pyongyang Appears Serious About Six-Party Talks. The Washington Times (12/14, Sands, 88K) reports, "Top US negotiator Christopher Hill said yesterday that he will push for 'measurable, concrete progress' to end North Korea's nuclear weapons programs when regional talks resume this weekend in Beijing after a break of more than a year. Just over two months after Pyongyang stunned the world by conducting its first nuclear test, Mr. Hill said in a State Department briefing that China has offered the United States 'unprecedented cooperation' in recent weeks in pressing the North to return to the stalled 'six-party talks.'" Negotiators for "the six countries -- the United States, China, North and South Korea, Japan and Russia -- are set to meet Sunday night in Beijing for the first time since Pyongyang's nuclear test." Hill "said he anticipated this round of talks would last at least a week and he hoped to be home by Christmas."

Fox Special Report (12/13, story 4, 3:15, Hume) reported Hill "appears hopeful." Fox (Rosen) added, "America's envoy…said recent exchanges with the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, as the north calls itself, suggest that when the talks resume Sunday night in Beijing, after more than a year's respite, real results might actually follow."

The AP (12/14) reports Hill stressed at yesterday's briefing that "the purpose of the six-party talks is not to talk," and said US negotiators are looking for "measurable" and "concrete progress" at the talks. He said it had not been determined how long the negotiations will last, but that talks would begin Sunday night and he would spend next week in Beijing. Hill said he would be meeting over the weekend with his negotiating counterparts, including the North Korean delegate. Hill also said cooperation with the Chinese in preparation for the meeting has been "unprecedented."

AFP (12/14, Millikin) reports the assistant secretary said Pyongyang has indicated it is ready to "deal in specifics" about abandoning its nuclear weapons program, but he predicted "very tough negotiations" next week. Hill said it was not clear if North Korea's leadership agreed to resume talks due to UN sanctions or "because they have exploded a nuclear device and they feel very strong as a result of that." But Hill said he had made clear to Pyongyang already that "we do not consider them a nuclear power and we will not consider them a nuclear power."

Negotiators Report Progress On UN Sanctions On Iran. AFP (12/14, Aziakou) reports negotiators "edged closer to agreeing UN sanctions against Iran…raising hopes that the Security Council could vote on a compromise package soon." After a new round of informal talks on a sanctions draft resolution early Wednesday, several participants emerged "reasonably upbeat." British Ambassador Emyr Jones Parry told reporters negotiators "made substantial progress," and "expressed hope that a compromise text would be agreed on this week," paving for the way for a Security Council vote "as soon as possible after that."

The Christian Science Monitor (12/14, LaFranchi, 59K) reports that "as prospects wane for tough international action against Iran, some countries in the region are expressing alarm at the pace of Tehran's progress toward mastery of the nuclear cycle. And they seem to be saying, "'f the international community is not going to do something about it, we will.' Such an attitude is raising fears of a Middle East arms race." The Monitor adds, "Noting that Saudi Arabia and other Gulf countries announced over the weekend their interest in developing a cooperative nuclear-energy program, former Middle East negotiator Dennis Ross said, 'Who is that message for? Let me tell you, it's not for Iran. It was for us.'"

Bolton To Seek Charges Against Ahmadinejad Over Israel Remarks. The Financial Times (12/14, Turner) reports Ambassador Bolton Thursday will "call for legal proceedings" against Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "for incitement to genocide." Bolton will join former Israeli Ambassador Dore Gold, former Canadian attorney-general Irwin Cotler, and Nobel peace prize winner Elie Wiesel "in claims that a series of public statements against Israel constitute a crime under the Genocide Convention." A 68-page study produced by the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs and the International Association of Jewish Lawyers and Jurists argues that Ahmadinejad's declaration that "Israel should be wiped off the map" is "part of a hate campaign punishable under international law." The Iranian mission to the UN dismissed the call as "a propaganda move, and an act without any substance. The international court of justice should give every priority to the real genocide of Palestinian people by Israeli leaders." Meanwhile, Juan Mendez, the UN's special adviser on the prevention of genocide, "said he did not plan to take any official action over the remarks because his job was to help vulnerable populations that could not defend themselves."

The New York Times (12/14, Slackman, 1.16M) reports, "Iran's so-called Holocaust conference this week was billed as a chance to force the West to reconsider the historical record and, thereby, the legitimacy of Israel. But why would the Iranians invite speakers with so little credibility in the West, including a former Ku Klux Klan grand wizard and disgraced European scholars? That question misses the point." Ahmadinejad "portrays participants like David Duke, the former Louisiana Klan leader, and Robert Faurisson of France, who has devoted his life to trying to prove that the Nazi gas chambers were a myth, as silenced truth-tellers whose stories expose Western leaders as the hypocrites he considers them to be. Just as Soviet leaders used to invite Americans who suffered racial or political discrimination to Moscow to embarrass Washington, Mr. Ahmadinejad seems to enjoy pointing out that countries like Germany, France and Austria claim to champion free debate yet have made Holocaust denial illegal." But "there is another important point. Mr. Ahmadinejad actually seems to believe that the volumes of documentation, testimony and living memory of the Nazi genocide are at best exaggerated and part of a Zionist conspiracy to falsify history so as to create the case for Israel."

Local Elections Present Test For Ahmadinejad. The New York Times (12/14, Fathi, 1.16M) reports Iranians will go to the polls on Friday in elections that "are expected to be a test of whether President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad still has the popular support that led to his victory 18 months ago." The elections are for city councils around the country and for the 86-member Assembly of Experts, which selects the country's supreme religious leader. The city councils exercise "substantial political leverage, especially in the capital, Tehran," where a slate affiliated with Ahmadinejad is running against "other radicals who have been sidelined by Mr. Ahamdiejad and against reformist politicians who are trying to make a comeback after three major defeats in the past three years." However, AFP (12/14, Eqbali) says "conservative-reformist power struggles or foreign policy are far from the minds" of many Iranian voters, who "are more concerned with unemployment and the cost of living."

Lebanon Standoff Seen As Key Test Of US Resolve, Credibility. McClatchy (12/14, Lasseter) reports, "For most Americans, the standoff between the militant Shiite Muslim group Hezbollah and Lebanon's government may look like inside politics in a country that's barely big enough to contain its name on most world maps." But "Hezbollah's two-week-old siege of Prime Minister Fuad Saniora's administration is, in many ways, a test of US power and credibility in the Middle East at a time when the Bush administration is struggling to regain the offensive in Iraq and Afghanistan. Analysts, Lebanese leaders and Western diplomats agree that the crisis is an outgrowth of a developing showdown between the United States, which backs Saniora, and Syria and Iran, which support Hezbollah." That "cold war can be seen across the region. In Iraq, Syria and Iran are helping forces aligned against US troops. In the Palestinian-Israeli conflict, Iran has pledged millions to help the Hamas-led Palestinian government - which the United States and Europe have cut off - and Syria continues to support Hamas and several Palestinian terrorist groups."

The Washington Post (12/14, A22, Shadid, 690K) reports, "For years, Fouad Siniora was a man of numbers more than rhetoric, as a banker, finance minister and friend to Rafiq al-Hariri, the billionaire former prime minister assassinated last year. This week, he stood before a crowd that included more than 1,800 women at his barricaded government headquarters, more populist than pragmatist, more agitator than accountant." The Post adds, "In the test of wills that Lebanon's crisis has become, the government is playing a game of perceptions. Ministers insist it is business as usual, while in almost daily scenes, busloads of supporters from elsewhere in Lebanon are ferried to the stately Serail, as Siniora's headquarters is known." The government, "in sometimes blunt ways, is mobilizing its sectarian constituencies -- usually Sunni Muslim -- as a veiled warning to Hezbollah and its Shiite Muslim followers not to go too far in a campaign the government's supporters variously portray as a coup d'etat, an attempt to grab power for the Shiite community or a ploy to deliver leverage here to Iran and Syria."

Meanwhile, the Washington Times (12/14, Behn, 88K) reports, "A Lebanese official yesterday said the leading government party was ready to accept an Arab League package of political solutions to defuse the crisis paralyzing the country." Arab League leader Amr Moussa "told reporters Tuesday that 'progress has been made' toward a compromise resolution, but that all parties would have to make concessions for a consensus to be reached." Amal Mudallali, "a foreign policy adviser to parliamentary majority leader Saad Hariri, said the package would grant the opposition more seats in the Cabinet but leave it one short of the veto power demanded by Hezbollah."

Hamas Commander Killed As Palestinians Infighting Intensifies. The New York Times (12/14, A16, Myre, 1.16M) reports as part of "renewed fighting among Palestinians, gunmen forced a prominent Hamas militant to his knees on Wednesday, then shot him dead outside a courthouse where he worked, in the southern Gaza Strip." Hamas said a Fatah "death squad" was responsible for the killing of the militant, Bassam al-Farra, in Khan Yunis. Fatah, however, denied involvement. Hamas spokesman Fauzi Barhoum cautioned that there is "a very dangerous situation" in Gaza, where "there has been an escalation in the violence and the chaos."

The AP (12/14, Barzak) says the "brazen daylight slaying forced Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas to rush home from a trip abroad and dampened already fading hopes for creating a national unity government and renewing peace talks with Israel." Meanwhile, both Hamas and Fatah "criticized President Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah for failing to halt the violence."

As Tensions Rise In Somalia, Regional War Feared. In a front page report, the New York Times (12/14, A1, Gettleman, Mazzetti, 1.16M) reports that the "inevitability of war hangs over Mogadishu" but "unlike the internal anarchy that has consumed the country for 15 years, the looming battle is now with Ethiopia, threatening to further destabilize the troubled Horn of Africa." Over the past week as Islamic militants strengthened their control of the city, "much of the rest of the country have begun a food drive, a money drive and an AK-47 assault rifle drive, and have sent doctors and nurses, along with countless young soldiers, to the front lines." Meanwhile, Ethiopia, "with tacit approval from the United States," has been "steadily slipping soldiers across the border, trying to hold off the Islamists and shore up Somalia's weak, unpopular and divided transitional government." Centcom Commander Gen. John Abizaid "recently flew to Ethiopia to meet with Prime Minister Meles Zenawi," who told American officials that he could cripple the Islamist forces "in one to two weeks." Abizaid "made it clear that a broad military invasion of Somalia could create a humanitarian crisis across the Horn of Africa," Centcom officials said, but "did not tell Ethiopian officials to pull their troops out."

The Washington Post (12/14, A19, McCrummen, 690K) reports as tensions rise "there is fear that an all-out conflict in the Horn of Africa may be unavoidable." For now, hopes for a peaceful resolution "are pinned on a UN Security Council resolution adopted last week, authorizing deployment of an African Union force, excluding troops from neighboring states" to Baidoa, the seat of Somalia's transitional government. Some analysts, however, "contend that the measure has already prompted" the Islamic militants to "push toward Baidoa and will ultimately serve as a rallying point for the movement's more radical factions."

Russia Poised To Cut Off Gas Supplies To Belarus, Georgia. The Financial Times (12/14, Buckley, Ostrovsky) reports, "Russia is preparing to cut off natural gas supplies to neighbouring Belarus and Georgia unless the two former Soviet republics agree by the year-end to pay much higher prices in 2007. Coming a year after Gazprom, the Russian gas giant, briefly cut gas to Ukraine in a similar pricing dispute, such a move could provoke further criticism that Moscow is using energy as a political tool." The Times adds, "Action against Belarus could affect supplies to Poland and Germany because a transit pipeline runs across the republic, though it carries only a third of the volumes running through a bigger export pipeline across Ukraine. ... Gazprom has made clear it is prepared to reduce price increases in exchange for stakes in the republics' gas distribution networks."

The Financial Times (12/14, Buckley) says, "Russia is set to deal a double blow to the economy of one of its closest allies – potentially making life much more difficult for the man the US has called 'Europe's last dictator.' As well as pressing for Belarus to pay much more for its natural gas, Moscow said this week it would slap an export duty on what are currently duty-free Russian crude oil exports to its close Slavic neighbour." The "measures could sharply reduce or wipe out the $4bn-plus effective annual subsidy Russia provides to Belarus, which has helped Alexander Lukashenko, its authoritarian president, deliver higher wages and living standards to his 10m people." Analysts "suggest Moscow is penalising Mr Lukashenko for not delivering on pledges of closer integration with Russia, including the currency union and selling half of Beltransgaz, the Belarusian gas distributor, to Gazprom."

Litivinenko's Poisoning Continues To Spark Commentary. In an editorial this morning, the Washington Post (12/14, A30, 690K) says "it's still not known how the former Russian KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko came to ingest the deadly dose of polonium-210 that killed him in London last month. But thanks to the radioactive trail left behind by the isotope, some important conclusions about the case are now possible. First, the polonium was smuggled into Britain from Russia, where most of the known global supply of the intensely toxic substance is produced. Second, the dose was almost certainly carried by one or both of the former Russian security operatives -- one of them also a KGB alumnus -- whom Mr. Litvinenko met at a London hotel Nov. 1." Also, "the government of Vladimir Putin is making it difficult for British and German investigators to question the suspects, who are now sequestered in Moscow hospitals." The case "should cause Western governments, including the Bush administration, to insist on some answers from Mr. Putin."

Oleg Gordievsky, a former who colonel in the Soviet KGB who defected to Britain in 1985, writes in the Washington Post (12/14, A31, 690K), "The KGB and its predecessors liquidated people abroad quite regularly in the 1920s and '30s and even after World War II. But after two embarrassing and highly publicized defections of assassins, in 1957 and 1959, these activities ceased. … There were no secret assassinations under Mikhail Gorbachev or Boris Yeltsin. But under Vladimir Putin, the militant element of the KGB (now known as the FSB) slowly began working to persuade the leadership to carry out such killings, according to my sources."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Leahy Promises 'Real' Oversight Of FBI (AP)

By Laurie Kellman

President Bush should expect tougher oversight of the war on terrorism and a closer look at his administration's policies on torture and other human rights issues, the incoming chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee said Wednesday.

Sen. Patrick Leahy said his panel also will look at recommendations by the Iraq Study Group that law enforcement officials from the FBI and other offices in the Justice Department be sent to Iraq to boost a police force riddled with corruption. Leahy noted reports that police helped Saddam Hussein's nephew escape from a prison near Mosul.

"The police force has proven to be one of the worst failures of the occupation," said Leahy, D-Vt. "I look forward to the Judiciary Committee contributing to these efforts by exploring the dozen recommendations relating to the Iraqi justice system and the training of Iraqi police forces."

Leahy said he would also deal with what he says are the administration's human rights abuses by creating a new subcommittee focused on legislation on such issues as torture and detainee treatment. Democratic Whip Dick Durbin of Illinois will chair the new panel, Leahy said.

The incoming chairman should not count on big changes in regard to oversight of the Justice Department, according to a spokesman for the agency.

"As we have for the past six years, we're looking forward to working with the Senate Judiciary Committee," said spokesman Brian Roehrkasse. The relationship, he added, includes "working with the committee to provide information that it legitimately needs."

"In the past, we've reached accommodations, and working together we expect we can do so in the future," he said.

Expecting resistance to his plans to examine the administration's use of executive power, Leahy said he would not hesitate to subpoena witnesses and documents. He said he expected to summon Attorney General Alberto Gonzales before his panel "soon."

Leahy wants to examine the administration's warrantless wiretapping program and its legal and physical treatment of detainees, saying that White House policy has violated Americans' civil rights and the human rights of war prisoners.

Roehrkasse maintained that the administration's domestic surveillance program and treatment of detainees fall within the bounds of U.S. and international law and are appropriate responses to the terrorist threat the nation faces.

Like the current committee chairman, Republican Sen. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, Leahy suggested Congress could dissuade Bush from issuing more such statements by threatening to withhold funding or blocking nominations.

Leahy, who was chairman of the committee in 2001-2002, said the return of Democratic control would mean a period of "restoration, repair and renewal" after what he termed years of the Bush administration's virtually unchecked power to hunt for terrorists even within U.S. borders.

"This administration has been less and less willing to let us know what they are doing," Leahy said. Bush's warrantless wiretapping program and the government's secretive terrorism risk assessments of Americans traveling abroad merit a closer look by his panel, Leahy said.

"Americans' privacy is a price the Bush administration is willing to pay for the cavalier way it is spawning new databanks," he said in his prepared text. "We are way overdue in catching up to the erosion of privacy, and the Judiciary Committee now will help to bring this picture into focus."

Also on the agenda, Leahy said, is a bill he has introduced to crack down on war profiteering in Iraq. The measure would prohibit profiteering and fraud by contractors in connection with war, relief or reconstruction efforts and would set stiff punishments of prison time and fines.

Senator Promises Vigilant Oversight Of War On Terror (MCT)

By Margaret Talev

McClatchy, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON - The next chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee said Wednesday that he'll subpoena documents and testimony on U.S. terrorism, detainees and domestic-surveillance programs if Bush administration officials don't cooperate once Democrats take over in January.

"I expect to get the answers," Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., said during a speech at the Georgetown University Law Center. "I'm not trying to set up the idea of a confrontation for the sake of a confrontation. I hope people will pay attention, will answer questions. We'll try it that way first."

The administration "has secretly been compiling dossiers on millions of law-abiding Americans," Leahy said. He said that U.S. citizens should be able to see or challenge their so-called terror scores, which he said are secretly assigned by the government. He also called for more regulation of data mining.

Leahy did not specify whom he might subpoena. Asked if telephone company executives could be targeted for their secret roles in domestic surveillance, Leahy would say only: "Watch what we do."

One document he may seek to subpoena, he said, is what's believed to be a 2002 memo listing authorized CIA interrogation techniques on suspected terrorists. Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse did not address that memo specifically, but said his department had kept lawmakers sufficiently in the loop about terrorism matters.

"The department will continue to work closely with the Congress as they exercise their oversight functions, and we will appropriately respond to all requests in the spirit of that longstanding relationship," Roehrkasse said.

Leahy, a former prosecutor turned civil libertarian, also threatened to block President Bush's judicial nominees, withhold funds, or change federal law if need be to curb the president's use of "signing statements" where the president signals his intention to abide selectively by newly signed laws.

Last year, the president issued a signing statement that critics said could be cited as cover for ignoring the law's ban on torture of detainees if he found torture was in the interest of national security.

While the practice is controversial, presidents have issued similar statements throughout U.S. history, though none so frequently as Bush, and rarely so provocatively. Whether Congress can curb the practice by an equal branch of government is a question for constitutional law and possibly the U.S. Supreme Court.

McClatchy Newspapers reported earlier this year that by January 2006, Bush had invoked the practice some 500 times. Reagan challenged 71 legislative provisions, President George H.W. Bush used it for 146 laws while President Clinton challenged 105.

Curt Levey, executive director of the Committee for Justice, a group that supports Bush's judicial nominees, said he was troubled by Leahy's remarks.

"Individual senators on the floor can vote against a nominee for whatever reason they want, (including) if they want to get revenge on the president for his signing statements," Levey said. "But for Leahy to use the committee to prevent these nominees from getting a debate or up or down vote on the Senate floor is completely unacceptable."

Leahy Says Democrats Will Investigate Bush's Surveillance (BLOOM)

By William Roberts

Bloomberg, December 14, 2006

Dec. 13 (Bloomberg) -- Senate Judiciary Committee Democrats will investigate and conduct hearings on the Bush administration's domestic eavesdropping on suspected terrorists, said incoming panel chairman Senator Patrick Leahy of Vermont.

``We have a duty, a real duty, to repair the real damage done to our system of government over the past few years," Leahy said in a speech today at Georgetown University Law School in Washington.

Leahy said he told Attorney General Alberto Gonzales two weeks ago that he will be asked to appear before the Senate panel to defend the administration's use of wiretapping without a court warrant, which Leahy said has eroded U.S. constitutional rights.

``I expect to get answers. If we don't then we'll use the subpoena," Leahy said. Democrats took control of the Senate and House in the Nov. 7 election.

Leahy said he also will pursue revisions in a new law that gives President George W. Bush wide latitude in deciding what interrogation techniques are permissible. The Judiciary Committee conduct an inquiry into war profiteering in Iraq and will try to strengthen open-government laws such as the Freedom of Information Act, the incoming chairman said.

``The administration has rolled back open-government laws and systematically eroded Americans' privacy rights," Leahy said. ``It has brazenly refused to answer the legitimate oversight questions of the people's duly elected representatives and it has acted outside the law to wiretap Americans."

The Justice Department didn't have an immediate comment on Leahy's speech.

Senator Specter

Leahy said he will work with Republican Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, the outgoing Judiciary Committee chairman, to revise the law Congress passed at the end of the legislative session to provide for CIA detention and interrogation of terrorist suspects.

The measure, which Leahy called ``sweeping and ill- conceived," bars federal courts from considering habeas-corpus petitions filed by terrorism suspects challenging their detention.

``The bill written by the White House and passed by the last Congress is designed to ensure that the Bush-Cheney administration is never again embarrassed by a United States Supreme Court decision reviewing its unlawful abuses of power," Leahy said. ``I am committed to restoring basic American values to the way we combat terrorism."

Two-thirds of the U.S. public believes the FBI and other agencies intruded on the privacy of Americans as part of federal counter-terrorism investigations, according to a new Washington Post-ABC News poll released today. Fifty-two percent said they favored congressional hearings on how the Bush administration spied on Americans.

Data-Privacy Bill

The poll was a telephone survey of 1,005 randomly selected adults nationwide conducted Dec. 7-11 and had a margin of error of plus-or-minus 3 percentage points.

Leahy said he intends as chairman of the Judiciary Committee to advance a data-privacy bill to prevent data brokers from collecting and selling personal information that intrudes on Americans' privacy.

The committee will pursue an inquiry into war profiteering, he said. ``Where did all the money go?" Leahy said. ``We are going to ask those questions."

Leahy said he will seek to strengthen and improve open- government laws such as the Freedom of Information Act, which he said has been eroded by the Bush administration.

In the next Congress, Leahy said the Judiciary Committee will act to confirm Bush's judicial nominees if they are approved by both senators from the state where the court sits and by the Senate majority and minority leaders.

Leahy Vows To Repair Bush 'Damage' (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, December 14, 2006

Incoming Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick J. Leahy said yesterday that he plans to rein in President Bush's program of wiretapping without warrants, rewrite the policy for handling terrorism detainees and more closely scrutinize nominees to the federal courts.

"As a Democratic majority prepares to take the lead on the Judiciary Committee, we do not have the luxury of starting with a completely clean slate," the Vermont Democrat told an audience at Georgetown University Law Center. "We begin knowing that we have a duty to repair real damage done to our system of government over the last few years."

Mr. Leahy accused Mr. Bush of "corrosive unilateralism," eroding the privacy rights of Americans, erasing constitutional checks and balances, and "packing" the federal judiciary.

The Republican House and Senate, he said, accepted White House policy changes without question.

"I came to the Senate during the ebb tide of Vietnam and Watergate. In my 32 years since then in the Senate, I have never seen a Congress so willfully derelict in its duties," Mr. Leahy said. "This has been an unfortunate chapter in Congress' history, a time when our Constitution was under assault, when our legal and human rights were weakened, when our privacy and other freedoms were eroded."

Still, he said, he hopes to proceed in a bipartisan manner.

"Senator Leahy has not yet assumed the chairmanship of the Judiciary Committee, but his statements today and in recent weeks are already raising disturbing questions about his ability and willingness to give fair consideration to the president's judicial nominees," said Curt Levey, executive director of the conservative Committee for Justice, who attended the speech.

Though short on specifics, Mr. Leahy criticized the program of wiretapping without warrants and said he hopes to update the laws governing foreign intelligence warrants. "With meaningful oversight and cooperation from this administration, we can achieve the right balance," he said.

Sen. Jon Kyl, Arizona Republican and Judiciary Committee member, defended the president's program, aimed at capturing communications of terrorist plotters.

"Protecting legitimate privacy rights while ensuring the safety and security of the American people from terrorists is not a zero-sum game," he said in response to Mr. Leahy's comments. "We have done and can do both. Indeed, we should be seeking ways to add more tools to fight terrorists, not begin dismantling the effective laws Congress has passed in recent years."

Mr. Leahy said he wants Congress to reconsider legislation denying habeas corpus rights to terrorism suspects held at the U.S. Naval Base Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

He also said he hopes to make "further progress" on the Senate's immigration reform bill, which proposes a path to citizenship for most of the estimated 12 million to 20 million illegal aliens in the country.

"We made some bipartisan progress on the committee and in the Senate last year only to be stymied by Republican congressional leaders," he said. "We can work together to bring people out of the shadows, to treat hardworking people with dignity and respect rather than disdain and discrimination."

Mr. Leahy criticized Bush nominations to the federal bench. "For too long, this White House has used judicial nominations for partisan political purposes and refused to work with us on consensus nominees," he said.

Those remarks reopened a rift with conservatives, who see only partisan politics in Senate Democrats' filibusters of several nominations.

Mr. Levey said Mr. Leahy's calls for consultation overlook the Constitution, which gives the president the "sole power of appointing judges."

"Leahy apparently views himself as the president's partner in selecting nominees, rather than as part of the limited advice-and-consent process envisioned for the Senate by the Constitution," he said. "Moreover, when Senator Leahy speaks of wanting 'consensus' judicial nominees, what he appears to have in mind are nominees that are acceptable to the coalition of ultraliberal groups that have orchestrated much of the opposition to the president's judicial picks."

Panel To Focus On Civil Liberties (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 13 — The Senate Judiciary Committee plans to create a Subcommittee on Human Rights and the Law to examine issues like torture, war crimes and human trafficking, the incoming chairman of the panel said on Wednesday.

In a speech outlining an agenda of “restoration, repair and renewal,” the new chairman, Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, said that the new subcommittee would bring a focus to efforts to protect civil liberties.

The announcement seemed to underscore Mr. Leahy’s intention to use oversight more aggressively than Republicans had.

“This has been an unfortunate chapter in Congress’s history,” Mr. Leahy said of the recent years of Republican control.

“I have never seen a Congress so willfully derelict in its duties as during this administration,” he added.

Mr. Leahy, in an appearance at the Georgetown University law school, accused the White House of “corrosive unilateralism” in refusing to cooperate with Congress. After the September 2001 attacks, he said, “the White House accelerated its power plays at the expense of the other branches of government — all in the name of fighting terrorism.”

The Bush administration, Mr. Leahy said, had “brazenly refused to answer the legitimate oversight questions of the public’s duly elected representatives and it has acted outside the lawful authority to wiretap Americans without warrants and to create databanks and dossiers on law-abiding Americans without following the law and without seeking legal authorization.”

He said the administration had made judicial appointments for “partisan political purposes and refused to work with us on consensus nominees.” Bipartisan nominating panels should be considered to screen candidates, Mr. Leahy said.

A spokesman for the Justice Department, Brian Roehrkasse, said in a statement, “As we have in the past six years, we’re looking forward to working with the Senate Judiciary Committee, including working with the committee to provide information that it legitimately needs.”

"In the past we've reached accommodations on working together," Mr. Roehrkasse said; "we expect we can do so in the future as well."

Conservative groups quickly issued statements denouncing Mr. Leahy's speech. Curt Levey, executive director of the Committee for Justice, said, "When Mr. Leahy speaks of wanting 'consensus' judicial nominees, what he appears to have in mind are nominees that are acceptable to the coalition of ultra-liberal groups that have orchestrated much of the opposition to the president's judicial picks."

Leahy Threatens To Subpoena Bush Officials (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — The incoming chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee said Wednesday that he would subpoena Bush administration officials if they refused requests for documents and testimony, including two long-sought memos detailing its detention and treatment of terrorism suspects overseas.

The comments by Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) represent the strongest and most specific statements yet directed at the White House on the investigative agenda of the Democratic leaders poised to assume control of Congress in January.

Leahy's threat shows the depth of frustration among Democrats who believe the administration has withheld crucial details about some of the most provocative anti-terrorism moves since the Sept. 11 attacks.

"I expect to get the answers. If I don't … then I really think we should subpoena," Leahy said after a speech at Georgetown law school. "If the president wants to claim executive authority, then let him do so, and then we can determine where we go from there."

The remarks signaled a possible legal confrontation with the White House over what Democrats and many legal scholars view as its expansive and unchecked use of executive power. It also marks a possible return to the use of an oversight tool that has been all but forgotten by the Republican-led Congress over the first six years of the Bush administration.

"I'm not trying to set up the idea of a confrontation for the sake of a confrontation," Leahy said. "I hope people will pay attention, will answer questions. We'll try it that way first."

Leahy has his sights set on two administration documents that have been among the most controversial for human rights and civil liberties groups concerned about the U.S. response to the Sept. 11 attacks and the Iraq war.

One is a presidential order signed by Bush authorizing the CIA to set up secret prisons outside the United States to house terrorism suspects. The other is a 2002 Justice Department memorandum outlining "aggressive interrogation techniques" that could be used against terrorism suspects.

Though the two documents have been known about for years, the Bush administration has kept them under wraps, only acknowledging their existence this fall after Bush transferred 14 detainees from the prisons to the military detention center at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, for possible trials.

Leahy has made a number of sweeping demands for documents about the treatment of detainees from the Justice Department and other agencies, only to have most of them returned unanswered. Last month, he made a request to Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales for the presidential order and Justice Department memo. Leahy said he expected Gonzales to testify before the judiciary committee "soon."

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said Wednesday that the request was being reviewed.

"The department will continue to work closely with the Congress as they exercise their oversight functions, and we will appropriately respond," Roehrkasse said, adding that the department would work with the committee "to provide information that it legitimately needs."

"In the past we've reached accommodations, and working together we expect we can do so in the future as well," he said.

The issuance of subpoenas would mark a new and combative chapter in that relationship.

For years, the Republican-controlled Congress has relied on the administration to voluntarily provide testimony and documents, reinforcing its reputation, at least among Democrats, as a rubber stamp for Bush policies. The judiciary committee has issued subpoenas in recent years, but they have tended to target private firms rather than government figures.

DOJ_NMG_0106190

Though Leahy said he would appeal to the administration's sense of bipartisanship, he also indicated that Congress might not hesitate to ensure compliance with its requests.

Legal experts said the most effective way to enforce a subpoena is to use the power to withhold funds from administration projects or to refuse to consider nominees who require Senate approval — courses that Leahy said the committee would consider.

"Congress has the ability to make sure that the president does what the Constitution requires him to do to faithfully execute the laws," he said.

Leahy also said he would press for more information about the administration's domestic surveillance program under which the National Security Agency has monitored communications between suspected terrorists abroad and people in the U.S. without first obtaining a warrant.

Congress considered legislation this fall that would essentially ratify the controversial program, which one federal court has found to violate the Constitution. But Leahy said he could not support any such legislation until he knew more about the program.

Leahy also promised tougher legislation to crack down on war profiteering by private contractors in Iraq, and restrictions on the government's ability to secretly collect dossiers on airline travelers. He said he would push to overturn portions of the new Military Commissions Act of 2006 that stripped terrorism suspects of the right of habeas corpus to challenge their detention in the courts.

He also said he would set up a new judiciary subcommittee to oversee international human rights issues, including torture.

"This election was an intervention," he said. "The American people rose up to take away Congress' rubber stamp, and to demand a new direction with more accountability."

U.S. Warns Of Threat To Satellites (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, December 14, 2006

The Bush administration warned Wednesday against threats by terrorist groups and other nations against U.S. commercial and military satellites, and discounted the need for a treaty aimed at preventing an arms race in space.

Undersecretary of State Robert G. Joseph also reasserted U.S. policy that it has a right to use force against hostile nations or terror groups that might try to attack American satellites or ground installations that support space programs. President Bush adopted a new U.S. space policy earlier this year.

"We reserve the right to defend ourselves against hostile attacks and interference with our space assets," Joseph said in prepared remarks to the George C. Marshall Institute.

Joseph, the senior arms control official at the State Department, said nations cannot all be counted on to use space purely for peaceful purposes.

"A number of countries are exploring and acquiring capabilities to counter, attack, and defeat U.S. space systems," Joseph said

He also said terrorists "understand our vulnerabilities and have targeted our economy in the past, as they did on 9/11." He said terrorists and enemy states might view the U.S. space program as "a highly lucrative target," while sophisticated technologies could improve their ability to interfere with U.S. space systems and services.

Joseph did not identify terror groups or nations that might have such motives. An aide to Joseph, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the matter, said that information was classified.

"For our part, we must take all of these threats seriously because space capabilities are essential" to the U.S. economy and government, Joseph said. He said the U.S. is more reliant on space than any other country.

"No nation, no state-actor, should be under the illusion that the United States will tolerate a denial of our right to the use of space for peaceful purposes," he said.

Wade Boese, a spokesman for the private Arms Control Association, challenged the adminstration's policy. He said rejecting additional international arms controls for space runs counter to U.S. security interests "because the United States has the most to lose from an unregulated space arena."

Boese said he believes the administration wants to avoid negotiations in order to preserve the possibility of deploying space-based missile defense systems, such as interceptors.

Joseph listed telecommunications, transportation, electrical power, water supply, gas and oil storage, transportation systems, emergency services, banking and finance, and government services as relying heavily on data transmitted by satellites.

"The United States views the purposeful interference with its space systems as an infringement on our rights," he said, adding. "If these rights are not respected, the United States has the same full range of options — from diplomatic to military — to protect its space assets as it has to protect its other critical assets."

Joseph ruled out negotiating a new international space agreement, saying the 1967 Outer Space Treaty established an effective arms control regime. The treaty bans the stationing of weapons of mass destruction in outer space and declares outer space should be used only for peaceful purposes.

A new agreement is not necessary, Joseph said. "We should concentrate on real threats," he said, citing Iran and North Korea.

"There is no arms race in space and we see no signs of one emerging," he said.

U.S. To Defend Space With Military Force (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, December 14, 2006

The United States will use military force in space to protect satellites and other space systems from attack by hostile states or terrorists, the Bush administration's senior arms-control official said yesterday.

Robert Joseph, undersecretary of state for arms control and international security, said in a speech outlining a new White House space policy that free access to space is a "vital" U.S. interest and that the Bush administration opposes new agreements that would limit U.S. space defenses.

"To ensure free access to space ... we must continue to develop a full range of options to deter and defend against threats to our space infrastructure," Mr. Joseph said in a speech to the George C. Marshall Institute, a private think tank.

The United States will "oppose others who wish to use their military capabilities to impede or deny our access to and use of space," he said. "We will seek the best capabilities to protect our space assets by active or passive means."

"No nation, no non-state actor, should be under the illusion that the United States will tolerate a denial of our right to the use of space for peaceful purposes," he said. "We reserve the right to defend ourselves against hostile attacks and interference with our space assets," he said.

U.S. officials said the comments are an indirect warning to China, which has fired a ground-based laser gun at a U.S. satellite that passed over its territory -- an event viewed as one sign of Beijing's efforts to develop space arms that can blind or destroy systems.

Mr. Joseph said yesterday that a number of nations are developing weapons to "counter, attack and defeat U.S. space systems." He did not name the countries. Asked after the speech about the Chinese laser incident, he declined to comment.

"In view of these growing threats, our space policy requires us to increase our ability to protect our critical space capabilities and to continue to protect our interests from being harmed through the hostile use of space," he said.

The United States has become very reliant on the use of satellites for civilian communications as well as military command and control, with a large portion of government communications transiting space.

The White House announced in October that President Bush authorized a new national space policy, the first since 1996, that states that the United States is committed to the peaceful use of space and rejects any nation's attempts to claim sovereignty over it.

The policy also views any attempt to interfere with space systems as an infringement on the right of free passage in space, and describes space capabilities as "vital" to national interests.

Mr. Joseph said yesterday that space should be regarded similarly to open seas where free navigation is a right.

"If these rights are not respected, the United States has the same full range of options -- from diplomatic to military -- to protect its space assets as it has to protect its other critical assets," he said.

"There is also a broad range of means, both passive and active, by which space assets may be protected or the effects of the loss of their services minimized," he said.

Alternatives include non-space backup systems, satellites with onboard subcomponent replacement parts, satellite maneuvering systems to avoid threats, electronic and other system security, data encryption, and communications frequency shifts.

Mr. Joseph said the United States needs to use space systems as part of a strategy to manage crises, deter conflict or "if deterrence fails, prevail in conflict."

Both Russia and China have sought to introduce arms-control agreements at the United Nations designed to limit U.S. space weapons or defenses, and the Bush administration opposes the proposed agreements and talks.

Mr. Joseph said the Outer Space Treaty has been a long-standing and effective tool to guide international cooperation in space. New international agreements are "unnecessary and counterproductive," he said.

"We do not need to enter into new agreements; rather we should be seeking to gain universal adherence to existing agreements, including the 1967 Outer Space Treaty, and we should concentrate our efforts on real threats, such as those to the nuclear nonproliferation regime which, as a consequence of actions by Iran and North Korea, are under great strain," Mr. Joseph said.

Judge In Pakistan Dismisses Charges In Bomb Plot (NYT)

By Salman Masood

The New York Times, December 14, 2006

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, Dec. 13 — A judge threw out terrorism charges on Wednesday against Rashid Rauf, a Briton of Pakistani descent whom prosecutors depicted as a major figure in a plot to smuggle liquid explosives onto trans-Atlantic airliners and detonate the bombs in flight.

The ruling means there are now no terrorism charges against two people once accused of being linchpins of a major bombing plot by Al Qaeda. The other is Tayib Rauf, Mr. Rauf's younger brother, who was detained in Britain in August and was soon set free without charge.

But it was not clear whether the ruling would clear the way for Rashid Rauf's return to Britain for questioning on other charges.

Reports of a bombing conspiracy created powerful strains between American and British investigators over the timing of a crackdown on suspects in which British authorities rounded up 25 people on Aug. 9 and 10, later charging 17 of them. The other eight, including Tayib Rauf, were set free without charges.

British officials involved in the case said that American investigators had pushed for quicker arrests but that the British had wanted to wait to gather admissible evidence.

One of seven people arrested in Pakistan in the case was Rashid Rauf, 25, who holds Pakistani and British citizenship. Pakistani officials identified him as a "key figure" and said he had contacts to Al Qaeda in Afghanistan.

But in Rawalpindi on Wednesday, Mr. Rauf appeared in a counterterrorism court and the judge dismissed most of the charges against him, upholding a defense objection that they lay outside the court's jurisdiction.

Mr. Rauf still faces some secondary charges in Pakistan and is being held by the authorities. Britain has requested his extradition, and Pakistani officials said they were considering the request.

"Rauf was booked under six charges, such as impersonation, cheating, forging documents, presenting those forged documents as real and keeping explosives," Hashmat Habib, his lawyer, said in a telephone interview.

"When we scrutinized the charges, we were of the opinion that none of the charges fell under the jurisdiction of the antiterrorism court. The court agreed with our objection."

Mr. Rauf is now scheduled to appear next Wednesday before a District and Sessions Court to answer the remaining charges, Mr. Habib said.

Mr. Rauf has not been charged in Britain in connection with any airline plot, and a Home Office spokeswoman said no extradition request had been made in relation to a plot.

DOJ_NMG_0106193

Britain has, however, filed an extradition request for Mr. Rauf as a suspect in the murder of an uncle, Mohamed Saeed, who was stabbed near his home in Birmingham in April 2002.

Britain and Pakistan have no extradition treaty, so it is Pakistan's choice whether to permit extradition.

The British government offered no immediate comment on the case.

Accounts differ over when Rashid Rauf was arrested. The Pakistani police said he was taken into custody on Aug. 10, the day of the British raids, in Chohan Chowk, near the Islamabad airport. But Mr. Habib said his client was arrested the day before while traveling between Multan and Bahawalpur, in Punjab Province.

Mr. Rauf left Britain in 2002 to settle and marry in Bahawalpur. He was not a subject of scrutiny before his arrest in August, although the police had linked his wife's family to an outlawed Islamist group.

Terror-Free Investing (WSJ)

By Sarah Steelman

The Wall Street Journal, December 14, 2006

JEFFERSON CITY, Mo. -- The idea of "shareholder democracy" is today much bruited about, but whatever connotations that term has acquired, at bottom it means investors have a "vote" -- that is, they can choose where to put their money, and where not. That kind of democracy assumes a new urgency in the post-9/11 world, as tens of billions of dollars are currently surging into countries that sponsor terrorism.

According to the independent research provider Conflict Securities Advisory Group (CSAG), there are some 485 publicly traded companies doing business with four regimes designated by the State Department as sponsors of terror. The activities of these mostly foreign-owned companies -- such as Total, Sinopec and BNP Paribas -- in terrorist-sponsoring states generate billions in revenues for the governments of Iran, Sudan, North Korea and Syria.

By so doing, these companies create part of the cash flow that enables these nations to underwrite the activities that our armed forces are fighting around the world. Were they to stop doing business with our enemies, it would be vastly more difficult for those regimes to sponsor terrorism, finance weapons of mass destruction programs and threaten -- or, in the case of Sudan, engage in -- genocide.

In this case, shareholders -- citizens -- have the power to influence. If American investors in these businesses -- not only institutional investors such as public pension systems, money managers, investment trusts and university endowments, but also individuals -- pressure companies to sever such business relations, they can become change agents in the financial sector and force multipliers for our troops abroad.

It's high time we afford all American investors the opportunity to exert this influence by investing terror-free. That's why I am pleased to announce that the Missouri Investment Trust (MIT) became, in July of this year, the first public agency in America to implement a terror-free investment fund. This specially crafted, actively managed international fund screens out companies with ties to regimes involved with terrorism.

Our experience makes clear that it is possible for investors to hold these companies accountable for their business decisions by excluding their stocks from portfolios. We are proving that terror-free investing is a matter of choice, and that Wall Street will respond to the demand. What's more, it can be accomplished with leading investment firms and without sacrificing returns.

From a financial standpoint the results have been impressive. MIT, in conjunction with CSAG and Boston-based State Street Global Advisers, engaged in extensive due diligence. We backtested bidders' portfolios, for instance, and found that performance would not have been impaired over the past five years had the terror-free screen been in place.

The transition to the new fund was minimally disruptive. In fact, in the first quarter following its establishment, MIT's screened fund outperformed the MSCI EAFE index (the benchmark for international equities in developed Asian and European countries) by 74 basis points -- showing that this terror-free public fund will do well for Missourians while also doing good for America.

This result should not be surprising. The Securities and Exchange Commission determined years ago that companies conducting business in U.S.-sanctioned nations are exposed to "global security risk" -- risk that, in some cases, can negatively affect share value. Sadly, and somewhat shockingly, the vast majority of fiduciaries have, to date, ignored this financial risk, to say nothing of the ethical considerations, when investing in these companies.

Terror-free investing should not, however, be limited to public funds. Elected officials, fund managers, American corporations and Wall Street ought to afford this investment option to the maximum degree possible.

Toward that end, in 2007, Missouri's 529 College Savings Advisor Plan will make available to all American investors the Roosevelt Anti-Terror Multi-Cap Fund (RATF) -- the only mutual fund in the country that is currently certified to exclude companies that have business ties to the terrorist-sponsoring states referenced. Additionally, Missouri is actively pursuing the inclusion of an international terror-free fund in our 529 advisor plan line-up.

Missouri is not alone in believing that Americans want to invest terror-free. Nationwide Financial has elected to make this same certified fund available to investors through its vehicle for corporate 401(k) plans. Recently, Swiss America, a tangible asset firm located in Arizona, became the first Nationwide 401(k) client to offer its employees the RATF option. The vast majority of Swiss America's employees took advantage of this option. Nationwide is exploring how to make a terror-free investment option more available to its over 25,000-member private sector plan base.

More importantly, this type of shareholder activism has a long record of success. Over 20 years ago, companies responded to such pressure by freezing their business relations with South Africa until apartheid was abolished. In short order, the government maintaining that oppressive practice was forced first to abandon it and then to relinquish power.

Lincoln said it best: "We -- even we here -- have the power, and bear the responsibility." This American culture of civic engagement has made all the difference: encompassing everything dumping tea into a harbor to buying war bonds to serving in the armed forces.

By choosing to invest terror-free, we can help cut off financing for terror-sponsoring governments, help our soldiers, make our investments less risky and make a difference in the contemporary fight for liberty. That's democracy.

A Fair Deal For 9/11's Injured (NYT)

By Kenneth R. Feinberg

The New York Times, December 14, 2006

FIVE years have passed since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, but the flood of litigation continues unabated in federal court in Manhattan. Some 6,000 people are suing New York City, the Port Authority and more than 100 private contractors for negligence in exposing workers to toxic dust and fumes after the collapse of the World Trade Center.

Thousands of additional claims are expected in the next few months. Waiting in the wings are approximately 40,000 workers who cleaned up the site after Sept. 11, as well as residents of Lower Manhattan, observers of the cleanup effort and people who simply breathed the harmful air on their way to work — all potential litigants. Some will probably eventually suffer the same ailments that have led to the current lawsuits.

The federal judge presiding over the lawsuits has urged settlement, warning that continuing the litigation is inefficient, expensive and risky to all parties. The mere existence of thousands of lawsuits fuels uncertainty and delays the payment of compensation to eligible victims.

Two local members of Congress have introduced federal legislation to provide compensation to people injured by the toxic dust. Congress is understandably reluctant: why open the doors of the federal Treasury yet again to New Yorkers and not provide something similar to the victims of the Oklahoma City bombing, Hurricane Katrina and other calamities? The government is generally not in the business of compensating the victims of life's misfortune.

The federal Sept. 11 Victim Compensation Fund, which I oversaw, paid more than $7 billion in public compensation to the families of those who died in the World Trade Center attacks and to injured survivors. Of that, about $500 million went to more than 1,300 recovery workers and others suffering from the same respiratory injuries that now plague those in the courtroom. Since none of these 6,000 people who have filed lawsuits received diagnoses of 9/11-related injuries until after the fund's filing deadline of Dec. 22, 2003, they were ineligible for compensation. So, reluctantly, they have turned to the courts.

There is a better way: use the principles of the 9/11 fund as a blueprint to resolve the current litigation and get money into the hands of recovery workers and others quickly.

More than $1 billion in public funds is currently available for distribution as part of the initial federal appropriation earmarked for New York City's 9/11 recovery. If you add financial contributions from those contractors and others involved in the litigation, and supplement that with funds from various city charities, a total of at least $1.5 billion is available to settle the pending lawsuits — more than sufficient to pay all eligible claims, as well as lawyers' fees and costs.

Eligibility for compensation under the settlement would require proof that the victim was in the general proximity of the World Trade Center during the cleanup period. Each claimant would also supply medical documentation of an illness caused by exposure to harmful air at the site (the medical criteria would be negotiated as part of the settlement to avoid a rush of spurious claims).

New York City and the other defendants would not admit they were at fault for these injuries; they would merely agree to use available funds to pay all documented claims. (It remains an open question whether the defendants are legally responsible for such injuries.) Up to half of this money should be set aside to pay for claims stemming from future diagnoses of injuries caused by breathing the toxic air.

As with the 9/11 fund, the neediest victims, those without a financial safety net, should be the priority. Firefighters, police officers and other uniformed responders at the World Trade Center already receive benefits from pension and health insurance policies, and these amounts should be subtracted from any payments made as a result of the settlement. Funds received by eligible claimants would be used primarily for medical monitoring and other health-related services.

And, just as the 9/11 fund should be viewed as a unique public policy response to an unprecedented national calamity, so, too, would this settlement be considered a one-time solution to all remaining physical injury claims occurring at the World Trade Center.

It is unlikely that such a settlement would expose New York City and others to future demands for similar compensation. The defendants and the court could make clear that the settlement was achieved only because of the existence of available funds and the unparalleled nature of the attack.

In any event, concern about future legal liability is no excuse for refusing to act now in compensating victims in distress.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Judge Upholds Detainee Rights Terror Law (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, December 14, 2006

A federal judge upheld the Bush administration's new terrorism law Wednesday, agreeing that Guantanamo Bay detainees do not have the right to challenge their imprisonment in U.S. courts.

The ruling by U.S. District Judge James Robertson is the first to address the new Military Commissions Act and is a legal victory for the Bush administration at a time when it has been fending off criticism of the law from Democrats and libertarians.

Robertson rejected a legal challenge by Salim Ahmed Hamdan, a former driver for Osama bin Laden whose case prompted the Supreme Court to strike down the Bush administration's policy on detainees last year.

Following Hamdan's victory, Bush asked for and got a new law that established military commissions to try enemy combatants and stripped them of the right to seek their freedom in U.S. courts.

Hamdan's case was sent back before Robertson, a nominee of President Clinton who was a prominent civil rights advocate in private practice.

Though Robertson originally sided with Hamdan, he said that he no longer had jurisdiction to hear Hamdan's case because Congress clearly intended to keep such disputes out of federal courts. He said foreigners being held in overseas military prisons do not have the right to challenge their detention, a right people inside the country normally enjoy.

"This is the first time in the history of this country that a court has held that a man may be held by our government in a place where no law applies," said Barbara Olshansky, an attorney with the Center for Constitutional Rights, which has handled many detainee cases.

Justice Department spokeswoman Kathleen Blomquist said the agency was pleased with the ruling. Government lawyers have repeatedly argued that Guantanamo Bay detainees have no right to use U.S. courts. Blomquist noted that the new law allows detainees to challenge their detention before military tribunals, then contest the tribunal's ruling before a Washington appeals court.

"That is more process than the United States has ever provided to enemy combatants in our past conflicts," Blomquist said.

The ruling does not affect the fate of hundred of detainees whose cases are awaiting a ruling by a Washington appeals court, which is reviewing two precedent-setting detainee cases challenging the new law.

Judge Sets Back Guantánamo Detainees (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

WASHINGTON, Dec. 13 — For the first time, a court has affirmed that a law enacted this fall accomplishes what the White House and its Congressional supporters sought: stripping the federal judiciary of the authority to hear challenges from detainees at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

In a ruling Wednesday, Judge James Robertson of the Federal District Court here said Salim Ahmed Hamdan, a prisoner at Guantánamo, could no longer contest his detention before a federal court because, Judge Robertson said, Congress this fall explicitly eliminated his right to file a habeas corpus challenge.

The judge said the Military Commissions Act, passed by Congress in September and signed into law by President Bush the following month, was unambiguous in denying Guantánamo detainees the use of a habeas corpus statute. Like Mr. Hamdan, hundreds of other prisoners at the base have challenged their detention, in similar cases.

It was Judge Robertson who granted Mr. Hamdan's habeas petition in November 2004, abruptly halting his war crimes trial in the middle of proceedings at Guantánamo by ruling that the process was fatally flawed.

But in his decision Wednesday, the judge said circumstances had changed fundamentally with enactment of the new law. And not only is Mr. Hamdan barred from a challenge under the habeas statute, the judge said, he cannot follow the usual second avenue to bring a habeas challenge — invoking the Constitution — because it is unclear that noncitizens at Guantánamo have that right.

Mr. Hamdan is a Yemeni who was a driver for Osama bin Laden in Afghanistan and was captured there in November 2001. He has been at the center of a debate about the Bush administration's legal tactics in fighting terrorism, his challenge occupying not only the White House but also Congress and the courts — up to the Supreme Court, which will almost certainly have to revisit the case.

The Supreme Court first ruled in the Hamdan case in June, when it repudiated the administration's efforts to put Guantánamo detainees on trial before military commissions. That 5-to-3 ruling said Mr. Bush had overstepped his constitutional bounds by establishing the commissions without Congressional authorization. Further, the justices said a previous law stripping Guantánamo detainees of habeas corpus protections did so only prospectively — that is, it did not void the several hundred habeas petitions already filed in federal courts.

In response, the Republican-controlled Congress adopted the Military Commissions Act to address, explicitly and retroactively, the question of the habeas statute's application to Guantánamo.

Judge Robertson's opinion on Wednesday said in effect that in enacting the new law, Congress and the president had undone the basis of the Supreme Court's ruling.

The judge said that although Mr. Hamdan was asserting that he was entitled to habeas protection because he had never been tried properly, he would soon "face a military commission newly designed, because of his efforts, by a Congress that finally stepped up to its responsibility, acting according to guidelines laid down by the Supreme Court."

The issue of whether Mr. Hamdan and other Guantánamo detainees have a constitutional, rather than a statutory, right to habeas corpus is almost certain to form the heart of the legal debate that will next occur in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, before an ultimate decision by the Supreme Court. The appeals court is already considering the application of the new law in dozens of other habeas cases brought by detainees.

But by the time the cases make their way through the system, Mr. Hamdan and some other prisoners may have already been tried by military commissions, making the habeas issue moot as it applies to them.

Once the Military Commissions Act was adopted this fall, senior Pentagon officials said they hoped to resume war crimes trials before the newly reconstituted commissions by next summer. Mr. Hamdan, who has maintained that he was only a driver at the bin Laden farm and not a terrorist, may well be one of the first to go before the new commissions.

Judge Rejects Detention Challenge Of Bin Laden's Driver (WP)

By Robert Barnes

The Washington Post, December 14, 2006

A federal judge dismissed yesterday a challenge from Osama bin Laden's driver over his more than four years of detention at the Guantanamo Bay military prison, saying a new anti-terrorism law approved by Congress this fall removes the lower court's jurisdiction in the matter.

U.S. District Judge James Robertson is the first to rule on the controversial Military Commissions Act (MCA), which authorizes military trials of alleged enemy combatants and removes their right to try to bring their cases before federal judges.

Robertson dismissed Salim Ahmed Hamdan's petition because he said Congress clearly intended to keep such cases out of the federal courts. And he held that, as a foreigner with no voluntary ties to the United States, Hamdan has no claim to a constitutional right to habeas corpus.

The question of detainee rights prompted a Supreme Court ruling against the Bush administration's policies earlier this year, and it would not be surprising to see the administration's remedy -- the quickly produced MCA, passed by Congress in late September -- reviewed there as well.

"The issues in these cases won't be finally resolved until the Supreme Court resolves them," said David Remes, who represents another group of Guantanamo detainees challenging the law before the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit.

Nevertheless, the Justice Department celebrated the dismissal of Hamdan's case by Robertson, a civil rights advocate in private practice who was appointed to the bench by President Bill Clinton. He was also the first judge to invalidate the Bush plan for war tribunals when he first considered Hamdan's case in 2004.

"We are pleased that Judge Robertson agreed that the Military Commissions Act removes federal court jurisdiction over this and similar cases, and that the Military Commissions Act is constitutional," said Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse.

"The Constitution does not provide alien enemy combatants detained at Guantanamo Bay with the constitutional right to file a petition for habeas corpus in our civilian courts, and thus Congress may regulate those combatants' access to the courts," he said.

Beyond the legal wrangling, there is political pressure as well. Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), the incoming chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said in a speech yesterday before Robertson's decision that the MCA "needlessly undercut our freedoms and values" and that his committee will consider legislation to modify it.

He and other senators had questioned the constitutionality of suspending habeas corpus rights, one of the core principles of English and American law, which require the government to show a legal basis for detaining a person.

The Supreme Court twice, in 2004 and 2006, ruled against the Bush administration's procedures for detaining and trying alleged enemy combatants, but four justices said the president could seek from Congress the authority they said he lacked.

Robertson said that because it was clear he had been stripped of jurisdiction over Hamdan's habeas petition, he was not making a judgment on the constitutionality of the MCA. And he questioned at least part of the legislation.

He wrote that Congress could suspend the writ of habeas corpus only during a time of rebellion or invasion and that "neither . . . [was] occurring at the time the MCA was enacted."

But that does not help Hamdan, he wrote.

"Hamdan's lengthy detention beyond American borders but within the jurisdictional authority of the United States is historically unique," Robertson wrote. "Nevertheless . . . his connection to the United States lacks the geographical and volitional predicates necessary to claim a constitutional right to habeas corpus."

Guantanamo Inmates May Not Appeal, Judge Rules (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — In the first legal decision on a new federal law that denied access to U.S. courts to detainees in the war on terrorism, a federal judge ruled Wednesday that foreign prisoners held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, could not sue for their freedom.

But in a split decision, U.S. District Judge James Robertson also ruled that the law's denial of that right to the more than 12 million legal immigrants living in the United States was unconstitutional.

The first part of the ruling affirmed what Congress intended when it passed the Military Commissions Act in October. And appropriately enough, the decision came in the case of Salim Ahmed Hamdan, the onetime driver to Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden who had won what appeared to be a landmark victory in the Supreme Court in June.

Taking up Hamdan's suit, the high court's justices said President Bush had overstepped his power when he created a system of military tribunals for foreign-born alleged terrorists.

In response, Congress passed a law authorizing military tribunals. In addition, it moved to deny access to the courts to "aliens" who are accused by the president of being terrorists or "unlawful combatants."

Critics in the Senate said this provision was written so broadly that it took away from the nation's legal immigrants the traditional right of habeas corpus. This right allows those who are arrested and imprisoned to go before a judge and to plead for their freedom.

In Wednesday's ruling, Robertson said lawmakers had the legal power to close U.S. courts to detainees at Guantanamo Bay.

"Congress unquestionably has the power to establish and define the jurisdiction of the lower federal courts," he wrote in a 22-page opinion. Until some recent decisions, he said, it had always been understood that "an alien captured abroad and detained outside the United States" did not have a right to sue in a federal court.

Hamdan was captured in Afghanistan, and Guantanamo Bay is, technically, the sovereign territory of Cuba, Robertson noted.

However, the Constitution protects the right of habeas corpus for anyone living in the United States, the judge said. The Constitution says this right may be "suspended" during times of "rebellion or invasion."

"Neither rebellion nor invasion was occurring at the time the MCA was enacted," Robertson said, and Congress did not claim otherwise.

"Thus, the Great Writ has survived the Military Commissions Act," and any effort to block a person from going to court in this country "must be unconstitutional," the judge concluded.

The ruling clears the way for the Bush administration to go forward with a military trial of Hamdan. It is also likely to be the first of many decisions interpreting the new law.

Sens. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) and Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) also have announced they will seek to restore habeas rights for legal immigrants when the new Congress opens in January.

'04 Pentagon Report Cited Detention Concerns (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig

DOJ_NMG_0106199

A previously undisclosed Pentagon report concluded that the three terrorism suspects held at a brig in South Carolina were subjected to months of isolation, and it warned that their "unique" solitary confinement could be viewed as violating U.S. detention standards.

According to a summary of the 2004 report obtained by The Washington Post, interrogators attempted to deprive one detainee, Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri, a Qatari citizen and former student in Peoria, Ill., of sleep and religious comfort by taking away his Koran, warm food, mattresses and pillow as part of an interrogation plan approved by the high-level Joint Forces Command.

Interrogators also prevented the International Committee of the Red Cross from visiting at least one detainee, according to the report, which noted evidence of other unspecified, unauthorized interrogation techniques.

The report by the Navy's inspector general was presented to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld in May 2004 and was declassified in 2005. It was the first to raise the question of mistreatment of alleged enemy combatants inside the United States.

Its details about conditions at the Navy brig in 2004 could prove critical to the fate of two of the "enemy combatant" detainees who spent years in the prison: Marri, the only one of the three who remains there and is facing the prospect of a special military trial, and Jose Padilla, a Brooklyn-born U.S. citizen now facing criminal charges in Miami.

Attorneys for Padilla have argued in recent court filings that any abusive interrogation methods used on their client may mean that his statements to government agents were coerced and, therefore, inadmissible in his trial. He is accused of engaging in a conspiracy to kill U.S. citizens and provide material support to terrorists abroad.

The attorneys told a federal judge in Florida yesterday that they have a right to learn about those interrogation methods, and they recently sought to subpoena Brig. Gen. Daryl D. Thiessen, the deputy inspector general who made the findings after inspecting the brig, and other senior military officers who worked at the prison. The attorneys said Padilla spent 1,307 days in a 9-by-7-foot cell in an isolated unit, was often chained to the ground for hours by his wrists and torso, and was kept awake at night by guards using bright lights and loud noises.

Prosecutors asked the judge to quash the subpoenas, arguing that Padilla's attorneys are making "meritless" and "sensationalist" claims to turn the court's attention away from his alleged misconduct. In previous filings, the government decried the "absurdity of Padilla's assertion" that he was abused, noting that the government was "conscientious enough to tend to his toothache."

Marri remains at the brig awaiting an appeals court ruling on whether he will be tried in a U.S. court or by a military commission, as the government requested last month. He sued the government last year over the conditions of his confinement, alleging that for 16 months in 2003 and 2004, he had been barred from contact with anyone but guards delivering food, causing his mental state to deteriorate.

Thiessen wrote in his summary that the Joint Forces Command had approved that "one detainee in Charleston has Koran, mattress, and pillow removed and is fed cold MRES as part of interrogation plan." He also noted concerns about isolation: "Limited number and unique status of detainees in Charleston precludes interaction with other detainees. Argument could be made that this constitutes isolation."

Extended solitary confinement can be considered a form of inhumane treatment. In 2003, Rumsfeld specified the use of isolation as an interrogation tactic, but he cautioned that its use required detailed plans and approvals from superiors for the length of time. His memo warned that use of isolation for more than 30 days was atypical, and that nations that consider detainees subject to prisoner-of-war protections may view this technique as "inconsistent with the requirements of Geneva [Article] III."

"What you're describing confirms what we said in our complaint," said Jonathan Hafetz of the Brennan Center for Justice and an attorney for Marri, when asked to review the summary findings. "There were periods of time when al-Marri felt he was losing his mind. He went months without hearing a human voice. . . . And these weren't rogue officers, but it was part of a deliberate violation of the laws of the U.S. by the top levels of the administration."

Padilla's attorneys -- Orlando do Campo, Andrew Patel and Michael Caruso -- did not return calls seeking comment or declined to comment. Federal prosecutors also declined to comment. A hearing is expected soon on whether Padilla's attorneys can question military officials about his treatment and the conditions at the brig.

A Pentagon spokesman, Navy Cmdr. J.D. Gordon, said multiple reviews of detention operations have not found policies that condoned abuse and have led to more consistent policies to prevent abuse.

"The reviews have resulted in numerous recommendations which have been implemented and have improved our detention operations," he said. "The Department of Defense policy is clear: We treat detainees humanely."

Thiessen's report is part of a larger review by Vice Adm. Albert T. Church III, then the Navy's inspector general. Rumsfeld ordered the wide-ranging military investigation to determine whether any interrogation policy for terrorism suspects had caused detainee abuse in U.S. military detention facilities.

The Church report presented to Congress in March 2005 concluded that there was no deliberate high-level policy that led to the numerous cases of mistreatment. Instead, it blamed inept leadership at low levels and confusion over changing interrogation rules.

Church focused on the conditions for foreign nationals held at Guantanamo Bay. But the details of what Thiessen found in the Charleston brig were not mentioned. When asked, high-ranking military officers asserted that the brig fared well in the review.

"The brig here has a good record, and the people who run it are well trained," then-Secretary of the Navy Gordon England told reporters in 2004.

A third prisoner at the brig, Yaser Hamdi, was released in 2004 after the Supreme Court ruled that the government could not hold him indefinitely without a trial, and after he agreed to U.S. conditions that he go to Saudi Arabia and give up his U.S. citizenship.

Federal Judge Asked To Decide If Padilla Is Competent For Trial (NYT)

By Deborah Sontag

The New York Times, December 14, 2006

Saying that he was mentally damaged as a result of his three years and eight months in a naval brig in South Carolina, lawyers for Jose Padilla asked a federal judge in Miami yesterday to determine his competency to stand trial on terrorism conspiracy charges.

Mr. Padilla, 36, a United States citizen who was publicly accused of plotting a dirty bomb attack and pronounced an enemy combatant in 2002, was transferred from military custody into the civilian law enforcement system earlier this year. But, his lawyers say, he has been unable to assist in his own defense, and mental health experts have been unable to help him or to help them deal with him.

“Jose’s experience as a detainee was so traumatic that it’s physically and mentally painful for him to answer the questions that we put to him,” said Orlando do Campo, a federal public defender in Miami. “He just shuts down. We’re covering a lot of the same area as his interrogators, and he doesn’t want to relive it.”

Saying that there was “sufficient cause” to conduct a competency hearing, the government, in papers filed yesterday, urged the judge to do so.

The government itself cited the affidavit of a psychiatrist for the defense, Dr. Angela Hegarty, who said that Mr. Padilla did not understand the nature and consequences of the proceedings against him and that he suffered “impairment in reasoning” as a result of post-traumatic stress disorder “complicated by the effects of prolonged isolation.”

Mr. Padilla’s lawyers said he opposed this request that his competency be evaluated. Dr. Hegarty, one of two mental health professionals who examined him, said Mr. Padilla was “fearful of being thought of as crazy.” She described him as “hypervigilant,” his eyes darting about, his face twitching into grimaces, his “startle response” on constant high alert.

Mr. Padilla’s trial, which involves two other defendants also accused of running a “North American terror support cell,” is scheduled to start on Jan. 22 and expected to last about five months. Even before the motion filed yesterday, a delay seemed possible or even probable because of the extensive pretrial litigation in the complex case.

Now the issue of determining Mr. Padilla’s competency could freeze many matters. For instance, his lawyers have asked Judge Marcia G. Cooke of Federal District Court to dismiss the charges because of “pre-indictment delay” — Mr. Padilla was apprehended in May 2002 and indicted in November 2005 — because of failure to provide a speedy trial and because of "outrageous government conduct."

Judge Cooke set a hearing date for Monday to address these motions. But the government said yesterday that it would be pointless to discuss accusations of government misconduct based on Mr. Padilla's word if his competence was in question. The government vehemently denies that Mr. Padilla was mistreated in military custody.

Miami Terror Suspect Claims 'I Was Set Up' (CBS4)

(CBS4) MIAMI A South Florida contractor arrested by the FBI along with 6 others for allegedly conspiring to commit terrorist acts is giving his side of the case from behind bars. Narseal Batiste wrote a 25-page letter to CBS4's Brian Andrews, in which he says he and his group never had terrorist intentions. Insteadm he said he and his "followers" were looking for money for their Liberty City religious organization.

The FBI tailed Batiste and his followers for months, generating hours of video surveillance as they built their case against them, saying they conspired with what they thought was a known terrorist organization to blow up federal buildings and Chicago's Sears Tower.

"I want you to know that I never had any intentions of doing a terrorist act," Batiste now says in his letter. "My group and I never had reason to harm anyone."

Batiste writes the FBI put drugs in food he and co-defendants Patrick Abraham were served by the FBI informant the night a surveillance tape was shot, on which Batiste talks about blowing up the Sears Tower. He wrote that he's simply telling the informant what he wanted to hear, just so he could get money from him for their church.

"That's why you see me playing with tissue boxes talking about blowing up the Sears Tower. I made it up right then and there," he wrote.

On the surveillance tape he is heard talkng about the Tower's weaknesses and where he would plant dynamite to take it down. He's also heard telling the informant he would need horses for an army of men to wage a war on the government in the chaos that would follow such an attack.

"If you listen to the words I was saying, it's unrealistic, such as I need horses," he wrote.

Batiste says he and his group were desperate for money, and that last September, a convenience store owner from Yemen offered assistance. He says the North Miami Beach shopkeeper, whom Batiste identifies as Abbas, teamed up with the feds to get help for his own financial and immigration problems by concocting the lies that led to Batiste and six others being arrested.

"He played like he was going to help us fix our new headquarters, because he knew our intentions were to help our community," he said in the letter. "Abbas starting talking crazy like 'I want to get Bush to stop the war in Iraq and I want to blow up something.'"

Batiste says he thought nothing of it because people can talk a lot of trash.

"Little did I know that Abbas was setting my group up to look like terrorists," he said.

"He even convinced me to play along with his conversation between him and his big brother because they said it would build a relationship tie with them and it would open the door to financial help from them."

Batiste says he went along with it. "He knew we were eager for funding and that I went into great financial stress. So he suggested I meet a rich Arab friend: His uncle from Yemen."

That "uncle" ended up being the FBI's second informant on the case, whom the government claims was passing himself off as a part of al Qaeda. Batiste identified him as Mohammed Abdul. Prosecutors have video tape of Batiste and Abdul meeting at an airport hotel, in which Abdul appears to guide the conversation toward jihad.

"As you can tell, the man doing all the talking in Mohammed Abdul," he wrote. "I was surprised he was asking the questions that he did ask."

Batiste blames the enire case on the government's first cooperating witness, the North Miami Beach convenience store owner, who was compensated for his efforts in the case both in cash and in the form of immigration assistance.

"The Government never had any reason to investigate us. It was Abbas who planted this lie against me for the soul fact of him needing money." "The Government, desperate though to catch a terrorist, followed him and began designing a case against us with manipulation, fear, and intimidation."

Batiste agreed to an on-camera interview with Brian Andrews, but after three weeks of wrangling with the Bureau of Prisons, the interview request was denied. BOP Spokeswoman Mercedes Feliciano declined to give details as to why, referring CBS4 to Batiste's court-appointed lawyer. We left several messages for Attorney Ana Jhones, but she hasn't returned any calls we've made to her since she was assigned to handle Batiste's defense several months ago. Jhone's unsucessfully tried to get a court order to prevent CBS and WFOR from airing portions of FBI surveillance tapes Prosecutors plan to use when trial begins next September.

Man Denies Planning Sears Tower Attack (WP/AP)

The Associated Press

The Washington Post, December 14, 2006

MIAMI -- A man accused of planning to blow up Chicago's Sears Tower and several federal buildings said he was never going to stage a terrorist attack, a statement released Wednesday said.

Narseal Batiste made the claims in a 25-page statement that his wife hand-delivered to WFOR-CBS4, reporter Brian Andrews said.

"I want you to know that I never had any intentions of doing a terrorist act," Batiste said in the handwritten document. "My group and I had never had reason to harm anyone."

Batiste and six others were arrested in June and accused of conspiring to blow up the Sears Tower and government buildings in Miami, New York, Washington and elsewhere.

Authorities have said the group's plot never got beyond the planning stage and the men didn't acquire explosives or weapons for the attack.

Batiste said he only told an FBI informant posing as an al-Qaida operative he planned to blow up the Sears Towers because that's what he thought the man wanted to hear. Batiste said he was hoping to get money from the informant so he could help his organization, which he said was called the Universal Divine Saviours.

"I made it up right then and there," Batiste said. "If you listen to the words I was saying, it's unrealistic, such as I need horses."

Batiste also blames a convenience store owner from Yemen, who he says befriended him and later teamed up with the informants, feeding them lies to help his own financial and immigration problems.

Batiste and the six others have pleaded not guilty to a four-count terrorism conspiracy indictment and face trial in March.

Telephone messages left after hours for Batiste's attorney and prosecutors were not immediately returned.

Liberty City Seven Leader Says He's Innocent Of Terror Charges (MH)

By Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, December 14, 2006

The reputed ringleader of the Liberty City Seven -- a group of minority men busted last June on terror charges in Miami -- claims he's no terrorist.

"I want you to know that I never had any intentions of doing a terrorist act," Narseal Batiste wrote in a 26-page statement hand-delivered by his wife to WFOR-CBS4 on Wednesday.

``My group and I had never had reason to harm anyone."

Batiste, in custody at the Miami Federal Detention Center, claims his organization wanted to raise money for the homeless and help youths in the black community.

The FBI and U.S. attorney's office take a decidely different view of Batiste and his followers, who belonged to a local Moorish religious sect. Last June, they were arrested on charges of plotting to launch terrorist attacks against the United States -- including scheming to blow up the Sears Tower in Chicago and FBI buildings in five cities.

Secret FBI recordings revealed that the alleged Sears Tower scheme was Batiste's idea. "If I can put up a building," said Batiste, who worked in construction, ``then I should definitely know how to bring one down."

An FBI informant of Arabic descent, posing as an al Qaeda operative, then came up with a fictitious plot that would become the foundation of the government's terror conspiracy case against the seven men, according to court records. The informant, called "Mohammad," led Batiste and the six others in a bayat -- loyalty oath -- to al Qaeda. He pulled them in to the scheme to attack federal buildings by first asking them to provide video of the FBI field office in North Miami Beach.

Batiste, in the statement prepared for WFOR-CBS4 reporter Brian Andrews, claims the FBI and its informant were bent on ``setting us up."

Authorities have denied the accusation, which will be a key defense issue at the trial set for Sept. 4, 2007.

Authorities Probe Foreign Student Seeking Commercial Truck-Driving HAZMAT License (FoxNews.com)

By Liza Porteus

FOX News, December 13, 2006

NEW YORK — Mohammed Yusef Mullawala wanted a license to transport hazardous materials and to learn how to drive commercial tractor trailers. There was nothing unusual about that, until he told his teacher that he only wanted to learn how to drive forward, and he wanted to learn fast.

That was enough to raise a red flag with Darleen Crawford, president of the Nationwide Tractor Trailer Driving School in Smithfield, R.I., where Mullawala took driving classes.

Federal and state authorities are investigating why Mullawala was seeking a commercial trucking license after his behavior raised flags at the Rhode Island driving school. Crawford said he was also insistent on taking the test necessary to earn a license to transport hazardous materials.

Mullawala, a 28-year-old citizen of India who is of Pakistani descent, is now in federal custody in Massachusetts on immigration violation charges.

"We are still digging into his background, digging into where he lived in Rhode Island, New York and New Jersey," Major Steven O'Donnell with the Rhode Island State Police told FOXNews.com on Wednesday. "A lot of still doesn't make any sense, why he would be doing what he was doing."

Advertise Here Advertisements

Crawford said Mullawala came to the school with a Rhode Island driver's license inquiring how to obtain a commercial driver's license within a month. It normally takes around eight weeks for a student to go through all of the required courses before he or she obtains a permit, she said.

"We've been doing this for quite a long time and a lot of things just didn't add up," Crawford said.

Crawford started documenting suspicious activity: Mullawala lived in New York City but traveled to Rhode Island for the driving classes; he missed his first day of classes; and he was very insistent on getting his hazardous material transport license.

But the fact that he only seemed interested in driving forward was the most concerning.

"We tell them from Day One, 'you will be backing up,' 'you'll be backing up every single day,'" Crawford said, adding that it normally takes two to three weeks of practice backing up before drivers get road permits and learn how to drive forward, among other things.

The situation was reminiscent of when some of the Sept. 11, 2001, hijackers told their flight-school instructor they were only interested in how to fly planes at certain altitudes, not so much how to land or take off.

"He was just really pushing to get out of here," Crawford said. "I've been doing this for 30 years so you just sort of know when something doesn't feel right."

After Mullawala took two classes, Crawford contacted Highway Watch, which had conducted an anti-terrorism and safety program at her school.

Jim Sutton, director of the Highway Watch's Information Sharing and Analysis Center, said it was the "calibrated judgment" of his five-person staff of former military, national intelligence and security officers that caused them to pass Mullawala's information on to federal authorities.

"Over a period of time, you learn that certain indicators are very valid, that they just stand out," Sutton said. "They're so anomalous to the norm that you say to yourself, 'there is something here. We need to pursue, we need to follow up.'"

In Mullawala's case, Sutton said, "there was a sense of urgency he had in finishing the course."

"Well, you don't learn those type of mechanical skills very fast," he added.

The ISAC contacted the Department of Homeland Security, which contacted Rhode Island state police.

A joint investigation was then launched by investigators from the Rhode Island State Fusion Center, the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force (JTTF) in Rhode Island, New York and New Jersey and the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

Investigators learned that when Mullawala obtained his driver's license from the Rhode Island Registry of Motor Vehicles, he gave a false statement indicating he was a Rhode Island resident. ICE then determined he was a citizen of India and in the United States on an expired temporary student visa.

On Tuesday, Mullawala went to state police headquarters thinking he was responding to another matter. He was then apprehended and turned over to ICE.

He's being held in the federal Suffolk County detention center in Boston until his immigration hearing in Boston, which is expected to be sometime within the next few weeks. He will be charged with overstaying his visa and is facing possible deportation back to India.

O'Donnell said his department, as well as the New York and New Jersey JTTFs, are investigating Mullawala's background and the residences he had in those three states.

Authorities have not yet turned up the names of any other specific individuals Mullawala may have been conspiring with.

"He didn't have family, he did have friends," O'Donnell said, adding that authorities are trying to track down people Mullawala was associated with in New York, where his most recent address is located.

That address is 161 84th Road in Jamaica, Queens, according to Rhode Island police. He also has a residence on Carpenter Street in Providence, R.I., which he apparently hasn't lived at since 2003.

Police are also studying a computer taken from one of Mullawala's residence, O'Donnell said, adding that the man apparently was a computer expert. They will look at his e-mails, as well as any Web sites he frequented. Any potential overseas connections will be handled by the FBI and DHS, O'Donnell said, although none have yet turned up.

An official at the New York JTTF office contacted by FOXNews.com said he could not comment on the status of this or any ongoing investigation.

More than 500,000 transportation workers — including school-bus drivers to mass transit workers — call in tips as part of the Highway Watch program, said spokesman John Willard. The Highway Watch ISAC vets the calls to determine which ones are substantial enough to pass on to federal authorities.

"We get a few hundred [calls] a month," Willard said. "They range from anything from 'there's a guy in his car on the side of a road' ... to 'I'm witnessing a crime' ... to 'there's this person who seems suspicious.'"

He added: "We've gotten a few of those we believe have led to very credible investigations."

DOJ_NMG_0106205

The Highway Watch ISAC was first established by DHS in March of 2004. The original Highway Watch was set up in 1998 as a safety program and run by the American Trucking Association up until 2004. It added an anti-terrorism and security training program in the spring of 2002, which almost every major trucking company in the United States is now mandating for their drivers, Willard said.

The course teaches drivers how to keep themselves safe by always keeping their trucks locked, and not keeping the vehicles running when they're not in them. It also provides various emergency contact and tipline numbers.

But it also tells people what kinds of activity to be on the alert for.

"Casing," for example, can include activities such as an individual inquiring about details, of hazardous material deliveries. There was one situation in Florida where a man was seen videotaping hazardous material dropoffs, Willard said.

"We talk to them about how a typical terrorist act is carried out," he added. "Terrorists typically don't wake up on Tuesday morning and blow something up on Tuesday afternoon. It normally goes through an extensive process of targeting, casing, etc… The first thing we do is make drivers aware of that process."

BEWARE OF ILLEGAL ALIENS SEEKING HAZMAT LICENSES Wed Dec 13, 5:47 AM ET

What's the harm in allowing illegal aliens to have driver's licenses? After all, they're just all here innocently doing the jobs Americans won't do, right? And since they're already here, we might as well let them drive legally, right? We'll all be safer, right?

Wrong. Wrong. Wrong.

Driver's licenses are tickets into the American mainstream. They allow residents to establish an identity and foothold into their communities. They help you open bank accounts, enter secure facilities, board planes -- and drive tractor-trailers carrying hazardous materials.

But there aren't any illegal aliens out there who would use fraudulently obtained driver's licenses to threaten Americans, right? That's just xenophobic scare-mongering, right?

Wrong again.

Last week, law enforcement officials arrested an illegal alien enrolled at a Smithfield, R.I., tractor-trailer training school who was trying to obtain a commercial driver's license and permit to haul hazardous materials. Not many people paid attention. You should. Illegal alien Mohammed Yusef Mullawala, 28, of Jamaica, N.Y., had obtained driver's licenses from New York, New Jersey and Rhode Island. He was reportedly in a hurry to get a commercial driver's license and a permit to haul hazardous cargo.

Because he's just so passionate about the job, right? Yeah.

A joint investigation was initiated by investigators from the Rhode Island State Fusion Center, the Federal Bureau of Investigation Joint Terrorism Task Force in Rhode Island, New York & New Jersey, and the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement after driver's school officials became concerned about his suspicious behavior. "His behavior was consistent with terrorist-type activity," Maj. Steve O'Donnell of the Rhode Island state police told the press. "He showed no interest in learning the fine art of driving a tractor-trailer. He had no interest in learning how to back up." Sort of like learning how to steer a plane, but not take off or land.

As in several other cases since 9/11, it was alert private citizens who notified the Department of SEARCH

News | News Photos | Images | Web" /> Homeland Security of Mullawala's suspicious behavior. (They will no doubt be labeled Islamophobes and bigots by the usual grievance-mongering mob.)

And once again, it was enforcement of immigration laws that played a critical role in detaining him. Like some of the 9/11 hijackers and several al Qaeda operatives identified in the United States over the past decade, Mullawala was here on a temporary student visa that he had overstayed.

Must I remind you that the 9/11 hijackers obtained some 364 separate pieces of identification, including driver's licenses, in order to conduct their murderous business? Hijackers Hani Hanjour and Khalid Almihdhar conspired with illegal alien day laborers at a Falls Church, Va., 7-Eleven to obtain government-issued photo IDs. Three other hijackers obtained IDs at an Arlington, Va., DMV.

Terrorist truck bombs have killed hundreds of Americans in Beirut, at the Khobar Towers, and SEARCH

News | News Photos | Images | Web" /> Iraq. For the operatives behind the wheel, a license to drive is a license to kill. Over the past two years, the SEARCH

News | News Photos | Images | Web" /> FBI has put law enforcement officials on high alert for U.S.-based operatives connected to al Qaeda who may be in possession of commercial driver's licenses and may be planning to use truck bombs.

In Boston, suspected al Qaeda agent and illegal alien Nabil al-Marabh obtained a license permitting him to drive semi-trucks containing hazardous materials, including explosives and caustic materials.

In Minneapolis, suspected al Qaeda operative Mohamad Elzahabi, who obtained a green card through a fake marriage, was able to obtain a commercial driver's license to drive a school bus and to haul hazardous materials -- despite FBI knowledge that Elzahabi had been tied to terrorism.

Earlier this year, more than 200 Somalian and Bosnian immigrants illegally obtained Missouri commercial driver's licenses or certifications to handle hazardous materials through a West Plains truck-driving school that had a contract with the state, according to federal prosecutors. In just a few short weeks, Democrats led by Nancy Pelosi -- a staunch opponent of strengthened ID laws and strict immigration enforcement -- will reassume power in Washington. An open borders-friendly White House has expressed willingness to deal with them. So we know who supports illegal alien workers and potential terrorist drivers waiting for amnesty. But who will stand up for us?

WAR NEWS:

Bush Warns He Won't Be Rushed On Plans For Iraq (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel And Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush on Wednesday defended his decision to put off his widely anticipated shift in Iraq policy until early next year, saying he wanted his new Defense secretary to weigh in and warning he would not be rushed into making a decision on how to proceed.

As part of his review, Bush held another round of discussions with senior officials involved in Iraq planning, this time meeting the Joint Chiefs of Staff at the Pentagon, along with outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and his successor, former CIA Director Robert M. Gates.

Although Bush declined to comment on the advice he received from the military leaders, Pentagon officials have said in recent days that top uniformed officers largely have rejected recommendations made by the Iraq Study Group to withdraw most combat forces over the next 15 months, a rejection Bush appeared to agree with.

Instead, many military commanders have voiced support for a sharp increase in troops as part of a last-ditch effort to restore order, a suggestion Bush has not rejected.

"I've heard some ideas that would lead to defeat," Bush said of his monthlong consultation process. "I reject those ideas — ideas such as leaving before the job is done, ideas such as not helping this [Iraqi] government take the necessary and hard steps to be able to do its job."

A surge in troops?

Speaking after the 90-minute meeting in the Joint Chiefs' secure conference room known as "the tank," Bush denied that his views amounted to a rejection of the Iraq Study Group report. But he warned that any sign of U.S. weakness in Iraq would undermine moderate Arab allies in the region and could allow extremists to control crucial oil reserves.

"If we lose our nerve, if we're not steadfast in our determination to help the Iraqi government succeed, we will be handing Iraq over to an enemy that would do us harm," Bush said.

The president's dismissal of any near-term reduction in U.S. troop strength has raised the prospect that he might embrace a surge in the number of American forces in Iraq, at least over a period of a few months.

A troop increase has been opposed by Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, commander of U.S. forces in the Middle East, but it has been embraced by a growing number of military advisors inside and outside the Pentagon, several of whom have pressed the case to Bush in recent weeks.

That group may be joined today by retired Army Gen. John Keane, an influential former vice chief of staff who met with Bush earlier in the week. Keane is to appear at the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative Washington think tank, to present a plan for a troop increase that was developed by think tank military analyst Frederick W. Kagan.

According to the think tank, other influential current and former military leaders contributed to the report, including retired Lt. Gen. David W. Barno, former commander of U.S. forces in Afghanistan. Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), the incoming chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, continued to press Bush to begin a withdrawal to send a clear signal to the Iraqi government that U.S. troop commitment was not open-ended.

He added, however, that he did not see Bush's delay in deciding on a new way forward as a mistake.

"I'd rather the right conclusion be reached in January than the wrong conclusion be reached in December," Levin told reporters after a speech at the Brookings Institution in Washington.

Democrats have been more receptive to recommendations of the Iraq Study Group, led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), which included a push to reach out to Iraq's meddlesome neighbors, Syria and Iran.

Sen. Bill Nelson (D-Fla.), a member of the Armed Services and Foreign Relation committees, met on Wednesday with Syrian President Bashar Assad in Damascus. After the meeting, Nelson said Assad had "clearly indicated a willingness to cooperate" in securing Syria's border with Iraq, the Associated Press reported.

Bush has resisted negotiations with either country, citing their support for Iraqi insurgents and the Hezbollah militia in Lebanon.

Talks with Kurdish leaders

Bush on Wednesday also talked by telephone to Iraq's two most prominent Kurdish leaders, Iraqi President Jalal Talabani and Massoud Barzani, president of Iraq's Kurdish provinces, to explore the possibility of forming a coalition of moderates within the Iraqi parliament.

Administration officials have suggested such a move as a way of marginalizing Shiites loyal to radical cleric Muqtada Sadr and Sunni groups with links to the insurgency.

Advocates see the strategy as a way to free the hand of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki, who remains reliant on Sadr's allies for his political base.

Bush appeared to support such an initiative Wednesday. "These men have been outspoken about the desire to have a moderate governing coalition, which we support," he said of his conversation with the Kurdish leaders.

U.S. and Iraqi officials have acknowledged such a plan is still under consideration, but it faces significant hurdles, including a backlash from Sadr, whose Al Mahdi army is the most formidable Shiite militia in Iraq. In addition, officials said, it could be opposed by Iraq's most influential religious leader, Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, who has urged all Shiite leaders to stick together.

Bush: I Won't Be Rushed On Iraq (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, December 14, 2006

President Bush said Wednesday he would "not be rushed" into a decision on a strategy change for Iraq, saying that in a round of consultations he heard both some interesting ideas and some "ideas that would lead to defeat."

"And I reject those ideas," Bush said after meeting with top generals and Defense Department officials at the Pentagon. He said those ideas included "leaving before the job is done, ideas such as not helping this (Iraqi) government take the necessary and hard steps to be able to do its job."

Bush spoke with reporters after wrapping up a round of high-level talks on revising his Iraq war policy. Earlier he spoke by telephone with two Kurdish leaders in Iraq as part of what the White House called efforts to forge a "moderate bloc" behind the shaky central government in Baghdad.

Standing with the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Bush said he and the nation's top military commanders had "a very candid and fruitful discussion about how to secure this country and about how to win a war that we now find ourselves in."

Bush made it clear that "there has been a lot of violence in Iraq. The violence has been horrific."

Although the White House had initially suggested that Bush would deliver his speech on Iraq strategy before Christmas, he has decided to delay it until early next year.

Defending that decision, Bush said, "I will not be rushed into making a difficult decision ... a necessary decision."

Joined by Vice President Dick Cheney, incoming Defense Secretary Robert Gates and outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, Bush met with the military leaders and other members of his national security team at the Pentagon, where war commanders are calling for more U.S. trainers and equipment for beleaguered Iraqi forces.

He addressed some of his remarks to members of the nation's military, including some 140,000 now stationed in Iraq. "I appreciate their sacrifices, and I want them to know I'm focused on developing a strategy that will help them achieve their mission," the president said.

"I know there is a lot of debate at home, and our troops pay attention to that debate," Bush said. Directing his remarks to the troops, he said: "It means I'm listening to a lot of advice to develop a strategy to help you succeed."

Bush's meeting at the Pentagon lasted more than 90 minutes.

Bush said part of the reason for his putting off his speech to next year was to allow Gates to familiarize himself with the top defense job "and be part of this debate."

"At the appropriate time, I'll stand up in front of the nation and say, `here's where we're headed,'" Bush said.

Bush pledged anew to work with the Democratic-controlled Congress that convenes in January "to forge greater bipartisan consensus" on Iraq policy.

Asked by a reporter if recommendations made a week ago by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group included some of the bad advice he had cited, Bush said that his opinion of the report "hasn't changed."

"I thought it was interesting that Republicans and Democrats could work in concert to help achieve an objective," Bush said. The panel was headed by former Republican Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton, D-Ind.

On Tuesday, in similar discussions with field commanders, Bush heard Gen. John Abizaid, top U.S. commander in the Middle East, and Gen. George Casey, the top general in Iraq, ask the administration to pour increased funding into more armored vehicles, body armor and other critical equipment for the Iraqis, said a defense specialist familiar with the meetings. The source requested anonymity because the discussions were private.

Abizaid has told the Senate Armed Services Committee that troop levels in Iraq need to stay fairly stable and the use of military adviser teams expanded. About 140,000 U.S. troops and about 5,000 advisers are in Iraq.

The message to Bush, the defense specialist said, is that the U.S. cannot withdraw a substantial number of combat troops by early 2008, as suggested by the independent commission on Iraq, because the Iraqis will not be ready to assume control of their country.

Iraqi leaders, meanwhile, last month presented Bush with a plan for its troops to assume primary responsibility for security in Baghdad early next year and that U.S. troops be shifted to the capital's periphery, The New York Times reported on its Web site Tuesday night.

Bush already has visited this week with State Department officials to review options, hosted a few outside Iraq experts, and met with Iraq's Sunni vice president, Tariq al-Hashemi. Last week, the president held talks with the leader of the largest Shiite bloc in Iraq's parliament, Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, and with British Prime Minister Tony Blair, the president's staunchest war ally.

On Wednesday, Bush placed calls to Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, and Massoud Barzani, president of the Kurdish region.

Bush's discussions across Iraq's ethnic and religious lines come as major partners in the country's governing coalition are in behind-the-scenes talks to form a new parliamentary bloc and sideline supporters of the radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, a vehement opponent of the U.S. military presence and the main patron of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. There is discontent in Iraq and within the Bush administration over al-Maliki's failure to rein in Shiite militias and quell raging violence.

President Bush Offers New Clues On His Plans For Iraq (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson

McClatchy Newspapers, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON - Acknowledging that "our enemy is far from being defeated," President Bush assured U.S. troops Wednesday that he would come up with a better plan for victory in Iraq.

"I've heard some ideas that would lead to defeat, and I reject those ideas - ideas such as leaving before the job is done," Bush said after a Pentagon briefing. "We're not going to give up. The stakes are too high and the consequences too grave to turn Iraq over to extremists."

The president's comments offered clues to his thinking as he prepares to announce a revised policy for Iraq early next month. He said he's looking for a plan that combines military action, political reconciliation, economic development and diplomatic efforts to get more help from Iraq's regional neighbors.

The resolute tone of his remarks may have delivered his clearest message: Standing with the Joint Chiefs of Staff at the Pentagon, Bush assured U.S. troops that he has no intention of leaving Iraq until they finish the job of establishing a stable democracy.

Speaking directly to the troops, he declared his "unshakable commitment" to his goals for Iraq. "We're going to give you the tools necessary to succeed," he said, "and a strategy to help you succeed."

That was in stark contrast to the tone of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group's report, unveiled last week. Its opening words: "The situation in Iraq is grave and deteriorating."

The panel said most U.S. combat troops could be out of Iraq by early 2008, and it urged Bush to make Iraqis responsible for their security as soon as possible.

Although Bush said he found "some good ideas" in the Iraq Study Group's recommendations, his analysis differed from the panel's findings.

Bush described a fight pitting allied U.S. and Iraqi forces against "the enemy" - which he defined at one point as "terrorists and insurgents and death-squad leaders." The study group said U.S. troops face a complex mix of spreading sectarian violence between Shiite and Sunni Muslim Iraqis; anti-American insurgents; and a relatively small number of al-Qaida terrorists.

The group's report also made clear that sectarian militiamen have infiltrated Iraq's military and police units and that many soldiers and police are more loyal to radical clerics than to the central Iraqi government.

The next chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee sided with the study group on Wednesday.

"Nothing will get the attention of the Iraqi leaders like the prospect of some American troops leaving Iraq," Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., said in a speech endorsing the study group's approach. "When they finally understand that our military presence in Iraq is neither permanent nor unconditional, they are far more likely to take the political steps necessary to deal with sectarian violence and to defeat the insurgency."

Levin will chair the Armed Services panel when Democrats take control of Congress next month. He favors a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops beginning in four to six months.

Bush didn't address reports that his military advisers are considering proposals to send as many as 20,000 more U.S. troops to Iraq to help train Iraqi security forces. The study group said a surge of advisers to join the 140,000 troops already in Iraq could help clear the way for withdrawal.

"I've heard interesting ideas," Bush said. "At the appropriate time, I will stand up in front of the nation and say, `Here's where we're headed.'"

The president said he's working to push Iraq's government to forge political reconciliation among the rival groups splintering the country.

"It's my job to convince the al-Maliki government to make the hard decisions necessary to move the country forward," Bush said, referring to Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. "But the good news is, he agrees."

Bush said he'd placed phone calls Wednesday to two Iraqi Kurdish leaders, pressing the same goal. He said he'd continue to press friendly regional governments in Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Jordan and Turkey to use their influence on Iraq's behalf. He and his advisers have rejected the study group's recommendations for direct talks with Syria and Iran.

Bush dismissed calls for fast action on delivering a new strategy. He'd hoped to announce his plans next week but pushed back his speech until early next year. He's been consulting widely and said he wants his new secretary of defense, Robert Gates, to participate in the policy review. Gates will be sworn in on Monday.

"I will be delivering my plans after a long deliberation, after steady deliberation," the president said. "I'm not going to be rushed into a difficult decision."

Bush Consults With Pentagon On Iraq (NYT)

By David Stout

The New York Times, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 13 -- President Bush said today that he would not be “rushed” into deciding on a new course of action in Iraq, and that United States troops would not leave the country “before the job is done” and Iraq is free and stable.

“We’re not going to give up,” Mr. Bush said at the Pentagon, after discussing the Iraq situation with senior Defense Department officials and military leaders. “The stakes are too high, and the consequences too great.”

While Mr. Bush said he and the Pentagon leaders had discussed "how to win a war that we now find ourselves in," he avoided using the term "victory" and referred instead to devising "a strategy to succeed" and an approach to help American troops in Iraq "achieve their mission."

In vowing that he would not be hurried, the president said he will announce his plans after "a long deliberation." He also sounded themes he has articulated for many months. Mr. Bush asserted, for example, that a free and stable Iraq will be an example to other countries and peoples in the Middle East and an ally of the United States in the campaign against extremists. And he said he envisioned an Iraq that is self-sustaining, self-governing and able to defend itself.

With members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff behind him, Mr. Bush said he had a message for the men and women of the United States who are in Iraq. "I'm listening to a lot of advice to develop a strategy to help you succeed," Mr. Bush said. "You have my unshakeable commitment."

He also said he was open to new ideas, including some outlined by the Iraq Study Group, which urged a change of course in Iraq.

Mr. Bush said he was confident that Iraq's Prime Minister, Kamal al-Maliki, wants his country to be politically unified, and that the great task facing his government and Washington involves a diplomatic campaign as well as a military one.

The president is to spell out a new strategy for Iraq in early January. For today, he was deliberately vague -- the better, he said, to keep getting valuable, interesting advice.

And while Mr. Bush pledged to work with the new, Democratic-controlled Congress on Iraq, he warned that to leave Iraq precipitously would be to hand that country over to "an enemy that would do us harm," an enemy whose deadliness was demonstrated on Sept. 11, 2001.

But that will only happen, he said, "if we lose our nerve, if we're not steadfast in our determination."

Joint Chiefs Advise Change In War Strategy (WP)

By Robin Wright And Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, December 14, 2006

The nation's top uniformed leaders are recommending that the United States change its main military mission in Iraq from combating insurgents to supporting Iraqi troops and hunting terrorists, said sources familiar with the White House's ongoing Iraq policy review.

President Bush and Vice President Cheney met with the members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff yesterday at the Pentagon for more than an hour, and the president engaged his top military advisers on different options. The chiefs made no dramatic proposals but, at a time of intensifying national debate about how to solve the Iraq crisis, offered a pragmatic assessment of what can and cannot be done by the military, the sources said.

The chiefs do not favor adding significant numbers of troops to Iraq, said sources familiar with their thinking, but see strengthening the Iraqi army as pivotal to achieving some degree of stability. They also are pressing for a much greater U.S. effort on economic reconstruction and political reconciliation.

Sources said that Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top U.S. commander in Iraq, is reviewing a plan to redefine the American military mission there: U.S. troops would be pulled out of Iraqi cities and consolidated at a handful of U.S. bases while day-to-day combat duty would be turned over to the Iraqi army. Casey is still considering whether to request more troops, possibly as part of an expanded training mission to help strengthen the Iraqi army.

The recommendations Casey is reviewing to overhaul the military mission were formulated by Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, the outgoing top U.S. ground commander, officials said. The plan positions the U.S. military to be able to move swiftly to a new focus on training, one of the key recommendations from several reviews of U.S. strategy, including from the bipartisan Iraq Study Group.

Under the plan developed by Chiarelli's staff, the military would shift about half of its 15 combat brigades away from battling insurgents and sectarian violence and into training Iraqi security forces as soon as the spring of 2007, military and defense officials said. In northern and western Iraq, U.S. commanders are already moving troops out of combat missions to place them as advisers with lower-level Iraqi army units, Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, spokesman for the military in Iraq, said yesterday at a briefing in Baghdad.

Administration officials stressed that Bush, under pressure from Congress and the electorate to abandon the United States' open-ended commitment, has made no final decisions on how to proceed in Iraq. But the new disclosures suggest that military planning is well underway for a major change from an approach that has assigned the bulk of responsibility for security in Iraq to more than 140,000 U.S. troops.

The chiefs also want to see a new push on political and economic issues, especially employment programs, reconstruction and political reconciliation, to help quell the problems that have fueled both the Sunni insurgency and Shiite-Sunni sectarian strife, say defense officials and U.S. military officers in Iraq. A new jobs program is considered key to pulling young men from the burgeoning militias.

Pentagon chiefs think that there is no purely military solution for Iraq and that, without major progress on the political and economic fronts, the U.S. intervention is simply buying time, the sources said. They particularly want to see U.S. pressure on the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to offer amnesty to Sunni insurgents, approve constitutional amendments promised to the Sunni minority, pass laws to ensure equitable distribution of oil revenue, and modify the ban on members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party taking government positions.

Bush alluded to this proposition when he met briefly with reporters after his meeting at the Pentagon. "Our military cannot do this job alone," he said. "Our military needs a political strategy that is effective."

But Bush also showed no sign that he is retreating from his basic proposition that the U.S. military must be engaged in Iraq for some time. "If we lose our nerve, if we're not steadfast in our determination to help the Iraqi government succeed, we will be handing Iraq over to an enemy that would do us harm," he said, adding that he would not be "rushed" into a decision.

Bush has been intensely involved with reviewing his options on Iraq this week, meeting on Monday with officials at the State Department and talking by videoconference on Tuesday with his commanders in Iraq. One senior administration official said last night that the situation is "fluid" and described Bush as especially mindful of the need to integrate military and political strategies.

But as the sources described yesterday, the military planning in both Washington and Baghdad is far along, in some ways tracking the ideas presented last week by the Iraq Study Group, led by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former U.S. representative Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), for instance in the emphasis on reshaping the U.S. military mission to focus on training and advising.

Thousands of U.S. combat troops in Iraq would become embedded advisers with Iraqi security forces. About 4,000 U.S. troops are now serving on 11-person military training teams embedded with Iraqi forces. The new plan would add 30 troops to each team, allowing them to provide supervision and mentoring down to the level of Iraqi army companies -- a step seen as critical to bolstering Iraqi units and preventing sectarian violence.

Meanwhile, the remaining seven to eight brigades of U.S. combat forces would focus on three core missions: striking al-Qaeda, strengthening security along Iraq's borders, and protecting major highways and other routes to ensure U.S. forces freedom of movement in Iraq.

The plan would not allow for any major reduction in U.S. troops in Iraq over the next year -- nor would it call for any surge in troops, as some, such as Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), have advocated.

The Pentagon chiefs also are urging that any new strategy be sensitive to regional context, particularly the impact of political or military decisions. They are concerned that any decision to effectively throw U.S. support to the Shiite majority may lead Sunni governments in the region to take a more active role in supporting Sunni insurgents. But they are also concerned that a crackdown on Iraq's largest Shiite militia, the Mahdi army, may have repercussions on Iran's actions in Iraq, say officials familiar with the ongoing review.

A constant subtext in the meeting yesterday, and in the ongoing White House review, is the Joint Chiefs' growing concern about the erosion of the U.S. military's ability to deal with other crises around the world because of the heavy commitment in Iraq and the stress on troops and equipment, said officials familiar with the review. The chiefs planned to tell Bush of the significantly increased risk to readiness in the event of a new emergency, rather than push for a timeline to leave Iraq.

Staff writers Michael Abramowitz, Thomas E. Ricks and Josh White contributed to this report.

Redeploy Troops In Iraq Soon, Brass Say (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — A proposal developed by top U.S. commanders in Iraq would significantly redeploy troops from a combat role to training and advising Iraqi forces, according to four administration officials.

The proposal, requested by Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. military official in Iraq, calls for changing the mission during the next several months, said the officials.

All requested anonymity because they are not authorized to speak publicly about the proposal.

This is "one of many plans" President Bush is considering as he weighs a new strategy for the war, said one of the officials, who works at the White House.

Bush was briefed Tuesday by Casey and Casey's boss, Central Command chief Gen. John Abizaid. Bush, who still must approve the proposal, met at the Pentagon on Wednesday with other top commanders.

Details of the redeployment proposal were provided by one official, and its general outline was confirmed by three others. Highlights include:

• Change the mission for an undetermined number of the 15 U.S. brigade combat teams currently in Iraq by March 2007. Troops in those brigades, which number about 3,000 each, would embed with Iraqi units.

The plan would dramatically increase the size of those teams from the current 12 troops per Iraqi unit.

•Redeploy the remaining combat brigades as quick-reaction forces to fight insurgents, perform border security and secure lines of communication.

•Dramatically reduce the number of U.S. operating bases. Now there are 50.

The plan depends on conditions in Iraq, including the Iraqi army's ability to run combat operations.

Some of the plan's elements resemble those proposed last week by the Iraq Study Group created by Congress. The group's recommendations included removing U.S. combat forces by early 2008; remaining troops would be embedded with Iraqi forces in a training role or serve in rapid-response teams.

Flanked by Vice President Cheney, incoming Defense Secretary Robert Gates and outgoing Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, Bush said Wednesday that he would "not be rushed" into a new strategy for Iraq.

During consultations with military, political and Iraqi leaders, Bush said he heard interesting ideas and some "ideas that would lead to defeat.

"And I reject those ideas," including leaving "before the job is done" and not helping the fledgling Iraqi government, Bush said.

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has asked Bush to let Iraq take the lead in securing Baghdad next year.

Worsening conditions in Iraq leave the Pentagon two defensible options, said Stephen Biddle, a military expert at the Council on Foreign Relations. It can either increase the number of U.S. forces to provide security and protect troops training the Iraqi army or withdraw troops immediately, he said.

Adding troops would be expensive, Biddle said. Turning combat troops into trainers could embolden insurgents, he said.

Also, the Pentagon doesn't have enough special operations troops who specialize in training military forces in other countries, said Kalev Sepp, an assistant professor at the Naval Postgraduate School.

"We have to look for ways to accelerate the training of advisers," said Sepp, a former Army Special Forces officer.

"What we're looking at is a menu of bad choices," Biddle said.

War-Weary Public Wants Congress To Lead (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Falling public support for the war in Iraq has weakened President Bush's political hand across the board, bolstering the clout of the new Democratic Congress as it prepares to take power.

DOJ_NMG_0106214

A new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll1 shows Americans have grown more pessimistic after the Iraq Study Group report that the situation there has become "dire." That contributed to Mr. Bush's lowest-ever approval rating in the Journal/NBC poll -- 34% -- and turned Americans toward his Democratic adversaries. By 59% to 21%, Americans say Congress rather than Mr. Bush should take the lead in setting policy for the nation. Nearly a year ago, when Republicans controlled Congress, Americans wanted Capitol Hill to take the lead, 49% to 25% over Mr. Bush.

"For the president, Iraq is everything," says Peter Hart, the Democratic pollster who helps conduct the Journal/NBC survey. "Until he's able to do something different on Iraq, he will have little or no leverage with the general public."

IN THE POLLS

• Graphic: Bush's approval ratings across multiple polls2

• See poll results3. (Adobe Acrobat required4)

The results show "a presidency that's been whittled down to its ultimate core," adds Mr. Hart's Republican counterpart, Bill McInturff, as even three in 10 Republicans want Congress to lead on national policy. The telephone survey of 1,006 adults, conducted Dec. 8 to Dec. 11, carries a margin of error of 3.1 percentage points.

Mr. Bush's lost standing has ramifications across the political landscape. Seven in 10 say they want the new Congress to pressure the White House to begin bringing troops home within six months.

At the same time, items on the Democrats' opening agenda for Congress enjoy strong initial backing. More than seven in 10 Americans support raising the minimum wage -- on which Mr. Bush has indicated flexibility -- and forcing the federal government to negotiate lower Medicare drug prices with pharmaceuticals companies -- which Mr. Bush opposes.

The president faces a steeper challenge resisting Democratic initiatives on other economic issues. On energy, 80% favor forcing auto makers to build more fuel-efficient vehicles even if that raises prices; 59% back eliminating tax cuts for oil companies.

On trade, 61% say the U.S. government isn't being tough in economic negotiations with China. With anxiety over lost U.S. manufacturing jobs spurring protectionist moves on Capitol Hill, that underscores the political heat on Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson to deliver results in the "Strategic Economic Dialogue" that opens today in Beijing.

Americans are looking to Capitol Hill for leadership by an even wider margin than they did after Republicans captured both houses of Congress in 1994 and confronted President Clinton. To be sure, Mr. Clinton's subsequent political victories and re-election to a second term showed an embattled president can turn his fortunes around.

But for now Mr. Bush's political woes represent a burden for his party. Some 59% of Americans, for example, say they would consider service in Mr. Bush's Cabinet discomfiting in a 2008 presidential contender, outpacing the 38% who say it would make them comfortable or enthusiastic.

One positive for the president's party: Its leading 2008 candidates enjoy independent reputations. Among Republicans, the poll shows, former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani tops the field with 34% supporting him. Sen. John McCain of Arizona, who battled Mr. Bush in 2000 primaries and is considered more certain to run, draws 29%. Both are far ahead of other Republican aspirants including former House Speaker Newt Gingrich (10%) and departing Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (8%).

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York continues to hold a solid lead over potential 2008 Democratic candidates, with 37%. But Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, an African-American whose charisma and calls for consensus-building have created a political sensation, has moved into second place with 18%. In the process he passed both halves of the Democrats' 2004 national ticket: Vice presidential nominee John Edwards draws 14%, while Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry receives 11%.

In potential general-election matchups, Mr. McCain leads Mrs. Clinton by 47% to 43% and Mr. Obama by 43% to 38%. One encouraging note for Mr. Edwards -- eclipsed lately by Mr. Obama -- is the poll's finding that the former North Carolina senator leads Mr. McCain by 43% to 41% due to solid appeal among independents.

The Democrats' momentum from midterms elections continued this week with Ciro Rodriguez's surprise victory Tuesday over longtime Republican incumbent Henry Bonilla for a Texas U.S. House seat. That leaves Democrats with a midterm election gain of 30 seats and a 233-202 House majority.

Messrs. Hart and McInturff, the pollsters, caution that big political winners sometimes receive postelection surges of public support that dissipate. Yet a month after Election Day, deteriorating attitudes on Iraq continue to fuel calls for change.

Just 19% of Americans now describe themselves as "more confident" the war will end successfully, and only 16% favor continued use of U.S. troops in all aspects of the war. Just one in four Americans believe there is anything more the U.S. can do to quell violence among Iraq's ethnic and religious groups; 65% say the U.S. is already doing all it can.

Americans express ambivalence about the Iraq Study Group's report itself, as 49% say they don't know enough about it. But they evince considerable support for its substantive recommendations; eight in 10 want U.S. troops either redeployed to secure bases to focus on training Iraqis, or removed from Iraq in a phased withdrawal beginning immediately.

Those findings reflect pressure on Mr. Bush to begin winding down the war as he enters the final two years of his presidency. By 3-to-1, Americans disapprove of the president's handling of the war. Similar pessimism among Americans on the subject was reported in a Washington Post-ABC News poll and a CBS News survey.

At least publicly, however, the president continues to project unwavering determination as he consults advisers inside and outside the administration on what he calls "a new way forward." After meeting at the Pentagon yesterday with senior military leaders, Mr. Bush said he has heard "ideas that would lead to defeat ... and I reject those ideas." Among them, he added, are "leaving before the job is done."

New Congress Is More Trusted Than President (WP)

By Charles Babington And Jon Cohen

The Washington Post, December 14, 2006

Americans trust Democratic lawmakers more than President Bush to handle the nation's toughest problems, including the Iraq war, and a quarter of Republicans are glad that Democrats have won control of Congress, a Washington Post-ABC News poll finds.

At the same time, however, most Americans want lawmakers and the president to work together rather than pursue separate agendas. They also have modest hopes about how much the new Congress will be able to accomplish.

The degree to which congressional leaders can sustain and capitalize on initial goodwill is questionable, because the No. 1 issue for most Americans is perhaps the most difficult for Congress and the White House: Iraq. Forty-four percent of respondents said the Iraq war is the most important problem facing the government, easily eclipsing the economy -- the top concern for 10 percent -- and health care, No. 1 for 6 percent.

Asked whether they trusted Bush or Democrats in Congress "to do a better job coping with the main problems the nation faces," 57 percent of the respondents said congressional Democrats and 31 percent said Bush. When the question was broken down to specific problems, such as Iraq, the economy, immigration and the "war on terrorism," Democrats held clear majorities over Bush. Their lead was overwhelming in the area of health care: 64 percent to Bush's 26 percent.

More than half of the respondents said it was a good thing that Congress will switch from Republican control to Democratic; 17 percent called it a bad thing and 1 in 4 said it would make no difference. Shortly after Republicans took over Congress after the 1994 election, 48 percent of Americans said the switch was a good thing.

In the poll, more than 4 in 5 Democrats said the latest change in control of Congress is good, as did 55 percent of independents. Even 23 percent of Republicans called the change a good thing.

Sharon Campbell of Norman, Okla., is among those traditional GOP voters displeased with Bush and Republican lawmakers. A fiscal conservative, Campbell, 64, said in an interview that congressional Republicans "have not been conservative. . . . Look at the debt that's piled up."

Two-thirds of those polled said Bush "should work mainly to compromise with the Democrats" in Congress rather than pursue his own agenda. Fifty-six percent said the next Congress will be able to do "not too much" or "nothing at all" in the next year; 43 percent said it will be able to accomplish a "good deal" or a "great amount."

The public gave relatively low marks to the Republican-controlled Congress that ended last week, with 37 percent saying they approved of how Congress was doing its job and 57 percent disapproving. The Washington Post-ABC News poll was conducted Dec. 7-11 by telephone among a random national sample of 1,005 adults. The margin of sampling error is three percentage points.

Iraqi PM Weighs Political Realignment (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0106216

By Hamza Hendawi And Qassim Abdul-Zahra

AP, December 14, 2006

Iraq's prime minister is weighing whether to sever his alliance with a radical Shiite cleric blamed for much of the country's sectarian violence, aides said Wednesday. But isolating Muqtada al-Sadr could lead to more deadly attacks, even if the strategy could produce a more stable administration over time.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has been meeting over the last three days with a small circle of his Dawa Party stalwarts to discuss their options, according to his aides who spoke on condition of anonymity because the subject is sensitive.

The meetings began after reports surfaced of a proposed realignment of the alliance supporting the governing coalition, the aides said.

The White House has acknowledged efforts to shore up al-Maliki's coalition but has denied that the move is aimed at replacing him, though some of his aides fear this is the goal.

"We've talked in recent days about a moderate bloc that has Sunni, Shia and Kurdish leaders," White House spokesman Tony Snow said Wednesday.

Central to that strategy is to curb the power of al-Sadr, the radical anti-American cleric who controls 30 of parliament's 275 seats, five Cabinet ministries and the Mahdi Army, Iraq's biggest and most active Shiite militia.

There has been no contact between al-Maliki and al-Sadr since word of the possible new alignment surfaced this week, the aides said.

Relations between al-Maliki and al-Sadr have strained since the Sadrists suspended their participation in parliament and the government two weeks ago to protest the prime minister's Nov. 30 meeting with Bush in Jordan.

Sticking with the Sadrists could cost al-Maliki his job, the aides said. They added that al-Maliki's supporters want to be absolutely certain he could keep the top post if he broke with al-Sadr.

Al-Maliki's only public comments on the proposed new bloc came Tuesday when he said there was no alternative to his "national unity" government.

"We are opposed to anyone who moves in that framework," said al-Maliki, whose seven months in office have been defined by a surge in violence and failure to improve services.

The bid to form the new bloc comes at a particularly bad time for al-Maliki.

The aides to the prime minister said the Sadrist boycott was undermining the government and was likely to play into the hands of the parties involved in the effort to create a new bloc.

A White House memo written by National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley after a visit to Baghdad last month cast doubts about whether al-Maliki had the capacity to control Iraq's sectarian violence and recommended that he end his alliance with al-Sadr.

A new government that excludes supporters of al-Sadr would leave the cleric's Mahdi Army militia without the protection it has enjoyed since al-Maliki came to office in May.

But it could also signal the start of a new round of fighting between the Mahdi Army and the U.S. military. The two sides fought each other for much of 2004 in Baghdad and across much of central and southern Iraq.

The clashes ended after Shiite politicians and clerics convinced the Americans that al-Sadr would be less of a threat to stability if he were brought into the political process. As sectarian violence escalated, that argument seems less persuasive.

On Tuesday, the outgoing No. 2 U.S. commander in Iraq, Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, said some U.S. casualties have resulted from attacks by Shiite militias, a clear reference to the Mahdi Army.

Sadrist legislators have vowed to resist any attempt to isolate them. They did not elaborate, but al-Sadr himself has stepped up his anti-American rhetoric this week, calling on Iraqis to join in a peaceful campaign to push for a timetable for the withdrawal of all foreign troops from Iraq.

The bipartisan Iraq Study Group said Mahdi Army militiamen number about 60,000, a significant increase over previous estimates, which put its strength at about 10,000. The report, released last week, urged al-Maliki to disband the militia.

DOJ_NMG_0106217

But many Shiites believe the Mahdi Army has much greater public support than it did in 2004. In the sectarian violence engulfing Baghdad since the bombing of a major Shiite shrine in February, many of the city's Shiites look to the militia for protection against attacks by Sunni Arab militants.

"The sword of the Shiites," is the phrase some Shiites now use to refer to the militia.

The bid to form a new bloc, which is expected to exclude radical Sunnis as well, is spearheaded by senior Shiite leader Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim and Vice President Tariq al-Hashemi of the Sunni Iraqi Islamic Party. Bush met the two men in the White House separately this month.

Bush also spoke on the telephone Wednesday with Iraqi President Jalal Talabani and Massoud Barzani, leader of Iraq's autonomous Kurdish region, according to Snow, the White House spokesman. Parties led by the two men also are involved in the ongoing talks about the new bloc as well as independents.

A possible stumbling bloc in creating the new bloc, however, could come from Iraq's most influential Shiite cleric, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani. Al-Sistani has consistently urged Shiite unity since the 2003 ouster of Saddam Hussein's Sunni-led regime.

An Iraqi in regular contact with al-Sistani in the holy city of Najaf said the Iranian-born cleric will not publicly state his views on the matter until "the picture becomes clearer."

Speaking on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the media, he suggested that al-Sistani may want to see a political shake-up, saying the cleric was "bitterly saddened" by the violence.

Iraqi Politicians Consider A Reshuffling (LAT)

BAGHDAD — Bombs, mortar rounds and shootings left more than 40 Iraqis dead Wednesday as politicians met to discuss a possible Cabinet shake-up in an attempt to improve the government's track record on stemming violence.

The Shiite-dominated government of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki faces domestic and international pressure to secure streets and provide services. Maliki blames his government's shortcomings in part on the ministers appointed under pressure from his coalition partners. Talks between Maliki, Cabinet officials and political party leaders were underway Wednesday to reshuffle the posts.

"We're trying to strengthen the position of the prime minister," said Diya Din Fayyad, a Shiite Muslim member of parliament. "There's an agreement to change the ministries."

In Wednesday's deadliest incident of sectarian violence, an explosives-packed car blew up in a crowded bus terminal in a mostly Shiite district of eastern Baghdad, killing 10 Iraqis and injuring 25 during the morning rush hour.

Apparent Sunni insurgents killed at least five civilians and injured 13 in two other explosions set off in New Baghdad, another mostly Shiite neighborhood of the capital.

Gunmen kidnapped a ranking advisor to the Shiite-dominated Ministry of Transportation in eastern Baghdad.

Suspected Shiite militants also struck at Sunnis. An Interior Ministry official reported the discovery of at least 21 unidentified bodies in and around the capital. Most had been shot multiple times, and several showed signs of torture.

Mortar rounds struck a neighborhood of mostly Palestinian immigrants in eastern Baghdad, killing one person and injuring six. The Sunni Arab Palestinians, favored under the regime of Saddam Hussein, are at times targeted by armed Shiite groups.

Mortar rounds also struck a government building near the southern city of Hillah, killing at least one civilian and injuring two.

Violence also erupted Wednesday in the northern oil city of Kirkuk, claimed by Iraq's Kurds, Arabs and Turkmens.

A pair of suicide bombers rammed into the entrance of an Iraqi army base near the city, killing at least two soldiers and injuring eight.

Roadside bombs in Kirkuk killed a police officer and a woman. An Iraqi explosives expert also died in Kirkuk when a bomb he was trying to dismantle exploded.

Police also discovered the body of an unidentified man, shot multiple times and bearing signs of torture in the style of killing often associated with sectarian death squads in the capital.

Showdown Highlights Cleric's Tenuous Grip On Power (MCT)

By Hannah Allam And Laith Hammoudi

McClatchy Newspapers, December 13, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - The day seemed tranquil at Muqtada al-Sadr's headquarters for western Baghdad. Pigeons flew overhead, swooping down to perch on palm trees that dotted the courtyard. Uniformed Iraqi policemen and soldiers sipped tea with rugged militiamen or exchanged customary kisses with black-turbaned clerics. Women came to plead for assistance.

But calm is always fleeting in Baghdad. At midday, about 50 gunmen stormed the courtyard and ordered everyone inside to stay put and to stay silent.

Sadr's Mahdi Army militiamen responded immediately, drawing automatic rifles and pistols from under their winter coats and gathering in a cluster to face the unidentified gunmen. The assailants closed ranks, brandishing shiny revolvers and battered machine guns.

The groups walked toward each other as if in a high-noon duel. A voice from the crowd called for blessings in the name of Islam's Prophet Muhammad. Sadr's soldiers began to shout age-old prayers for the prophet and his descendants, then added the Sadr camp's innovation: "Bring salvation soon, and damn their enemies!"

With the air filled with the clicking sound of weapons being prepared, visiting McClatchy journalists fled.

The sudden intrusion of the gunmen into one of Sadr's most secure strongholds exposed a paradox that dogs the Sadr movement and contributes to the daily bloodletting here: The Mahdi Army is growing larger and more sophisticated, with politicians in the government and a vast social services network that serves thousands of poor Shiites, but the anarchy of the streets makes it hard for the militia's commanders to rein in their men, much less prevent attacks from rival factions.

Even as Sadr presses for more land and power, his grasp over Baghdad remains tenuous.

Just moments before, Hazem al Araji, 37, a senior Sadr aide and head of the office, had extolled the transformation of Sadr's movement. Now, gunmen of unknown provenance were threatening his office.

Araji came to the office in the summer of 2003, when he was fresh from exile in Canada. The one-story stucco building in Kadhemiya was a Shiite seminary where baby-faced clerics-in-training dashed out between philosophy classes for falafel sandwiches.

On warm summer days, students in white robes sat under the palm trees in the serene courtyard. They idly flipped through the pages of their Qurans or sat frozen in thought as their fingers worked prayer beads. Sadr's supporters struggled to recruit members to the fledgling Mahdi Army, posting leaflets on the seminary walls. Visitors came and went as they pleased.

These days, the safest route to Sadr's west Baghdad office runs through an obstacle course of both legal and dubious checkpoints in an area known for kidnappings and car bombings.

On Tuesday, there were eight: The first was an imposing roadblock manned by Iraqi army soldiers in camouflage. The next four were guarded by Iraqi police in mismatched uniforms. Then came a couple of apparent militiamen standing in the street with guns, and next, a vehicle search by more plainclothes sentries. Finally, another batch of unidentified guards stopped pedestrians at a coil of razor wire to peer into women's bags and pat down men for weapons.

Gone are the peaceful seminary days. In their place, men in long overcoats hover, casting steely glares on anyone who enters the compound. The courtyard brims with new faces and dialects. Some were distraught Iraqis seeking financial or security help; others were militiamen or workers from Sadr's social programs.

A large poster hung on the wall showing Sadr, the firebrand cleric-turned-commander, alongside fellow Shiite Muslim leader Hassan Nasrallah, head of Lebanon's Hezbollah. Sadr stood on an American flag; Nasrallah on an Israeli one. The caption read: "Their arrogance is under your feet."

An elderly blue-eyed woman shuffled in and beseeched Sadr's representatives for medical assistance for her three sons. Two of them had been shot by U.S. troops, she said, and the third had fallen off a motorcycle while fighting Sunni gunmen.

"Are they in the imam's army?" a tall, stern man asked.

"Yes, they all are," the woman replied.

"OK, just give me their names and papers and we'll sponsor them," he said.

Araji's story illustrates the history of the Sadr movement. A devotee of Sadr's father, a prominent Iraqi ayatollah, Araji fled Iraq in 1999 after Sadr's father was killed. He returned after Saddam Hussein was deposed, but was detained twice by U.S. forces after the Mahdi Army fought two bitter uprisings against the Americans in 2004. He was out of prison last year, and his wife and four children have joined him from Canada.

During the summer's Israeli-Hezbollah war, it was Araji who led Sadr's solidarity demonstrations in Baghdad, which turned out tens of thousands. He praised Hezbollah's response to its constituents and drew comparisons with the Mahdi Army's recent activities.

"If we talk about the word militia, the Mahdi Army doesn't fit the description. We are a group of people with a belief," said Araji, now national director of Sadr's social programs and a local militia commander. "We call it an army, but it's not just an army of gunmen. We protect our neighborhoods and provide services for our people."

Araji said he'd visited Lebanon and Iran recently to check on the welfare of Iraqis in prisons and refugee camps. When asked whether he'd met with Hezbollah chief Nasrallah in Lebanon, he smiled, shook his head and steered the conversation back to his two trips to Iran. On those jaunts, he evaluated the needs of 90,000 Iraqis in exile.

At home, he said, his time is consumed with the displacement of tens of thousands of Iraqis in what he called "one of the biggest crises in modern history."

When told that Sunni Web sites accused him of fielding death squads, Araji scoffed.

"Let them bring proof," he said. "We still have many Sunni families in Kadhemiya. No one has been displaced here, but in the hot spots of Karkh, of course, there are problems. It's the same for Sunnis and Shiites." Karkh is how residents of Baghdad refer to the largely Sunni side of the city that lies west of the Tigris River.

Araji said the government had failed so miserably in providing basic services that his office petitioned the local council six months ago to take over the distribution of cooking gas and other supplies. Now, he said with pride, the Mahdi Army delivers gas and kerosene to families throughout Kadhemiya and other heavily Shiite districts.

Funding for the projects, he said, comes mainly from 2,000 donation boxes throughout Iraq that are stuffed with cash every week after Friday prayers.

"It's a weak government," he said. "They're supposed to do this, but we do it."

Araji said the Mahdi Army doesn't seek to replace the Iraqi government, but that it's obligated to step in until elected officials show results.

He searched for an answer to why Sunnis and Shiites are now at odds. He was reminded that in 2004, Sunni fighters from Fallujah were welcomed into the Mahdi Army and Sadr-allied clerics met frequently with their militant Sunni counterparts in the Muslim Scholars Association. So what happened?

"I ask myself this same question," Araji said with a sigh. "We still have some connections with them, but it's not like before." He blamed the United States and neighboring countries for sowing sectarianism.

"Sectarianism has grown so much in Iraq that we've started to lose trust between the groups," he said.

An aide ducked into the room with urgency. He kneeled before Araji and whispered something in his ear. Araji's eyes widened, he apologetically cut short the interview and ushered his guests back into the courtyard.

Five minutes later, the gunmen arrived. Araji's black turban was lost in a tangle of uniformed and plainclothes gunmen, the swish of black robes as women ran for cover, and the glint of sunshine on weapons.

In a phone call later that night, he dismissed the showdown as "a tribal matter" and emphasized that no one was injured. Kadhemiya was still safe.

"It was a private matter," he said, and offered no further explanation.

US Denies Saudis Threatened To Back Iraqi Sunnis (AFP)

AFP, December 14, 2006

The United States denied Saudi Arabia had warned it would financially back Iraq's Sunni community against the Shiite majority, if American troops were withdrawn.

The latest in a series of veiled cautions apparently emanating from well-placed Saudi sources appeared in a New York Times report, as President George W. Bush mulled a long-awaited change of US strategy in Iraq.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said such reports ran counter to stated Saudi policy, which he said was aimed at securing the territorial integrity of Iraq and national reconciliation.

"That has been their position; remains their position, because they believe that is in their national interest, and is not done out of charity," McCormack said.

"That's the tone and tenor of our conversations that's been conveyed from lower-level officials up to senior officials. That's what they've told us in private."

The New York Times, citing US and Arab diplomats, reported Tuesday that King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia delivered the warning to Vice President Dick Cheney in Riyadh two weeks ago.

"Its a hypothetical situation, and wed work hard to avoid such a structure," one Arab diplomat in Washington told the Times.

"If things become so bad in Iraq, like an ethnic cleansing, we will feel we are pulled into the war," the diplomat was quoted as saying.

CNN meanwhile quoted an unnamed senior US official as saying the King read Cheney the "riot act" and expressed growing concern over Iraq's deterioration.

White House spokesman Tony Snow refused to detail the content of Cheney's private conversations, but said the reports were "not something that has been described to me as something that is consistent with the conversations."

There was no immediate comment from Saudi Arabia's embassy in Washington.

The reports fuelled speculation about a possible proxy war in Iraq in the event of a US withdrawal, between Saudi-backed Sunnis and Iran-backed Shiites.

Observers here say that Saudi Arabia has largely held to a promise to the United States to desist support for Sunni brethren in Iraq while US troops are victims of a Sunni insurgency and in the crossfire of sectarian violence.

The latest intrigue in Saudi-US relations came as mystery still cloaked the sudden resignation and flight from Washington of Saudi ambassador Prince Turki al-Faisal.

The ambassador left after only 15 months on the job, saying his decision was made for personal reasons, but a flurry of speculation pointed to possible Saudi power struggles or the possibility of him being promoted to foreign minister.

Saudi Royal Family, Gov't Split On Iraq (AP)

By Salah Nasrawi

AP, December 14, 2006

Saudi Arabia's royal family and government leaders are deeply divided over how to handle the growing crisis in Iraq and other looming Mideast problems like Iran, with some favoring strong aid to fellow Sunnis and others more cautious.

The split played a key role in this week's abrupt resignation of the Saudi ambassador to Washington. It also could hurt U.S. efforts to forge a new overall strategy to calm Iraq.

More broadly, the internal dispute shows how Arab countries like Saudi Arabia, long key partners in U.S. efforts to stabilize the Middle East, are struggling to decide how to proceed as Iraq boils over and Iran gains influence.

The tension in the region is straining Saudi relations with the United States, despite both countries' assertions that all is fine.

The resignation of Prince Turki al-Faisal, after just 15 months as ambassador to Washington, for example, came after Saudi officials concluded he was not succeeding at building strong ties with the United States, a Saudi official said Wednesday.

"Many in the royal family concluded that if he stayed longer, things might even get worse," said the official, who has close working ties with the Saudi Foreign Ministry but spoke on condition of anonymity because of the issue's sensitivity.

DOJ_NMG_0106221

The Saudis had no official comment, and the White House merely wished Turki well. Turki himself could not be reached for comment.

But Iraq was clearly central to the dispute.

Saudi Arabia denied that Obaid was speaking on its behalf.

But The Associated Press reported last week that Saudi private citizens are sending millions of dollars to Sunni insurgents in Iraq, much of it used to buy weapons, because they worry about Iranian influence in Shiite-led Iraq.

Iraqi officials have said they believe some members of the Saudi royal family are either involved in that flow of money or turning a blind eye — a charge Saudi Arabia strongly denies.

The Saudis and the United States also denied a Wednesday report in The New York Times that the Saudi king told Vice President Dick Cheney the kingdom might provide financial aid to Iraqi Sunnis if the U.S. pulls troops out of Iraq.

"That's not Saudi government policy," White House spokesman Tony Snow said. He added that the Saudis, however, were "rightly concerned about the adventurism of Iranians in Iraq, and we share that concern."

The United States has been pushing Saudi Arabia to persuade Sunnis in Iraq to leave the insurgency and join with Shiites in political efforts — an effort the Saudi government has said it is undertaking.

But the royal family has been sharply divided over what strategy to adopt toward Iraq, said two Saudis with close ties to the government, speaking anonymously because internal royal deliberations are highly sensitive. Some favor robust support of fellow Sunnis inside Iraq, while others urge caution.

The bottom line has been power struggles and indecision about the best course, both said.

"They have an obsession that Shiites and Iran will control Iraq, but they do not know how to stop that," said one Saudi. The other described what he called total confusion within the government over the best course.

On Monday, 30 prominent Saudi clerics called on Sunni Muslims around the Middle East to support Sunnis in Iraq against Shiites and praised the insurgency. The clerics warned that Shiite Muslims were taking control of Iraq in a conspiracy with "crusaders" — a reference to Westerners — to marginalize Sunnis.

Many of the clerics are known to have close connections with top royal family members and receive generous donations from them.

Saudi Arabia is also increasingly worried by events elsewhere in the region including Lebanon and Iran and there is tension with the United States over the Palestinian issue.

Despite all that, Saudi and U.S. ties have long endured and "Saudi diplomacy is very much active," said Saudi political analyst Fahad al-Harithi. It looks to the contrary, he said, only "because the smoke is billowing high in the area, and hides this reality."

At Least 55 Die In More Iraqi Violence (AP)

By Thomas Wagner, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 14, 2006

A new round of car bombings and other violence struck Iraq on Wednesday, with 55 people killed or found dead as the Iraqi government unveiled a plan to assume responsibility for security in Baghdad by early next year.

The relentless attacks indicate how hard it may be for the Iraqis to replace U.S. forces in the capital, and President Bush said he would "not be rushed" into a decision on a strategy change for Iraq.

The scope of the problem was clear Wednesday, from the first bombing at a bus stop during morning rush hour through the announcement at 9 p.m. that the tortured, bullet-ridden bodies of 21 kidnap victims had been found on the streets of the capital.

"If you take Baghdad, it's unacceptable levels of violence here right now. We have got to bring it down," said Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, the top American military spokesman in Iraq.

The violence came ahead of a national reconciliation conference scheduled for Saturday. The gathering is aimed at rallying ethnic, religious and political groups around a common strategy for handling Iraq's problems.

At least 17 people were killed Wednesday in car bombings against Shiite and Sunni targets in Baghdad.

The first major attack happened at 8:45 a.m., when a car bomb exploded near a Shiite mosque in the Kamaliyah neighborhood, killing at least 11 civilians, wounding 27 and heavily damaging shops and cars, authorities said. They said the mosque was not damaged.

"A Volkswagen car exploded right near the bus stop, hitting a group of people, including women and children who were waiting to take a bus to a fruit and vegetable market," said one witness, Abu Haider al-Kaabi.

Two other car bombs exploded in the mostly Shiite area of New Baghdad, killing four people and wounding 14. Another car bomb struck the largely Sunni area of Yarmouk, killing two people and wounding three.

North of Baghdad, seven tortured bodies were found in Mosul, two people were killed by roadside bombs in Kirkuk and men with explosives destroyed a small, empty Shiite shrine in Baqouba, security forces said. Two suicide car bombs also struck the headquarters of the Iraqi army's 2nd Battalion near Kirkuk, killing four soldiers and wounding 10.

South of the capital, three roadside bombings missed a police patrol, killing one civilian and wounding one in Musayyib; and gunmen killed a nine-member Shiite family in an attack on their house in Hasna village.

The U.S. maintains about 140,000 troops in Iraq, and Bush is considering a change of strategy in the country, including Baghdad, where stepped-up efforts to curtail sectarian violence failed this summer.

For several months, U.S. and Iraqi officials have been talking about proposals to transfer responsibility of security in cities from American forces to newly trained Iraqi police and soldiers.

Caldwell said Wednesday that the top two U.S. officials in Iraq and the Iraqi leadership were discussing a plan for Iraqi troops to assume primary responsibility for security in the capital.

"Obviously we all believe that to find solutions for the Iraqi problems it's going to take Iraqi solutions," Caldwell said. "And so that's in fact what they've done, they've drawn up a plan."

Caldwell acknowledged the difficulties in restoring calm in Baghdad and said the solution was for Iraqi politicians to overcome their differences.

But he stressed that the emphasis was on increasing transition teams and said the U.S. would provide enough troops to ensure that Iraq's Shiite-dominated security forces protect all sides.

"I mean, that's another set of eyes that the Iraqi leadership can count on to ensure that their security forces are performing in a nonsectarian manner out there on the street," he told reporters.

The New York Times first reported the plan Wednesday, citing Iraqi National Security Adviser Mouwafak al-Rubaie as saying it called for pulling back most American troops from central Baghdad and redefining their mission so they concentrate primarily on fighting al-Qaida and Sunni extremists.

A close aide to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki told The Associated Press that the proposal for the Iraqi army to take over security in Baghdad and other cities was first proposed to Bush by al-Maliki at their Nov. 30 summit.

"I can tell you that by next June, our forces will take over the security of the country," al-Maliki was quoted as saying then.

This plan was drafted by a joint committee made up of Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq; U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad; and Iraq's defense and interior ministers and its national security adviser, the aide said. He spoke on condition of anonymity because he was disclosing information that has not been officially released.

Ten Iraqi divisions are prepared to take over from the Americans across Baghdad and elsewhere in Iraq by March 2007, under the supervision of the multinational forces, according to the aide, who attended the meeting between al-Maliki and Bush.

By the end of June, Iraqis will take over security for all provinces and coalition forces will move outside cities, the aide said. By that time, the aide added, al-Maliki will have the right to redeploy these Iraqi forces.

Car Bombings In Baghdad Kill 15 In Crowded Shiite Area Markets (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, December 14, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 13 — Car bombs exploded in crowded street markets in two predominantly Shiite neighborhoods of eastern Baghdad on Wednesday, killing at least 15 people and wounding at least 35, Iraqi and American officials said.

The deadliest attack, in the working-class district of Kamaliya, killed at least 10 people and wounded 25, scattering bodies and reducing several cars and a row of market stalls to charred, smoldering husks, officials said.

Several hours later, two car bombs exploded almost simultaneously on a busy street in the nearby neighborhood of Baghdad al Jedida, killing at least five people and wounding at least 10, an official at the Interior Ministry said. Car bombs are a hallmark of the Sunni Arab-led insurgency and are frequently detonated in places where Shiites congregate, seemingly with the intent of inflicting the most casualties possible, fomenting sectarian violence and further destabilizing the Shiite-dominated government.

Dozens of other Iraqis were killed across Iraq on Wednesday, according to police and military reports shared with the news media.

Two suicide car bombers detonated their vehicles at the gate of an Iraqi Army regiment responsible for protecting Iraq's oil pipelines, said Col. Abdul Sattar al-Jibouri, a police commander in Kirkuk. Seven Iraqi soldiers were killed and 14 others were wounded in that attack, he said.

A group of gunmen killed nine Shiites, all from the same family, in the town of Hasna, a police official in the nearby city of Kut said. An adviser at the Transportation Ministry was kidnapped by gunmen near the ministry's headquarters in Baghdad, the Interior Ministry official said, and at least 21 bodies were recovered around Baghdad, all with gunshots to the head and signs of torture.

Four mortar shells hit an apartment block popular with Palestinians in the eastern neighborhood of Baladiat, killing one Palestinian and wounding six, the Interior Ministry official said.

Palestinians in Iraq, a population now concentrated in Baghdad, have been frequent victims of the Shiite militias this year. They carry the twin stigmas of being Sunni Arabs and of having enjoyed privileges under Saddam Hussein who, as part of his campaign to fashion himself into a Pan-Arab leader, was solicitous of their support. The housing complex that was attacked was created by the Baath Party for Palestinians who fled to Iraq following the creation of Israel in 1948.

Scattered Attacks Kill At Least 34 In Baghdad (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

BAGHDAD, Dec. 13 -- Car bombings and other attacks across the capital on Wednesday killed at least 34 people, as U.S. and Iraqi leaders said they would step up efforts to give Iraqi forces more control of the country's security.

The deadliest blast targeted a group of men waiting for temporary work in the mostly Shiite Kamaliya neighborhood of southeast Baghdad. It killed eight day laborers and injured 13, including three police officers, said Lt. Col. Muhsin Saeed, an Interior Ministry official. The day before, a car bomb killed 70 day laborers and injured more than 230 about a mile from the fortified Green Zone.

The spate of car bombings came as Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, under pressure to stop sectarian warfare and attacks by insurgents, promised greater security. In a meeting in Baghdad with a U.S. congressional delegation headed by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), Maliki said Iraqi troops should be given control of the country's security as soon as possible, his office said.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, the top U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, told reporters that the U.S. military was just as eager to transfer authority to Iraqi forces. He also said that Maliki would increase his forces by about 40,000, to 355,000.

In a searing indictment of U.S. war strategy in Iraq, a bipartisan panel co-chaired by former secretary of state James A. Baker III called for the pullout of most American troops by 2008. In order for that to happen, the panel said, U.S. forces would have to switch from a focus on combat to the training and advising of Iraqi troops and police officers.

Caldwell said more American troops would be embedded with Iraqi forces as advisers and trainers. Iraqis "need forces that can run complex operations against terrorist and criminal elements, and the best way for Iraqi security forces to enhance these capabilities is through the mentorship and partnership of our coalition transition teams," Caldwell said.

Events on Wednesday underscored the complexity of problems that Iraqi forces may someday face on their own.

In the mixed New Baghdad district in the southwest part of the capital, two car bombs exploded simultaneously, killing 12 people, including two police officers, and wounding 13, among them three policemen, said an Interior Ministry official who refused to be identified further because he is not authorized to speak publicly.

The U.S. military said that two explosions occurred on a street near the Sunni al-Samouri mosque in New Baghdad, but that there was no damage. The military did not say whether there were casualties.

Earlier in the day, the military said, a car bomb was detonated across the street from the Shiite Kamaliya mosque in New Baghdad. The military did not disclose any casualty figures.

Police officers also fell victim to roadside bombs. One exploded at the Amil-Bayya intersection in west Baghdad, killing three people, including a policeman, and injuring five others, an Interior Ministry official said.

Another roadside bomb targeting a police patrol in the Illam neighborhood in southwest Baghdad killed two police officers and wounded three, the official said.

Armed men killed three members of one family when they blew up a house in the mostly Shiite neighborhood of Dora in south Baghdad, the official said. In a separate incident, armed men fired on a car in the mostly Sunni Adel neighborhood in west Baghdad, killing five passengers.

A mortar shell killed one person and wounded six when it fell in the Baladiat district of east Baghdad, Interior Ministry spokesman Abdul Kareem al-Kinani said.

Relatives and friends buried an AP Television News cameraman on Wednesday, a day after he was killed by insurgents while covering clashes in northern Iraq, the Associated Press reported.

Aswan Ahmed Lutfallah, 35, was having his car repaired in the eastern part of Mosul when insurgents and police began fighting nearby and he rushed to cover the clash.

Insurgents spotted him filming and shot him, police Brig. Abdul-Karim Ahmed Khalaf said.

Special correspondent Waleed Saffar and other Washington Post staff in Iraq contributed to this report.

Fla. Senator Defies Bush, Visits Syria (AP)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

AP, December 14, 2006

In a direct affront to the Bush administration, a Democratic senator spent an hour Wednesday with Syrian President Bashar Assad in Damascus, emerging from the meeting to say Assad was willing to help control the Iraq-Syrian border.

Sen. Bill Nelson of Florida, a member of the Armed Services and Foreign Relations committees, met with Assad after the State Department said that it disapproved of his trip. The United States has limited diplomatic ties with Syria because of its support of Hezbollah and Hamas, which the U.S. deems terrorist organizations, and President Bush has expressed reluctance to seek help from Damascus on Iraq until the Syrians curb that support and reduce their influence in Lebanon.

"Assad clearly indicated the willingness to cooperate with the Americans and or the Iraqi army to be part of a solution" in Iraq, Nelson told reporters in a conference call following the meeting. The U.S. says foreign fighters often enter Iraq across that boundary.

Syrian officials have indicated a willingness before to engage the U.S. in discussions about Iraq, which the Bush administration has treated with skepticism. Nelson said he viewed Assad's remarks as "a crack in the door for discussions to continue. I approach this with realism not optimism."

Nelson said he reported the information to embassy officials and will brief his congressional committees on the trip. Also expected to visit Syria is Sens. John Kerry, D-Mass., Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., and Arlen Specter, R-Pa..

"We don't think that members of Congress ought to be going there," White House press secretary Tony Snow said, adding that the United States continues to denounce Syria's meddling in Lebanon and its ties to terrorist groups.

Snow noted the existing diplomatic ties between U.S. and Syria. "I think it's a real stretch to think the Syrians don't know where we stand or what we think," he said.

The diplomatic push from Congress comes on the heels of a recommendation by a bipartisan panel that the U.S. engage Iran and Syria on the war in Iraq. Bush has remained cool to the proposal by the Iraq Study Group, which was led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton, D-Ind.

Nelson said he ultimately received logistical support from the State Department in what he called a "fact-finding trip" across the Middle East, being transported by embassy officials from Jordan's capital city of Amman to Damascus. Prior to heading to Damascus, Nelson met with top Israeli and Palestinian officials; in coming days, he plans to visit Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Bahrain and Iraq.

Nelson said he was not interested visiting Iran "at this time" and did not say why.

However, the senator did say that he raised the issue of a nuclear-armed Iran to Assad, saying "he ought to understand that that's not only a threat to him, Syria, but to the entire world. . . . He took note," Nelson said.

The senator said he also expressed to the Syrian leader the problems caused by Hezbollah and Hamas and urged Assad to support the release of captured Israeli soldiers. Nelson said the Syrian president responded by saying Israel had 20 Syrians in captivity, one of whom died recently from leukemia.

The senator shrugged off suggestions he was challenging Bush's authority by sidestepping administration policy that the U.S. have no contact with Syrian officials.

"I have a constitutional role as a member of Congress," Nelson said.

Meanwhile, Bush criticized Damascus anew and called on it to free all political prisoners.

In a statement, the president expressed support for the Syrian people, and said they "deserve a government whose legitimacy is grounded in the consent of the people, not brute force."

The U.S.-backed government in Lebanon led by Prime Minister Fuad Saniora is being challenged by the Hezbollah-led, pro-Syrian opposition. Bush said Syria should disclose the fate of the many missing Lebanese citizens who disappeared following their arrest in Lebanon during decades of Syrian military occupation.

"The Syrian regime should immediately free all political prisoners, including Aref Dalila, Michel Kilo, Anwar al-Bunni, Mahmoud Issa, and Kamal Labwani," Bush said. "I am deeply troubled by reports that some ailing political prisoners are denied health care while others are held in cells with violent criminals."

Florida Senator Meets With The President Of Syria (MCT)

By Lesley Clark

McClatchy Newspapers, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON - Defying the Bush administration, Democratic Sen. Bill Nelson of Florida met Wednesday in Damascus with Syrian President Bashar Assad, saying after the meeting that he believed that there was a "crack in the door" to continue discussions with Syria on curbing the violence in neighboring Iraq.

Midway through the Florida Democrat's conference call with reporters, however, the White House issued a statement denouncing the Syrian government's human rights record and calling on it to "immediately free all political prisoners."

"Syrians deserve a government whose legitimacy is grounded in the consent of the people, not brute force," the statement from President Bush said.

The White House has expressed reluctance about diplomatic outreach to Syria because of the country's role in Lebanon, where it's suspected in several political assassinations, and its support of the militant Islamist groups Hezbollah and Hamas, which the United States has designated as terrorist organizations.

The administration said the statement on Syria's human rights was unrelated to Nelson's visit, but White House spokesman Tony Snow said the administration didn't "think that members of Congress ought to be going there." He said the White House had opposed Syria's involvement in Lebanon and noted that "it's a real stretch to think the Syrians don't know where we stand or what we think."

Nelson, a member of the Foreign Relations and Armed Services committees and an incoming member of the Senate Intelligence Committee, acknowledged that the State Department wasn't happy with his decision to meet with the Syrian president to discuss whether the country could help the United States find a way out of Iraq.

Nelson said that in the aftermath of the Iraq Study Group's recommendation for a stepped-up diplomatic effort involving Syria and Iran, "it was obvious that we were going to have contacts."

"Remember what the goal was," Nelson said. "The goal is to stabilize Iraq. I felt like that that was a nonstarter for them to say that I should ignore the (Iraq Study Group) report."

Nelson rejected suggestions that he was rebuffing Bush, saying he had a "constitutional role as a member of Congress. . . . I am on a fact-finding trip throughout the Middle East."

Nelson noted that other senators - John Kerry, D-Mass., Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., and Arlen Spector, R-Pa. - are expected to follow him and that the State Department eventually supported his visit. Personnel from the U.S. embassies in Jordan and Damascus escorted him.

Nelson said Assad agreed that Syria and the United States had "a common interest to stabilize Iraq" and that Assad "clearly indicated the willingness to cooperate" with the U.S. or the Iraqi army to secure Iraq's border with Syria.

"He has a refugee problem," Nelson said of the hundreds of thousands of Iraqis who've crossed into Syria, fleeing the violence in their homeland.

The two met for about an hour in the presidential palace in a meeting that Nelson described as "cordial."

Nelson said Assad made no specific request of the United States, but that they had a "sharp disagreement of opinion" over Hezbollah and Hamas. Nelson said he made it clear to Assad that the United States wouldn't ease the pressure on Syria to stop backing the groups.

The senator said he'd urged Assad to support the release of Israeli soldiers whom Hezbollah had kidnapped, but that Assad had responded by noting that Israel is holding 20 Syrians, one of whom recently died of leukemia.

Nelson also said he'd told Assad that he planned to go to Beirut on Thursday to meet with Lebanese Prime Minister Fuad Saniora, whose government Syria's ally Hezbollah is trying to unseat.

The senator said he was "not interested in going to Iran" but that he did raise with Assad the specter of a "nuclear-ized" Iran.

"He ought to understand that that's not only a threat to him, Syria, but to the entire world," Nelson said.

The senator's trip includes stops in Israel, Palestinian areas, Jordan, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait and Iraq. He said he planned to report his findings to the State Department and the Senate Armed Services, Foreign Relations and Intelligence committees.

Nelson noted that he spoke earlier with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, who's rejected opening peace talks with Syria.

Olmert "said that he preferred that I not go, but knowing that I was going that he knew I had the interests of Israel at heart," Nelson said.

Bush Won't 'Be Rushed' On Iraq (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, December 14, 2006

President Bush yesterday said he is "not going to be rushed" into making changes in Iraq.

After meeting with civilian and uniformed military leaders at the Pentagon, the president, in combative language similar to his rhetoric during the recent congressional campaign, said some of the ideas being floated in Washington could cause the U.S. to lose the battle for Iraq.

"I've heard some ideas that would lead to defeat," he said. "I reject those ideas, ideas such as leaving before the job is done, ideas such as not helping [the Iraqi] government take the necessary and hard steps to be able to do its job."

Yesterday's meeting was the final big consultation he has scheduled as he ponders how to change course in Iraq. The White House said earlier this week that he would not be ready to announce those changes until next year -- a delay that caused some criticism from political opponents.

The president is also trying to navigate the politics of Iraq here at home in the wake of last week's Iraq Study Group report. The bipartisan panel recommended a goal of ending the U.S. combat mission by early 2008, and also said the United States should engage Iraq's neighbors, including Syria and Iran, in diplomacy to try to isolate the insurgents in Iraq.

The administration has balked at that idea, and yesterday criticized Sen. Bill Nelson, Florida Democrat, who held his own meeting during the day with Syrian President Bashar Assad. Mr. Nelson said Mr. Assad indicated he is willing to help control his nation's border with Iraq.

But the White House said the senator's meeting, which came on the same day the president issued a statement harshly criticizing Syria's human rights record, was not a good idea.

"We don't think members of Congress ought to be going there," White House press secretary Tony Snow told reporters, though he would not say what the administration's specific objection was.

But Mr. Nelson won't be the last senator. Sen. Christopher J. Dodd, Connecticut Democrat, said he is also planning a visit to Syria during his upcoming trip to the Middle East.

"When you've got governments like Syria which have influence on the course of events, it's important to engage with them," he said.

Meanwhile, two other prominent Democrats, Sens. Carl Levin of Michigan and Jack Reed of Rhode Island, called on Mr. Bush to declare that the U.S. engagement in Iraq is not open-ended. They said that would put pressure on Iraqis to find a political solution to the current insurgency.

"The most important thing is that he send the message to the Iraqi leaders that it's not an open-ended commitment," Mr. Levin said.

Mr. Snow said Mr. Bush has heard that idea, but said Iraqis themselves don't want an open-ended commitment. Still, Mr. Snow said Mr. Bush is trying to send a different message right now.

"The president has considered everything, but I think the most important thing to do is to send signals to the Iraqis that we're going to support them," he said.

2,000 Killed In Afghanistan Since Sept. (AP)

By Jason Straziuso

AP, December 14, 2006

Almost 2,100 militants have been killed in Afghanistan since Sept. 1 in operations involving coalition special forces soldiers, a U.S. Army spokesman said.

That means more than half of the country's insurgency-related deaths this year have come in the last three months.

About 900 of the 2,077 deaths came during Operation Medusa, a major offensive in September in the southern province of Kandahar. Special forces soldiers worked alongside conventional forces from Canada during the fight.

The two primary missions for the U.S. special forces soldiers in Afghanistan are conducting counterterrorism operations and supporting NATO troops, Master Sgt. Clifford Richardson said in an interview this week at Bagram, the main U.S. base in Afghanistan.

Nailing top fugitives like al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden and Taliban leader Mullah Omar is part of the mission of Operation Enduring Freedom but isn't the top priority of the Combined Joint Special Operations Task Force, which commands all special forces soldiers in Afghanistan, Richardson said.

More than 500 U.S. special forces soldiers and 1,000 from other coalition countries operate throughout Afghanistan and outside the command of NATO's International Security Assistance Force, unlike conventional U.S. troops now operating in the east.

"We were assisting the Canadians by providing some reconnaissance and some screening and it rolled into where they could no longer push forward," Richardson said. "We rolled into a different tactical maneuver set and took over as the main element."

The number of militants killed in action since Sept. 1 — when the current U.S. special forces group arrived for an eight-month rotation — was confirmed through either physical evidence, such as body counts, or through multiple sources, Richardson said.

About 4,000 people have died in violence in Afghanistan this year, according to an Associated Press count based on figures from NATO, U.S. and Afghan officials. Those figures often come from remote battle sites and are impossible to confirm.

Taliban insurgents have stepped up attacks this year, particularly in the country's south and east, and have launched a record number of suicide and roadside bombs this year.

Richardson said that special forces soldiers here no longer operate unilaterally, but "by, with and through" Afghan security forces.

"We prefer to operate through the partner units we work with and the government of Afghanistan," he said. "That just solidifies them becoming a sovereign nation and not relying solely on the U.S. military for their own protection and security."

Bidders Unready For Jobs In Iraq (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, December 14, 2006

Nearly two-thirds of the 276 Foreign Service members who volunteered to serve in Iraq next year were found unqualified for the jobs, aggravating a shortage that has left the State Department scrambling to fully staff its embassy and other operations in the country.

The department is now offering improved benefits and career-enhancing inducements in a bid to fill 49 vacancies in Iraq. All assignments to other foreign missions have been put on hold until openings in Iraq, Afghanistan and other high-priority posts are filled.

"Stability in Iraq is our nation's highest priority. We have an ongoing need for the talents of our very best officers and staff," the State Department leadership said in a cable to all U.S. embassies and consulates around the world last week titled, "2007 Open Call for Bidders on Iraq."

An accompanying Dec. 6 cable said the incentives package for those serving in Iraq "has been reviewed and revised ... to incorporate recently approved benefits and to reflect recently passed legislation."

The changes include preferred consideration for future assignments, more generous home leave and "enhanced promotion consideration" for those who have served in Iraq.

The cable said 276 Foreign Service members applied for 160 positions in Iraq beginning next summer, but only 82 were approved. Another 15 positions will go to entry-level employees, and 14 of those now in Iraq have decided to extend their tours.

Some diplomats were perplexed by the department's decision to reject so many of its own, while so-called career-development officers are now scrambling to find "clients" to volunteer for the jobs.

Others said many of those who applied never heard back from human resources. "Too many people have told me that they have bid on Iraq in good faith and followed up as appropriate, and simply gotten the cold shoulder," a mid-level Foreign Service officer said.

A Government Accountability Office (GAO) report earlier this year found that the staff shortages were leaving the department unable to fully carry out its stabilization and reconstruction tasks in those countries.

A State Department official said in September that the department will resort to "directed assignments" if necessary to find personnel for hardship posts, principally in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Officials from the State Department's bureaus of Near East affairs (NEA) and human resources said that, while they appreciate all bids on Iraq, some applicants "did not have the skills required for those positions or relevant previous experience."

"We had many volunteers, and we don't always go back to say 'no,' " one official said. "Bidders who simply put Iraq on their bid list but do not contact anyone in Iraq or NEA are not considered serious bidders, unless their background makes them stand out."

Some volunteers had "partial skills" and were approved pending additional training, the official said. Another official said that some previous experience in the Middle East or in postwar reconstruction is essential for service in Iraq.

Language and cultural training also are considered assets, though only about 30 officers currently posted there speak Arabic.

But even that is no guarantee of success. One Arabic-speaking junior officer with experience in the Middle East said he volunteered to go to Iraq when he first joined the Foreign Service last year, but he was rejected.

He recently bid again but was told that he first had to do a consular tour, which is mandatory for all officers before they get tenured. Now he is considering leaving the service.

Recruitment for Iraq has become such a sensitive subject at the State Department that none of those interviewed agreed to speak on the record.

Iraq and Afghanistan present the Foreign Service with severe challenges. But while reconstruction work in Iraq's provinces is the most dangerous in the service, some officers said the department should not be too picky when assigning staff to the embassy in Baghdad.

Several officers pointed out that there are still many diplomats who have no interest in serving in Iraq. A former ambassador said some of his ex-colleagues are considering early retirement because they do not want to be forced to serve in Iraq at the end of their careers.

Grassley Recommends Three For U.S. Attorney Job (DMR)

Des Moines Register, December 14, 2006

Washington, D.C. — Three people today were recommended to the White House by Sen. Chuck Grassley, R-Ia., as candidates to become the new U.S. attorney for the Northern District of Iowa.

The final pick for U.S. attorney in the district, which has offices in Cedar Rapids and Sioux City, will be made by President Bush and submitted to the Senate. The nomination must be approved by the Senate Judiciary Committee, of which Grassley is a senior member, and the full Senate.

The current chief prosecutor, U.S. Attorney Charles W. Larson Sr., is retiring at the end of the year.

"All of these candidates bring unique experiences and exceptional qualifications to serve as one of Iowa's lead prosecutors. They would each serve Iowa well," Grassley said in a statement.

The candidates recommended by Grassley are:

--Matt Dummermuth, a native of Elgin who currently works for the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice in Washington, D.C. He is a graduate of Iowa State University and Harvard Law School in Cambridge, Mass.

--Chadwicke Groover of Cedar Rapids, who has worked in in the Northern District office since April and served on the Senate Judiciary Committee staff for five years. He is a graduate of Bob Jones University in Greenville, S.C., and received his law degree from Mercer University in Macon, Ga.

--Lisa Krigsten, a native of Sioux City who currently works for the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice in Washington, D.C. Krigsten is a graduate of the University of Kansas and received her law degree from the University of Iowa.

Nation Kyiv Lands $45m U.S. Grant To Battle Corruption (KP)

By Volodymyr Mashchenko

Kyiv Post, December 14, 2006

Ukrainian Economy Minister Volodymyr Makukha inked a $45 million anti-corruption grant from the U.S. during a recent trip to Washington D.C.

The United States government has approved a $45 million grant to help Ukraine fight state graft, with another $500 million in the wings.

During Prime Minister Viktor Yanukovych's recent visit to the United States, on Dec. 4-7, Ukrainian Economy Minister Volodymyr Makukha inked the agreement, which entails assistance in control of corruption.

Representing the U.S. was Millenium Challenge Corporation, which describes itself as "a government corporation designed to work with some of the poorest countries of the world."

At a Dec. 12 press conference in Kyiv, Makukha outlined the components of the grant program: The strengthening of monitoring of civil society and exposure of public corruption; judicial reform; the monitoring and enforcement of ethical and administrative standards; the streamlining of enforcement of regulations; and combating corruption in higher education.

The Economy Minister said Ukraine had applied for the US-funded program about a year ago and has now been recognized by Millenium Challenge as eligible for financial assistance.

Millenium Challenge's assistance to Ukraine falls under what it refers to as its Threshold Program, an intermediary stage on the way to greater funding, known as Compact assistance.

"The Threshold Program assistance is used to help countries address the specific policy weaknesses indicated by the country's scores on 16 policy indicators," reads a Millenium Challenge press release.

Ukraine has shown progress in all sixteen indicators over the last year, except control of corruption, according to Millenium Challenge.

"As a result of reforms already undertaken, Millenium Challenge's Board of Directors named Ukraine in November as one of three countries newly eligible for Compact assistance."

Eligibility for the greater funding is determined by "independently measured" scores for indices such as political and economic freedom, investment in education, control of corruption, respect for civil liberties, health care spending, fiscal and trade policies and judicial fairness, Millenium Challenge said.

"Ukraine is among the most aggressive reformers on our 'Ruling Justly' indicators," Millenium Challenge CEO John Danilovich was quoted as saying in the press release.

"Ruling Justly," one of three categories under which the government corporation assesses a country, includes the "controlling corruption" indice.

"While this is a tremendous achievement, it is important to underscore that there must be continued performance on Ukraine's Threshold program while it participates in its Compact development process," Danilovich said.

One indice in the "Ruling Justly" category, where Ukraine showed a need for improvement was "controlling corruption."

"The struggle against corruption is critical to Ukraine's development," Danvilovich added.

According to Millenium Challenge, Ukraine's poor performance on the corruption index is primarily explained by flawed laws, lack of independence in the country's judiciary, and endemic corruption in law enforcement, education, medical institutions, customs and the tax administration.

The Ukraine Threshold program targets many of these obstacles and will be administered by the United States Agency for International Development (USAID) and the U.S. Department of Justice.

"Ukraine has been made eligible for … assistance, but it is up to Ukraine to organize itself, consult with its civil society and develop a proposal of sufficient quality and content targeting poverty reduction through economic growth for the MCC Board to consider," said Danilovich.

During the Dec. 12 press conference, Economy Minister Makukha said Ukraine would have to develop and present Millenium Challenge with a detailed program on how to fight corruption before it can get a shot at the large funding under Compact assistance.

"It is very important for us to make up our minds about a clear program that we would be able to implement, determine the content of the program, and discuss the program with non-governmental organizations and civil society … only then can we apply to [Millenium Challenge] in order to launch this program and start implementing it", he said.

Olga Myrtsalo, a public information advisor with the Office of Program Coordination and Strategy at USAID's office in Kyiv, told the Post on Dec. 12 that representatives of Millenium Challenge will arrive in Kyiv on Dec. 18 to discuss the details of the $45 million program with Ukraine's government.

According to Ukraine's Economy Ministry, the U.S. ranks fifth in terms of direct investments into the Ukrainian economy. Millenium Challenge administers programs in dozens of mostly African and South American countries, but also Armenia, Georgia, Moldova and Kyrgyzstan, in addition to Ukraine.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron To Inmate For Skilling (AP)

By Patrick Condon

AP, December 14, 2006

WASECA, Minn. — This was what one of Wall Street's biggest success stories had come to. Jeffrey Skilling rode past a dozen waiting reporters and photographers, got out of the silver Jeep Liberty, hugged his wife and walked quietly into a life of imprisonment and menial jobs that will pay him less over the next two decades than he made for a single hour as chief executive of Enron.

Enron to inmate.

This was nothing like metropolitan Houston, but rather a farm town in Minnesota. There was no $4.7 million Mediterranean-style mansion, but a one-time college dormitory room.

Skilling reported to the Federal Correctional Institution on Wednesday, accompanied by his wife, Rebecca Carter, and his brother, Mark. The day before, a federal judge had denied his request to remain free on bond pending appeal of his conviction on fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and other charges in the multibillion-dollar collapse of the Houston-based energy giant.

Barring a successful appeal, even with time off for good behavior, the 53-year-old Skilling will be an old man at the end of his term _ 24 years, four months, more than twice as long as the sentence of any other Enron executive.

This then is to be his world until sometime in 2031: a group of low, red-brick buildings, once a branch campus of the University of Minnesota, now surrounded by two barbed wire fences and patrolled by an occasional white pickup truck.

Waseca, a town of 8,400, is 75 miles south of Minneapolis and even further removed from Houston's skyscrapers. There's an old-fashioned downtown with an implement dealership. The area is flat; the literal high points in town are the steeple of the Catholic church, a grain elevator, a water tower.

At the prison, inmates have access to exercise facilities, including a basketball court and a running track, and a pingpong table.

Like most inmates, Skilling is likely to be required to work in prison labor jobs such as food service, plumbing and painting for 12 to 40 cents an hour. At that rate, he would make a little less than $20,000 if he served his full sentence; at the helm of Enron, he earned more than $151.7 million, equal to about $24,000 an hour, from 1999 to 2001, the time span of the indictment.

Skilling and Enron founder Ken Lay were convicted last May on charges stemming from the Enron collapse, which led to the loss of thousands of jobs, more than $60 billion in company stock and more than $2 billion in employee pensions.

Lay died in July of a heart attack before he could be sentenced, prompting a judge to vacate his conviction.

Lay "probably would have faced a similar fate if he'd been able to stand up for sentencing on the same day as Skilling," said Leslie Caldwell, a former federal prosecutor and one-time chief of the Justice Department's Enron Task Force.

Andrew Fastow, the former chief financial officer pegged as the mastermind behind the complicated financial schemes that ultimately doomed Enron, got six years in prison after pleading guilty. Several other executives are serving prison terms of between 18 months and five years.

An important distinction, said former Task Force attorney Sam Buell, is that those below Skilling all pleaded guilty to some offenses, expressed remorse and in some cases went on to cooperate with the prosecution. In several instances, prosecutors recommended leniency in those sentences.

"It's harder for a judge to do that, to exercise that leniency when the judge is dealing with the person at the top who didn't reach any kind of agreement in the case," Buell said.

A better comparison for Skilling's sentence, Caldwell said, are those received by other disgraced CEOs like Bernard Ebbers of Worldcom, serving a 25-year sentence; and Dennis Kozlowski of Tyco International Ltd., who got eight and one-third to 25 years in prison in another fraud case.

"I've always thought since the beginning of the Enron case that none of this ever would have happened without Jeff Skilling," Caldwell said. "I don't think it's inappropriate that he is getting the harshest sentence of anyone."

Skilling's attorney, Daniel Petrocelli, did not return several phone messages from The Associated Press.

From Top To Bottom (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, December 14, 2006

Former Enron chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling reported to a low-security federal prison in Minnesota yesterday to start serving a 24-year, six-month sentence for his role in one of history's biggest corporate scandals.

Skilling arrived at the facility in Waseca, about 75 miles south of Minneapolis, at 1:07 p.m. EST. Accompanying him in a sport-utility vehicle were his wife, Rebecca, his longtime assistant Sherri Sera and his younger brother Mark. Under federal guidelines, Skilling, 53, must serve at least 85 percent of his sentence -- or more than two decades. He is appealing his conviction by a jury in May on 19 counts of fraud, making false statements and conspiracy.

The Houston energy trading company that Skilling transformed became a symbol of accounting trickery after its December 2001 collapse into bankruptcy protection. Skilling and his co-defendant, Kenneth L. Lay, who died in July, bore the brunt of public vilification after financial scandals cost thousands of employees their jobs and savings.

In an emotional roller coaster, Skilling's immediate future was thrown into doubt Monday when a federal appeals court said it needed more time to consider whether he should remain free pending appeal. The next day, Circuit Judge Patrick E. Higginbotham settled that question with a two-page ruling ordering Skilling to report to prison.

But Higginbotham's ruling indicated that there were "serious frailties" with Skilling's conviction on several charges. That has given hope to Skilling's defense team that the appeals court may overturn at least some of his convictions. In his brief ruling, the judge did not cite problems with five counts of lying to auditors.

Defense attorney Daniel M. Petrocelli said in an e-mail message, "After all our arguments are presented, we are confident all the convictions will be reversed and Jeff will be given a new trial."

Over the course of the Enron probe, the biggest corporate investigation in history, more than 15 of the company's executives, including the leaders of its top three business units, pleaded guilty and agreed to cooperate against their former bosses.

Skilling's sentencing in October marked the last in a series of stiff penalties given to top executives convicted of corporate crimes committed in the booming '90s. His prison term is only a few months shorter than that of WorldCom founder Bernard J. Ebbers, who is serving a 25-year sentence in Louisiana for spearheading an accounting fraud at the telecommunications company he founded. Ebbers drove himself to prison this fall while his wife sat beside him in the front seat.

Skilling, who continues to profess his innocence and make the case that Enron was a healthy enterprise, will spend his time alongside 1,070 other inmates, most of whom were incarcerated for committing federal drug crimes, said Felicia Ponce, a prison spokeswoman.

Skilling will be required to work 7 1/2 hours per day at one of a variety of institutional jobs, including food service worker, warehouse employee and groundskeeper. Inmates earn between 12 and 40 cents per hour. The majority of the rooms in the prison, a converted college campus, contain space for four men, with a separate sink and shower area in a nearby location.

Skilling, who has openly wrestled with alcohol problems and depression, could slash more than a year off his sentence for successfully completing a prison treatment program.

A graduate of Harvard Business School, Skilling launched far-reaching ideas as a corporate consultant at McKinsey & Co. He was lured to work at Enron by Lay, the company's chairman, who died weeks after he was convicted on 10 conspiracy and false statements charges. A judge, following longstanding legal precedent, wiped out Lay's conviction because he had not had a chance to appeal before he died.

That means that Skilling, who left Enron a few months before its bankruptcy in December 2001, will be the highest-ranking leader of the energy firm to be called to account. Onetime finance chief Andrew S. Fastow, who pocketed more than $60 million for himself and his friends, is serving a six-year prison term. Former accounting executive Richard A. Causey will begin a 5 1/2 -year term Jan. 2.

No Fanfare As Skilling Walks Into Prison Life (HC)

By Kristen Hays, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, December 14, 2006

Man who once led energy giant is now federal inmate 29296-179

WASECA, MINN. — Jeff Skilling never saw himself as a felon, much less a federal inmate.

As of Wednesday, he is both, closing a major chapter in the Enron era of corporate crime that started five years ago this month when the company he professed to love mercilessly crashed and burned.

The 53-year-old ex-CEO's arrival at a southern Minnesota low-security federal prison Wednesday to begin serving a 24-year, four-month sentence had no fanfare.

He arrived in a silver Jeep Liberty in the passenger seat with his brother, Mark Skilling, in the driver's seat. His wife, Rebecca Carter, sat behind him, and next to her was Sherri Sera, his longtime administrative assistant at Enron who made an impassioned plea for fairness at his October sentencing.

The foursome took no notice of the small gaggle of photographers across from the prison's entrance. They parked the SUV at the front sliding-glass doors, got out and went inside, Skilling and his wife arm in arm.

He hugged his wife, then his brother, then Sera. Less than five minutes after they arrived, Mark Skilling, Carter and Sera emerged, climbed in the SUV and drove away.

A few minutes later, Skilling and several prison officials walked outside the building at the entrance — behind double fencing topped with shiny silver barbed wire — toward another building on the complex, which was once a University of Minnesota satellite campus.

The topcoat he wore when he arrived was already gone.

At this time five years ago, Skilling was talking to Securities and Exchange Commission investigators, insisting he truly believed Enron was healthy when he abruptly quit his post as CEO less than four months before the trading behemoth limped into bankruptcy.

He later did the same before two congressional committees, adamantly refusing to invoke his Fifth Amendment right to remain silent as others did, including former Enron Chairman Ken Lay.

Now Enron is a mere shell that exists to handle lawsuits and bankruptcy-related matters, its assets long gone, its stigma forever present. Lay, who fought a losing battle for vindication at trial earlier this year alongside Skilling, died of heart disease in July.

Skilling is now a number: federal inmate 29296-179.

Arrival generates buzzFor some in Waseca, a picturesque town of 10,000 flanked by two lakes largely frozen in the December cold, Skilling's arrival generated a little buzz. A prison employee parked at the entrance at daybreak Wednesday told colleagues arriving for work, "Skilling's coming today."

But to Jim Tippy, a retired warden at the Waseca facility who lives here, Skilling is just another inmate.

"It really doesn't faze me that much," Tippy said. "He's going to do his time somewhere. He was designated for this facility, so here he comes."

Sam Buell, a former prosecutor for the Justice Department's disbanded Enron Task Force who led the government's effort to secure the 2004 indictment against Skilling, said no one's incarceration is a cause for celebration, but "following through on the law's word is absolutely necessary to making effective our most potent mechanism for deterring people from seriously harming others."

Now a professor at the Washington University School of Law in St. Louis, Buell said that whether a multidecade sentence is needed to achieve such deterrence should be debated. Skilling received by far the harshest punishment of anyone convicted of Enron-related crimes.

"For major fraud that did in a huge public company, the answer has to be at least a substantial number of years. Whether decades are really necessary is a question we ought to be discussing as a society," Buell said.

Skilling had a glimmer of hope late Monday that he might be able to postpone or avoid prison when the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals stayed U.S. District Judge Sim Lake's November order that he report to prison by 2 p.m. Tuesday.

The panel issued the stay to give "careful consideration" to his bid to remain outside prison on bail pending the outcome of his appeal, which is expected to be filed early next year.

But late Tuesday afternoon, the appeals panel lifted the stay in an order that said, despite having found "serious frailties" on his convictions of conspiracy, securities fraud and insider trading, its review raised "no substantial question that is likely to result in the reversal of his convictions on all the charged counts."

That meant Skilling had to surrender. He wasn't given a specific deadline — but he arrived less than 24 hours after his initial surrender time.

Never weighed cutting dealSkilling was convicted in May of 19 counts of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and lying to auditors after a four-month trial. Lay also was convicted of 10 criminal counts in his case with Skilling and a separate case, but Lay died six weeks after jurors rendered their verdict. Lake erased Lay's convictions in October because he died before he was sentenced or could appeal.

Skilling staunchly maintains his innocence. At trial, he attributed Enron's demise to a skittish post-Sept. 11 market and a cash crisis that the company couldn't overcome rather than inner rot fueled by years of fraud.

Prosecutors countered that he, Lay and other top executives repeatedly lied about Enron's health to maintain an illusion of success when they knew Enron was propped up by unsustainable financial schemes.

When he learned what his sentence would be, he said he never considered cutting a deal with prosecutors in hopes of getting less time behind bars.

"I'm innocent," he said at the time. "I've told my children I'm innocent."

Skilling declined requests for an interview before he surrendered to prison.

He had hoped to be placed at a lockup in Butner, N.C. But the U.S. Bureau of Prisons instead chose the Waseca facility, which is partially surrounded by cornfields on the outskirts of the town.

Skilling will sleep either in a cubicle with another inmate or in a former dormitory room with three other men — a far cry from his mansion in Houston.

At his sentencing, he agreed to turn over $45 million to the government. That money will sit untouched through the course of his appeal. If he wins, he'll get the money back. If his convictions are upheld, the cash will be distributed to Enron shareholders who lost money when the company failed.

Scrushy Motion For A New Trial Denied By Judge (WSJ)

By Rick Brooks

Wall Street Journal, December 14, 2006

Richard M. Scrushy moved a step closer to a possible prison sentence as a federal judge rejected the HealthSouth Corp. founder's claim that jurors who convicted him of political-corruption charges were influenced by emails and a copy of an indictment downloaded from the Internet during deliberations.

U.S. District Judge Mark Fuller, of Montgomery, Ala., refused to grant a motion for a new trial by Mr. Scrushy and former Alabama Gov. Don Siegelman, both found guilty in June of participation in a scheme to pay $500,000 bribes in return for a spot on a state regulatory panel. Both argued that two jurors used outside information to strong-arm the rest of the jury into a conviction, and Mr. Scrushy's lawyers had pressed for a wide-ranging inquiry into possible jury misconduct.

While the judge concluded that jurors were "exposed" to the indictment and a description of jury-foreman responsibilities posted on the court's Web site, it made no difference in the outcome of the 11-day deliberations, he ruled. The jury "carefully weighed the evidence and reached a reasoned conclusion free of undue influence," Judge Fuller ruled in a 57-page order.

The guilty verdict on all six charges against Mr. Scrushy, including bribery, conspiracy and mail fraud, could put him behind bars for as long as 20 years, though the judge has wide discretion on sentencing. A sentencing date won't be set until resolution of a challenge to the jury-selection process by Messrs. Scrushy and Siegelman, who have claimed blacks are underrepresented in the pool from which jurors are chosen.

Arthur W. Leach, one of Mr. Scrushy's lawyers, said he plans to appeal yesterday's ruling. Mr. Scrushy's legal team has criticized Judge Fuller's handling of the matter, including a court hearing last month at which jurors were questioned.

The political-corruption conviction isn't related to the $2.7 billion accounting fraud at HealthSouth, a Birmingham, Ala., surgery and rehabilitation-services provider. Mr. Scrushy, ousted from HealthSouth in 2003 and acquitted last year of criminal fraud charges, has insisted he is innocent of any wrongdoing. Last month, Mr. Scrushy and the company settled claims tied to bonuses he received during the fraud and legal bills, with HealthSouth recording a $35 million "recovery" from him and a $10 million reduction in a legal-fees reserve, according to securities filings. Mr. Scrushy maintains HealthSouth violated his contract when it fired him, while the company has sued him for allegedly breaching his fiduciary obligations.

HP CEO Mark Hurd Asked To Explain Options Cashout Before Scandal (AP)

By Jordan Robertson,

San Francisco (AP) -- The congressional panel investigating Hewlett-Packard Co.'s boardroom spying probe has demanded that CEO Mark Hurd explain $1.37 million worth of options he exercised just before the scandal became public.

Hurd's cashout Aug. 25 — before HP disclosed the spying tactics in a Sept. 6 regulatory filing — did not appear to be part of a prescheduled program, the panel's ranking members, Reps. John Dingell and Bart Stupak, both Democrats from Michigan, said in a letter to Hurd publicly released Wednesday.

The activity came the same day Hurd was questioned by HP's outside attorneys investigating the circumstances surrounding the ill-fated effort to ferret out leaks by board members to the news media, the letter stated.

The congressmen asked Hurd to explain the reason for the transaction, seeking an answer on "whether executives are cashing in ('bullet dodging') while in possession of potentially damaging material facts that shareholders do not know."

Dingell and Stupak also asked in the letter to "please inform us whether any other HP officers or directors engaged in similar transactions during this period."

He was given until Dec. 21 to comply with the request. He testified Sept. 28 before the Committee on Energy and Commerce's Subcommittee on Oversight and Investigations.

HP said in a statement that it would comply with the panel's request.

Hurd and seven other HP executives and insiders cashed out options between Aug. 21 and Sept. 5. The company has previously said the transactions were unrelated to the scandal.

They fell within a three-week window each quarter when executives are allowed to sell shares after earnings are announced, HP said.

On Aug. 25, Hurd exercised options on 100,000 HP shares, about 6 percent of the total stock compensation package he received at the time of his hiring. The August sale netted him a profit of about $1.37 million, according to the filings.

The cashouts have also prompted attorneys who are suing top HP executives and directors over the scandal to add insider-trading claims to the lawsuit in California on behalf of all HP shareholders.

HP's stock price has remained relatively buoyant throughout the scandal, though the uproar has led to a purging of its top ranks and felony charges against two ousted HP insiders — former Chairwoman Patricia Dunn and former ethics chief Kevin Hunsaker — and three outside investigators, Ronald DeLia, Matthew DePante and Bryan Wagner.

They have all pleaded not guilty in Santa Clara County Superior Court to charges of identity theft and fraud for their roles. Their lawyers are scheduled to return to court Jan. 17.

Investors have largely applauded HP's efforts to move beyond the scandal, including the company's agreement last week to pay $14.5 million to settle a civil lawsuit brought by state Attorney General Bill Lockyer alleging unfair business practices related to the probe.

However, the FBI, the Securities and Exchange Commission, federal prosecutors and other agencies are still looking into the shady practice investigators used to impersonate HP directors and journalists to secretly obtain their confidential phone logs.

On Wednesday, HP shares lost 16 cents, to close at $39.67 on the New York Stock Exchange. The stock has risen since about 9 percent since Sept. 5 — the day before the scandal was disclosed — when it closed at $36.46.

HP CEO Asked To Explain Stock Sale (FT)

By Kevin Allison

Financial Times, December 14, 2006

The congressional panel investigating Hewlett-Packard's boardroom spying probe on Wednesday demanded that Mark Hurd, chief executive, explain a $1.37m stock sale he made just days before news of the scandal became public.

In a letter dated December 12, two Democratic members of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, Rep John Dingell and Rep Bart Stupak, said it appeared that Mr Hurd had voluntarily cashed in $1.37m in stock options on August 25. That is the same day Mr Hurd was questioned by HP's outside attorneys, who were condcting an investigation into the scandal.

The letter asked Mr Hurd to confirm the date and explain the alleged stock sale. It said the sale did "not appear to be a part of any prescheduled programme" of share disposals.

"Continuing revelations about widespread 'backdating' and 'spring-loading' abuses have raised questions about whether executives are cashing in ('bullet dodging') while in posession of potentially damaging material facts that shareholders do not know," it said.

HP said it had received the letter and that it would respond to the inquiry.

HP's shares were mostly unaffected in the weeks after the company admitted its detectives had spied on board members, journalists and their families in order to uncover the source of a boardroom leak.

The investigation's dubious tactics, which included the potentially fraudulent acquisition of telephone records and physical surveillance, sparked a furore that claimed the jobs of Patricia Dunn, HP's former chairman, and several other HP officials. Ms Dunn and four others are facing criminal charges including identity theft for their role in the scandal. All five pleaded not guilty.

Last week, HP announced that it would pay $14.5m to settle any civil complaints brought by the state of California in connection with the case. The company remains under investigation by federal authorities including the US Justice Department. It is also facing shareholder lawsuits.

Wednesday's news came as HP announced a three-year partnership with Microsoft, the world's biggest software maker. Under the deal, HP and Microsoft will invest $300m to develop new products and services for business communciations, content management and other areas where their businesses overlap. The partnership will cover product development, testing and marketing.

HP's shares fell 0.4 per cent to close at $39.67 on Wednesday.

H.P. Board Cuts Its Ties With Lawyer (NYT)

By Damon Darlin

New York Times, December 14, 2006

Hewlett-Packard's board has ended a crucial advisory relationship with Larry W. Sonsini, the powerful Silicon Valley lawyer, according to a person with close connections to the board.

The move is the latest repercussion from the company's spying on directors and journalists, which has led to the criminal prosecution of its former chairwoman and a senior company lawyer by California authorities, several federal investigations, $ 14.5 million in civil fines as well as considerable embarrassment for a company that prided itself on ethical behavior.

After the year's end, Mr. Sonsini and the firm he helped build, Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, will no longer serve as outside counsel to the board. The law firm will still do legal work for Hewlett-Packard. A company spokesman said yesterday that "Wilson Sonsini will continue to have a relationship with H. P."

Mr. Sonsini and his firm were not involved in the spying, which began after Patricia C. Dunn, the H. P. chairwoman, directed company lawyers and investigators to find the source of board leaks. But he was caught up in the events, and was criticized for failing to prevent the incident from damaging the H.P.

H.P.'s search for another lawyer to serve as outside counsel is expected to set off a scramble among Silicon Valley firms. "It's not a big revenue item for a law firm, but being able to say to other clients that 'I give advice to H.P.,' is a prestige thing," said a lawyer who did not want to be identified because he has done work for the company.

A spokeswoman for the Sonsini firm, Courtney Dorman, said, "There is a lot of ongoing work with H. P." The firm handled the transactional work for H. P.'s recent $4.5 billion acquisition of Mercury Interactive, a business software company.

Mr. Sonsini, who serves as chairman of the firm he joined in 1966, had no comment. Ms. Dorman also said that the firm's chief executive, John V. Roos, had no comment.

Mr. Sonsini has served as H. P.'s outside counsel since the mid-1990s and he advised the company during its contentious battle with shareholders over the merger with Compaq. The firm's clients include some of the region's most important companies, among them Apple, Google, Sun Microsystems and Applied Materials, and Mr. Sonsini helped take many of them public. He also serves as the chairman of the Regulation, Enforcement and Listing Standards Committee of the New York Stock Exchange and as chairman of its Legal Advisory Committee.

Mr. Sonsini has been faulted by some lawyers for not protecting the company after a director, Thomas J. Perkins, disclosed the practice of pretexting: the use of false identities to obtain the private phone records. H. P.'s detectives used the technique to get records of certain directors and journalists who covered the company.

In May 2006, another director, George A. Keyworth II, was identified as the source of the leak and was asked to resign. He refused to do so, but Mr. Perkins resigned, he now says, in anger over the investigation.

After the resignation, Mr. Sonsini, in his role as outside counsel, immediately interviewed Mr. Perkins. But he did not find that Mr. Perkins had resigned because of a disagreement with the company, which would have prompted the board to disclose the circumstances to the Securities and Exchange Commission. That has prompted an S.E.C. investigation.

Mr. Perkins also alerted the board to the use of pretexting, calling it illegal. In a response, Mr. Sonsini told him that the pretexting was "within legal limits," though that opinion turned out to be based on the advice of the H. P. lawyer, now facing charges, who in turn had received the opinion from a Boston lawyer sharing an office with one of H. P.'s private investigators.

The Sonsini firm in late August interviewed people involved in the spying, as well as Mark V. Hurd, the company chairman and chief executive, and concluded again that nothing illegal had occurred. In early September, the company filed a statement to the S.E.C. disclosing the pretexting and stating that it was "not generally unlawful."

A Congressional subcommittee asked Mr. Sonsini to testify during its investigation of the spying. He was called to testify alongside Ms. Dunn and had to sit in the witness seat for more than five hours, though she got the brunt of the queries. He defended his law firm's work during the hearing and said that he considered pretexting to be unethical and improper.

Hurd: HP Will Cut More To Continue Transformation (IDG)

By Elizabeth Montalbano

IDG News Service, December 14, 2006

December 12, 2006 (IDG News Service) -- NEW YORK -- Hewlett-Packard Co. continues to diversify and streamline its business according to goals CEO Mark Hurd set when he joined the company nearly two years ago. But the company still needs to cut costs to achieve operational efficiency, Hurd told financial analysts today.

"We are a company that is transforming, we are not a company that has transformed," Hurd said, speaking at a meeting of securities analysts here.

Hurd acknowledged that the cost of operations is still too high for the company to run as efficiently as it should, though the company has completed a 10% workforce reduction started last year as part of a huge restructuring effort. Since he took over, Hurd said HP has analyzed its cost structure, down to knowing its IT costs by employee, site and function.

"We do understand our costs now more than we did a year ago," Hurd said. But the company still needs to reduce costs and improve efficiency, which Hurd vowed HP will achieve in the next several years.

Complicating this goal is HP's acquisition strategy, as the company is working to absorb companies it purchased in 2006. The company also explained how it would integrate Mercury Interactive Corp., a software company HP acquired for $4.5 billion. The company is introducing a business technology optimization (BTO) software portfolio that brings together Mercury's applications management software with HP's systems and network management software marketed under its OpenView software family. BTO is a software product category intended to help companies use technology to meet business goals.

Hurd told securities analysts not to expect more acquisitions of this size in the future from HP, a comment that would appear to put an end to rumors that the company may buy security company Symantec Corp. Instead, the company will make smaller acquisitions as they strategically and operationally make sense, he said.

Before Hurd spoke, HP announced that it has agreed to acquire business intelligence services company Knightsbridge Solutions Holdings Corp., a 700-person company in Chicago, for an undisclosed sum.

Hurd made no mention of the boardroom spying scandal that hit the headlines in September, and which has former HP executives awaiting a criminal case that will decide whether they used illegal means to detect news leaks on the board. Instead, Hurd focused on operational efficiency and other goals, including deriving revenue from a more diverse mix of sales and services and improving its sales and customer service.

Hurd also thanked HP Executive Vice President and Chief Financial Officer Bob Wayman for his 37 years of service at the company. On Monday, Wayman said he would retire, effective Jan 1. Catherine Lesjak, the company's treasurer, who has been with HP for 20 years, will succeed Wayman.

From a financial perspective, HP weathered the scandal that rocked the company this year unscathed, earning nearly three times the profits in fiscal 2006, $6.2 billion, than it did in 2005, when the company earned $2.4 billion.

Hurd said HP still has more progress to make in terms of tapping its "total addressable market," which he said in 2009 will be about a trillion dollars. "After careful analysis, we've decided that is big," he deadpanned.

To achieve this goal, HP continues to try to improve its sales tactics, Hurd said. Traditionally, he said, it ran on the theory that "if we build great technology, customers will find it." Now, "we have this new advanced theory," he said. "If we actually try to sell the stuff, we'll actually get more revenue."

S.E.C. Eases Regulations On Business (NYT)

By Stephen Labaton

WASHINGTON, Dec. 13 — Responding to criticism that regulators had overreacted to years of major corporate scandals, the Securities and Exchange Commission on Wednesday issued a flurry of deregulatory orders and proposals intended to lower costs to public companies. It said the moves would not reduce investor protection.

In a daylong proceeding, the commission proposed a loose interpretation for smaller companies of an auditing provision of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 that has come under attack from many companies.

It also proposed a rule to make it easier for foreign companies to withdraw their securities from American markets. A number of companies have asked to withdraw, and officials said the current rules discouraged companies from listing on United States exchanges if they did not have the option of withdrawing later.

“We hope these proposals, when combined, will make the U.S. markets more attractive and we will get more companies here,” said John W. White, director of the commission’s division of corporation finance.

Among other noteworthy proposals the S.E.C. issued was one that would increase the financial qualifications for investors in hedge funds, to a net worth of $2.5 million from the current standard of $1 million. Officials said the proposal had the effect of adjusting the original rule for inflation, just as hedge funds are becoming more popular among some less wealthy people. The agency also proposed a new provision on fraud to protect hedge fund investors.

Some officials said the two proposals could blunt attempts to impose other tougher regulations or disclosure requirements on hedge funds. Six months ago, a federal appeals court said the commission exceeded its authority when it tried to force hedge fund managers to register with it.

The S.E.C. also adopted a rule that would save corporations the expense of mailing financial reports and proxy statements by enabling them to communicate with the vast majority of their investors through the Internet. (Investors can continue to receive paper copies of proxies and other material through the mail if they request them.)

And it proposed rules that would make it easier and less costly for banks to offer brokerage services.

Taken together, the proposals and rules are expected to provide enormous savings for public companies and Wall Street investment houses. Senior officials at the commission said the proposals and rules would not reduce the regulatory protections already afforded to investors.

The S.E.C.'s deregulatory push came a day after the Justice Department, in response to similar complaints, imposed new limits on federal prosecutors in white-collar corruption cases. Under those new guidelines, prosecutors in the field will now have to obtain permission from senior officials before trying to get companies that are under investigation to waive their attorney-client privilege.

In weighing whether to seek the indictment of a company, the prosecutors will also no longer be permitted to consider whether the company is paying the legal fees of an employee involved in the inquiry.

In recent weeks, Bush administration officials and business groups have criticized some of the changes in corporate law, securities rules and criminal procedures that were enacted in the wake of accounting frauds five years ago at Enron, WorldCom and other highflying companies.

It remains to be seen whether the decisions by the commission and the Justice Department will take political pressure off Congress to go further, or whether the business groups that have been critical of the S.E.C. rules and the Justice Department's approach will be able to persuade lawmakers to retrench further.

The commission's votes on all the measures Wednesday were unanimous, testimony to both the changed regulatory climate and the political skills of the agency's chairman, Christopher Cox, a former Republican member of Congress. He tailored the changes to avoid the divisiveness that had troubled the tenure of his predecessor.

Mr. Cox said the unifying theme of the proposals and the new rules was to increase the competitiveness and transparency of companies and markets.

"If America's markets aren't competitive, investors lose," he said. "If America's markets are not transparent and open, investors lose."

Like the decision at the Justice Department, the changes announced by the commission on Wednesday fell short of what some companies and groups had sought. In the case of the auditing rules, for instance, many businesses had sought an exemption from the requirements of Section 404 of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act. That provision requires public companies to assess the controls they have put in place to ensure that their financial reports are reliable.

Instead of a blanket exemption, officials said, the proposed guidance would give many small companies a powerful new tool in restricting their auditors from engaging in what the executives viewed as expensive and unnecessary audits of financial controls that had minimum impact on financial statements. A companion new auditing standard is to be proposed next week by the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board.

Under the guidance proposed by the S.E.C., executives would evaluate the design of only those financial controls that might carry the risk of having a material impact on financial statements. Commission officials emphasized that the guidance is being drafted to be less onerous on smaller or less intricate companies.

"Companies of all sizes and complexities will be able to conduct their evaluations more effectively and efficiently by following the proposed guidance," Mr. Cox said. "As smaller companies have less complex internal control systems than larger companies, this approach enables smaller companies, in particular, to scale and tailor their evaluation methods and procedures to fit their own facts and circumstances."

SEC Votes To Ease Audit Requirements (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

Washington Post, December 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0106240

Securities regulators unanimously embraced a plan that they said would slash costs and restore common sense to an audit rule attacked as too expensive by business groups and lawmakers.

The Securities and Exchange Commission voted 5 to 0 yesterday to instruct corporate managers to focus their reviews on the areas that pose the greatest risk of fraud on financial statements.

Congress required executives and auditors to scrutinize corporate financial controls in the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley Act, which was passed after huge frauds at Enron and WorldCom. The rule, which cost businesses millions of dollars more than regulators anticipated, has been a lightning rod almost ever since, becoming what SEC Chairman Christopher Cox called "the single biggest challenge" in the accountability law.

SEC staff members said that under the new proposal, they would urge corporate managers to use their best judgment in evaluating controls, rather than requiring them to scrutinize specific things such as the integrity of executives and the accuracy of petty cash accounts. But, rejecting an approach advocated by some business interests, regulators refused to create special exemptions for small companies. Instead, they said their plan encourages managers to develop tailor-made reviews based on the size and complexity of their businesses.

Corporate managers have criticized outside auditors for performing unnecessary and expensive work to protect themselves from liability and make more money. Accounting firms argue that the high costs were the result of long-deferred maintenance and have since declined. The Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, which oversees the accounting industry, will make companion proposals for accountants on Tuesday.

SEC Commissioner Roel C. Campos, a Democrat, said the agency's proposal and the forthcoming rule proposal for auditors "will significantly reduce and in many cases wholly eliminate the inefficiencies and excessive costs while retaining all of the good."

Commissioner Paul S. Atkins, a Republican, said the plan may not be enough to force executives and auditors to focus on the most meaningful and risky aspects of their companies' finances. But SEC staff members expressed hope that their proposal was flexible enough so they would not need to revisit the issue.

The SEC proposal will be subject to a two-month public-comment period. Regulators hope they can pass a final version by April, in time for companies and auditors to use next year, said John W. White, director of the SEC's corporation finance division.

Separately, the five commissioners voted unanimously to propose new rules for investing in hedge funds, which are lightly regulated pools of capital designed for wealthy and sophisticated investors. The SEC has not changed its threshold for investing in the funds since 1982, Cox said, requiring long-overdue adjustments for inflation.

Concerns are mounting that more average investors and pension funds are pouring money into the $1 trillion hedge fund industry, which is subject to little oversight. A federal appeals court this year tossed out an SEC rule that would make fund managers open their books and register with the agency.

Under the current rules, individual investors need to earn an annual income of $200,000 for the past two years or have net worth of at least $1 million. The new proposal would force people to meet the old income criteria and show that they own at least $2.5 million in assets to be eligible to invest in hedge funds.

"We want to make sure that we send a strong signal . . . that caution is in order," Cox said. "We're taking steps to modernize the standard so it will be abundantly clear that these investments are not for mom and pop, unless mom and pop are very sophisticated investors."

The commission also proposed allowing companies to offer investors a choice in how they receive proxy materials and to voluntarily put that information online, which eventually could supplant paper documents.

Late yesterday, SEC leaders reissued for public comment a controversial plan that would require the majority of mutual fund board members, including board chairmen, to be independent from management. The proposal has been opposed by Fidelity Investments Chairman Edward C. "Ned" Johnson III, among others, and was rejected this year by a federal court.

SEC To Investors: More Internet, Less Hedge Funds (WSJ)

By Kara Scannell

Wall Street Journal, December 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0106241

WASHINGTON -- Advancing several of its chairman's priorities, the Securities and Exchange Commission moved toward providing shareholders more corporate information electronically, shrinking the pool of investors who can invest in hedge funds and easing rules that critics argue hurt American competitiveness.

The electronic-information rule could affect nearly all shareholders within a year or so. The rule, approved unanimously yesterday, allows companies to distribute via the Internet annual reports and materials on board elections and other matters put before shareholders for a vote, while enabling investors to opt to continue to receive paper reports.

The so-called e-proxy rule will cut printing and mailing costs for corporations. But it will also make it cheaper for activist stockholders to launch fights against corporate boards, because shareholders of companies that distribute information to investors electronically will be able to do likewise.

The agency said it plans to make the e-proxy model mandatory by January 2008, though some members expressed concern about doing that.

Trying to boost U.S. competitiveness, the commission issued guidance it says will help companies be more "efficient and effective" when complying with a controversial section of the Sarbanes-Oxley law governing public companies' internal controls over financial statements. It also proposed a rule to make it easier for foreign companies to withdraw from SEC disclosure rules. Business groups have said U.S. regulations deter foreign companies from listing their shares on U.S. stock exchanges.

"If America's markets aren't competitive, investors lose. If America's markets aren't transparent and open, investors lose," said SEC Chairman Christopher Cox. If investors can't trust the stewards of the companies, he added, "we all lose," because they won't invest.

On hedge funds, the commission proposed cutting the number of individual investors who invest in the loosely regulated investment pools, which cater to the wealthy and institutions, including pension funds and endowments. Under current rules, which also apply to private-equity funds and venture-capital funds, individuals can invest in such funds if they have a net worth of $1 million or an annual income of $200,000 in the previous two years.

REGULATORY CHANGE

The SEC took several actions Wednesday on Chairman Cox's agenda. Among them: • Approved optional electronic delivery of proxy statements and annual reports by 2008 proxy season. Investors can opt for paper.

• Issued guidance to firms making the internal-controls provision (Section 404) in Sarbanes-Oxley less onerous.

• Raised minimum threshold for individual investors in hedge funds to $2.5 million in investment assets, from $1 million of net worth.

• Will revisit its mutual-fund governance rule.

• Proposed easier way for foreign companies to withdraw from U.S. reporting rules.

Source: Securities and Exchange Commission

If adopted, the new rule would build on that standard, requiring hedge-fund and private-equity-fund investors to have $2.5 million in investment assets, excluding primary residences. The existing standard, in place since 1982, was intended to protect small, unsophisticated investors from getting in over their heads by pouring money into funds that often are riskier than, say, mutual funds.

The new rule could reduce the number of qualified investors by 88%, said SEC Commissioner Paul Atkins, a Republican who voted for the proposal. The SEC says 1.87% of all U.S. households were qualified to invest in hedge funds in 1982; today, 8.5% are qualified. The proposed rule will reduce that percentage to 1.29%.

The proposed rule would not apply to venture-capital funds. SEC staff members who drafted the rule said they wanted to avoid crimping the amount of capital available to such funds, because of their role in funding small start-up businesses. The 1982 standards would still apply to venture-capital investors.

Mr. Atkins expressed skepticism about that explanation, saying that it sounded like a "political rationale," and that venture-capital funds can be just as risky and vulnerable to fraud as hedge funds.

Roel Campos, a Democratic commissioner, said there was a need for "very moderate oversight" of the hedge-fund industry to see the full picture of risk to investors and the market. He suggested a carrot-and-stick approach: easing marketing restrictions for hedge-fund advisers that register with the SEC and submit themselves to a degree of regulatory oversight. A previous attempt by the SEC to require many hedge-fund advisers to register was struck down by an appeals court.

The SEC also voted unanimously to propose making it illegal for hedge funds to defraud, deceive or omit material facts to investors. The proposal would restore a similar rule voided earlier this year, when the appeals court struck down the hedge-fund registration requirement.

The SEC plans to seek public comment on the rules proposed yesterday, a process that often results in proposals being altered before adopted in final form, unless the commission decides to abandon them.

Mr. Cox said the e-proxy rule -- the only one approved in final form yesterday -- was one of several steps toward changing how investors access information. It dovetails with two other technology-based initiatives Mr. Cox is pushing. One will allow investors to quickly compare data in a corporation's financial statement with other companies' data. The other is an upgrade to the search capabilities of the SEC's Internet-based system for storing corporate financial reports, known as Edgar.

"We're trying to qualitatively improve the disclosures investors get," he said.

Business groups have been wary of using Internet-based proxies -- the documents that outline matters put before shareholders for votes. Their main fear is that activist investors would find it much easier to put their proposals before all of a company's shareholders. Consumer groups, on the other hand, have warned that electronic proxies could disenfranchise investors who don't use the Internet.

Some commissioners expressed concern about making the e-proxy rule mandatory, given other changes the SEC is weighing for the proxy process. Commissioners also fretted that a mandatory rule might crimp participation by shareholders without Internet access.

On Sarbanes-Oxley, the SEC's guidance appears to be an artful compromise aimed at addressing criticism about the law's Section 404, which requires companies to review internal controls and procedures over financial statements to lessen the chance of fraud and mistakes. The new guidance lets corporate managers use their discretion to focus on controls and processes that they feel pose the greatest risk and could result in major misstatements.

John White, director of the SEC's corporation-finance division, said the guidance is intended "to foster the preparation of reliable financial statements" and "bring information about material weaknesses into the public view." The guidance, which doesn't provide specific examples, allows management to make judgment calls "in light of the size, nature and complexity of the company," said an SEC staff member. It allows small companies more flexibility, officials said.

The SEC also voted to reissue a rule -- rejected by an appeals court this year -- that would require mutual-fund boards to have more independent members. The appeals court ruled that the SEC didn't properly consider the rules' economic impact, so the SEC plans to make two reports on the rules' costs and benefits available as part of its public-comment process.

Monster Worldwide Restates 9 Years Of Earnings (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, December 14, 2006

Monster Worldwide, owner of the most used online job-listing service, reduced past earnings by $271.9 million yesterday to correct stock-based compensation costs, and it disclosed more than $500,000 in improper payments to its founder, Andrew J. McKelvey.

The restatements cut net income for 2005 by $9.24 million, for 2004 by $14.4 million, for 2003 by $27 million, for 2002 by $44.9 million, for 2001 by $65.6 million, and for the cumulative period of 1997 through 2000 by $110.8 million, the company said in a statement.

Monster, which is based in New York, disclosed payments to Mr. McKelvey, 72, who resigned as chief executive on Oct. 6 and stepped down as chairman emeritus three weeks later after refusing to answer options-related questions. He has repaid $533,000 and may pay more, Monster said.

From 1997 to 2003, options grants were misdated “intentionally, by persons formerly in positions of responsibility,” to increase their value, the company said.

Monster is among at least 80 companies that have restated their financial results or said they would correct options accounting. The company said in June that internal auditors, the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange

Commission had started reviewing options grants. On Nov. 22, Monster fired its general counsel, Myron F. Olesnyckyj, amid the investigations.

Investigators found that the company had paid for health care costs of nine relatives of Mr. McKelvey and nine people who were personally employed by him at varying times since 1997. It also granted stock options to four of his personal employees.

Monster also disclosed payments of thousands of dollars in rent and aircraft fees to businesses owned or controlled by Mr. McKelvey.

Kelly Flynn, an analyst at UBS, wrote yesterday in a note to clients that the transactions were “troubling” and might weigh on Monster’s reputation and increase the risk of further regulatory inquiries.

But Glenn Greene of ThinkEquity Partners in Chicago, who has a buy rating on the shares, said, “This puts the issue behind them, and it doesn’t impact the fundamentals of the business going forward.”

In trading yesterday, Monster’s stock fell 31 cents, to $44.18.

New Fed Case In Muni Market Looks Like The Old Case: Joe Mysak (BLOOM)

By Joe Mysak

Bloomberg, December 14, 2006

Dec. 13 (Bloomberg) -- This is how the government's case against the municipal market will look.

The Department of Justice will put out a press release. It will read something like this:

``In the first prosecution of its kind, the Justice Department's Antitrust Division today brought criminal securities fraud charges against a securities brokerage firm for using fictitious noncompetitive bids and other misrepresentations during the restructuring of a municipal bond escrow account."

There you have it. This passage contains almost everything you need to know about what's going on in the municipal market right now. There's the Justice Department's Antitrust Division, criminal charges, and anticompetitive practices in connection with the reinvestment of money raised in a bond sale.

Yet the above paragraph isn't a look into the future. Insert ``California" in front of ``securities brokerage firm" and ``Tampa, Florida," in front of ``municipal bond escrow account," and you have the wording of a Department of Justice press release sent out on Sept. 28, 1995, more than 11 years ago.

Here's the second paragraph: ``The criminal securities fraud charge, along with a wire fraud charge, were filed in U.S. District Court in San Francisco against Municipal Government Investment Associates Inc., a San Francisco brokerage firm."

Bad Bids

What happened? The indictment of MGIA was at the time thought to be the first shot in the government's battle to reform the reinvestment of proceeds business, and so it was.

The press release went on to quote Assistant Attorney General Anne K. Bingaman saying that the charges resulted from a continuing federal grand jury investigation into collusive bidding and fraud in the municipal bond escrow restructuring business.

The parties involved all disgorged profits and paid fines.

And then? And then five years later, in April 2000, 16 securities firms paid $120 million to settle charges that they had systematically ripped off municipalities for the bonds used to fund escrow accounts.

These 16 had to pay another $20 million to various issuers, and were later joined by a number of other securities firms. None of them, of course, admitted to liability in what was known as the ``yield-burning" investigation; they merely ``settled charges."

Again I say: What happened? MGIA was the first shot in a war that was never fought. At some point, this entire investigation took a very different turn, indeed.

`Anticompetitive Practices'

This is a funny thing. Or maybe it is a tragic-funny thing. Here it is more than a decade later, and a full investigation and round of settlements later, and the government says it is still looking at bid-rigging, price-fixing, kickbacks and ``anticompetitive practices" in the municipal bond market's reinvestment of proceeds business.

I don't understand. Back in 2000, after the global settlement was announced (at least to hear the lawyers tell the story), the government had succeeded in cleaning up Muniland. They had changed the way Wall Street and Main Street did business. Right? And wasn't that a great thing?

Well, guess what? We are right back to where we started with MGIA. The firm was doing the same things that everyone is so exercised about today. At some point, the Feds stopped pursuing the relative small-timers in the snake-pit that is apparently the reinvestment of proceeds business, and instead focused on the big Wall Street firms that systematically mispriced the Treasury securities used in escrow accounts.

What Happened?

A pretty good case can be made that the Feds should have stuck with the MGIA strand, where the dealings were dirtier and nastier and perhaps resulted in more lasting damage to public finance.

MGIA was run and owned 65 percent by one guy who also worked for another firm involved in the same Tampa, Florida, transaction. MGIA had a secret profit-splitting arrangement with the larger firm (Kidder Peabody & Co.) that ``won'' the right to provide the city of Tampa with an investment agreement. The Department of Justice said the bidding was rigged in Kidder's favor.

And then there's the whole matter of the ``value'' of the agreement. You can see why people are so anxious to get into this business. Kidder paid the city $1.32 million for the right to provide an investment agreement that was, the government said, worth $3 million more -- and then split that profit with the guy at MGIA.

These are all the elements that the Feds say they are so interested in, now.

Who was minding the store? For years now, the market's regulators have been saying they don't regulate the swaps and derivatives and investment-agreement business. This was apparently a license to pillage the public treasuries. And yet more than a decade ago, they were heading down that road. They had found all sorts of criminal and anticompetitive practices, and had even managed to win a case. And then that was it.

Why didn't they finish the job? Is the market better off for the extra decade of profitable, unfathomable shenanigans?

What happened?

CRIMINAL LAW:

Feds Won't Let Some Sex Offenders Go (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Justice Department is planning to detain an undetermined number of violent sex offenders after they have completed their federal prison sentences as part of a program aimed at protecting children, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says.

The initiative, modeled after "civil commitment" laws in 18 states that have kept 2,000 sex offenders locked up for mental health treatment after they served their sentences, will identify federal inmates who authorities think would pose a threat if freed.

It's unclear how officials will decide which offenders should be held past their sentences.

The potential impact on the federal prison system could be significant: Of the system's 190,000 inmates, 11,000 are sex offenders.

"We're working with the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) to see how we implement" the plan, Gonzales says.

So far, officials have referred 11 federal inmates for possible commitment after their time is served, the BOP says. The offenders would be treated at a prison in Butner, N.C.

Civil commitment laws, which survived a U.S. Supreme Court challenge in 1997, have been one of the most extreme measures states have used to clamp down on repeat sex offenders. This year, Congress gave the U.S. government the authority to impose such a program.

Congress has "given us the right to pursue (civil commitments) and we are going to," Gonzales told prosecutors here last week.

Civil commitment programs for sex offenders have passed legal muster on the state level because courts have viewed them as similar to laws allowing confinements of mentally ill criminals until they are deemed fit to return to society.

For years, authorities from Virginia to Washington state have detained sex offenders well past their release dates and kept them in state treatment facilities. Civil trials usually determine whether offenders should stay in custody past their sentences, be released or submit to monitoring similar to parole.

Of the more than 2,000 sex offenders who have been committed across the nation, only 10% have been released after rehabilitation, says Dennis Doren, a Wisconsin psychologist and BOP consultant.

Critics say that such programs unfairly extend punishments beyond sentences set by judges and juries. "This is merely camouflage for lifetime sentences for some offenses," says William Buckman of the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers.

Gonzales Concentrates Outrage On Child Abuse (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson, Usa Today

USA Today, December 14, 2006

Horrific Internet images of tortured kids haunt Justice Department chief

WASHINGTON — In the spring of 2005, new U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales was still getting to know the Justice Department and its 100,000 employees when he stopped at Drew Oosterbaan's office a few blocks from the department's headquarters.

What happened during the next hour, Gonzales says, haunts him to this day.

Oosterbaan, director of the department's Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section, introduced his new boss to a branch of crime that had been largely overshadowed by the department's post-Sept. 11 focus on preventing terrorist attacks.

Gonzales watched silently as streaming video captured from the Internet showed fathers sexually assaulting their daughters, some younger than 10. Another segment showed men defecating on screaming babies whose tiny hands and feet were tied down with bath towels.

Rebecca Gonzales, the attorney general's wife, vividly recalls that day. The nation's top law enforcement officer, she says, arrived home clearly shaken.

"He didn't cry, but it was close," she says. "That was a terrible day. It changed him. That day put fire in him."

Passion and emotion aren't things the public sees much of from Gonzales, the former White House counsel from Texas who had long been a quiet, deferential confidant of President Bush. Unlike his predecessor, John Ashcroft, Gonzales, 51, often fades into the background at his own news conferences, content to allow subordinates to describe Justice's actions.

Until the subject turns to child abuse.

Punishing abusers has become a particular passion with Gonzales, who is emphasizing the issue like no other attorney general before him. He has launched an energetic campaign by the Justice Department to confront sexual predators with new prosecution tactics, new programs and the promise of more money to combat the problem.

Arrests and prosecutions in child exploitation cases have risen sharply since Gonzales took office nearly two years ago. Federal prosecutions jumped last year by the largest one-year margin in the past decade, from 1,244 to 1,576.

The get-tough tactics toward sexual predators include a plan to detain federal offenders after they have completed their prison sentences if they are deemed to be a potential danger to the public. Eighteen states have similar programs.

Gonzales acknowledges that preventing terrorism and the government's controversial surveillance and detention programs are his department's top priorities. However, in speeches and interviews he seems most energetic when describing — sometimes in surprisingly graphic detail — crimes against children and his desire to prevent them.

In an interview, Gonzales talks of being outraged by the images he's seen in evidence collected by investigators: Fathers forcing toddlers to perform oral sex. Physically imposing men abusing young girls. Some assaults are punctuated by the screams of frightened children, he says.

"To see the trust of these children violated is very powerful," Gonzales says.

Ernie Allen, president of the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, acknowledges that the explicit nature of Gonzales' rhetoric may be shocking to some.

"I'm sure some people have counseled him that a senior official in government shouldn't be speaking in such graphic terms," Allen says. "He uses terms I've never heard a public official utter. I'm sure there is an element of risk to that. But what the attorney general has done is mobilize existing resources in a way that has never been done. The best way to do that is through the bully pulpit."

Allen says Gonzales communicates a "sense of urgency" no other public official of his rank has attempted. "What he is doing," Allen says, "is historic."

During a meeting with federal prosecutors last week in Washington, Gonzales said, "People often ask me what keeps me up at night. Obviously the threat of a terrorist attack never leaves my mind, and it is the top priority of our government to keep that from happening.

"But it is the faces of child victims that haunt my dreams. I can see their eyes, that awful emptiness, as if their tiny souls are trying to detach themselves from their desecrated bodies. I see the victims' images as part of my work. But now they are part of my heart, and I am not going to tire in this fight to protect them."

During his first meeting with Gonzales in February 2005, Oosterbaan recalls, he wanted to impress upon the new attorney general how the Internet had taken the exploitation of children to a new level.

Oosterbaan says he figured the best way to do that — and hopefully gain an important ally in fighting crimes against children — would be to show Gonzales the evidence.

Oosterbaan identified some of the most disturbing photographs seized by law enforcement officials. At the last moment, fearing the images would be too graphic, the career prosecutor scrapped the plan. "I couldn't scar him," Oosterbaan says.

Weeks later, Gonzales wanted a more detailed briefing. Oosterbaan remembers a phone call from a Gonzales aide who said, "Drew, he wants to see the images."

Gonzales arrived at Oosterbaan's sixth-floor office on New York Avenue NW and sat quietly as graphic videos of infants and young girls streamed across a computer screen, Oosterbaan says.

"Anyone who has seen these images are never the same, and that was true with the attorney general," Oosterbaan says. "He didn't say a lot. You almost see something drain out of people when they watch this. That is what I saw."

From that day, Oosterbaan says, he's never had a more influential advocate. Aside from Gonzales' emphasis on aggressive prosecutions and keeping convicted sex offenders in custody, the attorney general has embraced a range of initiatives aimed at protecting kids:

•The Adam Walsh Child Protection and Safety Act, signed into law this year, established federal penalties for convicted sex offenders who fail to register with authorities when they move from state to state.

•In May, Gonzales rolled out the Project Safe Childhood program, modeled after the 2001 Project Safe Neighborhood initiative, which targeted gun crimes.

The new program designates prosecutors in each of the nation's 94 U.S. attorney's offices to coordinate exploitation investigations and prosecutions with help from state and local authorities.

•Gonzales has created a group to work with Internet service providers to try to extend the time companies store user history data. Such an agreement, he says, would allow investigators to more easily track suspected child abusers.

Gonzales' interest in securing such data has drawn criticism from some privacy advocates who fear such information could be tapped for investigations that do not involve child exploitation.

The Electronic Frontier Foundation, a free speech advocacy group, has argued that the stored data could unnecessarily expose personal details of users who have no ties to criminal activity.

"It treats everyone as a criminal just in case it might be useful to the government," foundation lawyer Kevin Bankston says. "It's an incredibly invasive measure."

Oosterbaan says the initiative reflects an attorney general willing to do whatever it takes to curb crimes against children.

DOJ_NMG_0106247

"What I see is a powerful and deep sense of obligation and responsibility," he says. "I have never heard a man in his position talk about the problem the way we (investigators) talk about it."

Gonzales is not the first attorney general to turn a spotlight on an enforcement issue traditionally relegated to the background.

Janet Reno, whose term spanned a series of national crises — from the first World Trade Center attack in 1993 to the international custody dispute over Cuban boy Elian Gonzalez in 2000 — focused on the safety needs of Native Americans.

Reno made frequent visits to Indian country and expanded the FBI's presence on reservations to help tribes with basic law enforcement. "He realizes that the placement of prevention and enforcement programs up front pays enormous dividends down the road," Reno says of Gonzales.

Seated in an ornate conference room that once was Robert F. Kennedy's office at Justice, Gonzales — the father of three sons, ages 23, 14 and 11 — says he doesn't necessarily want the pursuit of sexual predators to define his tenure. It's clear, however, that the issue isn't just his passion, it's his wife's as well.

Rebecca Gonzales, who once worked in the Texas attorney general's sexual assault division, is a volunteer at the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children.

"I'm firmly committed to going after terrorists," Alberto Gonzales says. "But this is a special category because we are talking about protecting the most vulnerable in our society: our children. As a father, the thought of anyone harming my sons is not anything you want to think about."

Former Children's Editor Sentenced For Soliciting Sex From Minor (AP)

By Rodrique Ngowi

AP, December 14, 2006

BOSTON— A former editor for the company that publishes the venerable Weekly Reader, a newspaper for elementary school children, was sentenced Wednesday to six years in prison for soliciting sex from a minor.

Noel Neff, 47, of Norwalk, Conn., also was fined $2,500, barred from using the Internet to access child pornography sites and ordered not to associate with anyone under the age of 18 without supervision from an adult who is aware of his criminal record.

"I made a mistake and I pay a heavy price for that mistake," Neff told U.S. District Court Judge George O'Toole shortly before sentencing. "I am extremely remorseful for what I have done."

Neff did not visibly react when the sentence was read. As federal marshals put him in handcuffs and led him away, he quietly said to his brothers, sisters and a nephew: "Take care, I love you."

His attorney, Francis O'Reilly, said his client planned to appeal.

"Our position is that a sentence of 60 months would have been more appropriate in this case," O'Reilly said.

A federal jury in May convicted Neff of using Internet to induce a minor to engage in sexual activity, which carries a mandatory minimum of five years in prison, and a maximum of 30.

DOJ_NMG_0106248

Neff was arrested in July 2005 in a parking lot at the Franklin Village Mall. Investigators said he had arranged to meet with a 14-year-old boy named Chris for sex.

Chris was actually an FBI agent who had been posing as a minor and exchanging instant messages with Neff for two months, according to authorities.

Weekly Reader Corp., is based in Stamford, Conn., and publishes several magazines and periodicals for students, including Weekly Reader.

The company fired Neff a few days after his arrest.

At the sentencing, O'Toole recommended Neff be sent to a federal facility in Butner, North Carolina and attend a sex-offender treatment program offered there.

The judge also ordered a supervised release for five years and that Neff submit to drug tests and periodic polygraph tests.

Ex-church Camp Leader Arrested On Child Porn Charges; Allegations Include A Former Camper (AP)

AP, December 14, 2006

(AP) - COLUMBIA, Illinois-A former church camp leader was arrested on child pornography charges and accused of trying to coax girls, at least one of them a former camper, to pose partly naked or perform a sex act.

Aaron Niles, 20, began chatting with the girls online using the screen names "loverboyniles" and "godrocks30" after working at a Baptist summer camp in 2005, Columbia Police Chief Joe Edwards said Wednesday.

He was arrested Tuesday on three counts of child pornography and one count of indecent solicitation of a child related to incidents in April and May.

At least one of the girls in the allegations had attended the summer camp where Niles was a volunteer team leader, police said.

Investigators were still combing through Niles' computer Wednesday, but "once we complete this, the potential for additional charges are there," Edwards said.

He said investigators also were asking parents whose children may have attended the Super Summer Baptist Camp in Greenville in 2005 to check their children's computer for Niles' online user name.

Niles was jailed on $10,000 (â‚¬7,550) bond. He has an unlisted telephone number in Waterloo, near Columbia, about 15 miles (24 kilometers) southeast of St. Louis.

In a statement Tuesday, the pastor of Niles' Columbia church said the allegations left the congregation "deeply saddened."

"We hurt for the families who have been hurt by this," the statement from First Baptist Church pastor Jonathan Peters said. "We, as the leadership of this church family, have done our best to both protect our church and to demonstrate compassion to everyone involved. We have sought to show love without leniency."

U.S. Gets Subpoena To Force ACLU To Return Leaked Memo (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, December 14, 2006

Federal prosecutors are demanding that the American Civil Liberties Union turn over all copies of a secret document it has obtained, in what is apparently the first time a criminal grand jury subpoena has been used in an attempt to seize leaked material, the ACLU and legal experts said yesterday.

Prosecutors obtained the subpoena Nov. 20, saying their demand was part of an investigation into an alleged violation of the Espionage Act of 1917.

The ACLU says that the 3 1/2 -page document contains no information that should be classified and that the memo is only "mildly embarrassing" to the government. Some legal scholars said the case bears similarities to events in the "Pentagon Papers" case more than three decades ago.

The subpoena issued in the Southern District of New York provides the latest example of the Justice Department's aggressive use of the anti-spying law, a broadly worded and little-used statute that has become the bedrock in a series of leak-related investigations by the Bush administration.

In a motion filed in federal court, the ACLU called the subpoena an "unprecedented abuse" of the government's grand-jury powers that violates the First Amendment and is aimed at suppressing information rather than investigating a crime.

The civil liberties group -- which has been sharply critical of the Bush administration's terrorism and detainee policies -- said it is prohibited from disclosing the contents of the document. But it described the document as "nothing more than a policy, promulgated in December 2005, that has nothing to do with national defense."

"No official secrets act has yet been enacted into law, and the grand jury's subpoena power cannot be employed to create one," the ACLU wrote in its brief, which was filed with U.S. District Judge Jed S. Rakoff.

Officials at the Justice Department in Washington referred questions about the case to the office of U.S. Attorney Michael J. Garcia in New York. A spokeswoman there confirmed the subpoena but declined to comment further.

First Amendment advocates and experts in national security law said the subpoena represents a dramatic bid by the government to punish or intimidate media organizations and advocacy groups that attempt to publicize government policies and actions.

Lucy Dalglish, executive director of the Arlington-based Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, called the subpoena "disturbing," saying it would be easy for the government to attempt a similar move against a news outlet that had obtained a sensitive document as part of its investigative work.

"It shows me a pattern of aggressiveness to retrieve information that has escaped from the bubble," Dalglish said. "It's intimidation. It's trying to use all sorts of different methods at their disposal to stop proliferation of leaks from the federal government and to prevent public oversight of the executive branch."

William C. Banks, a law professor at Syracuse University and co-author of a leading textbook on national security law, compared the subpoena to a telegram sent in 1971 by then-Attorney General John N. Mitchell to the publisher of the New York Times, warning that publication of a leaked report on the Vietnam War violated the Espionage Act and demanding the return of the Pentagon Papers to the Defense Department.

"It's the same kind of scare tactics, it seems to me," Banks said, adding that he doubts the judge would enforce the subpoena because previous court rulings appear to support the ACLU's position.

The government is pursuing a series of leak investigations related to alleged violations of the Espionage Act and other laws governing the protection of classified information. These include a probe into the disclosure of a warrantless-surveillance program operated by the National Security Agency and the prosecution of two former employees of a pro-Israel lobbying group for allegedly violating the espionage statute.

ACLU officials said that they were told they were not the targets of the probe and that prosecutors had made clear they knew the identity of the person who had provided the group with the memo. Executive Director Anthony D. Romero told reporters that the organization has no idea how the government learned it had the memo.

The ACLU says in its brief that the document was sent as an unsolicited e-mail on Oct. 23 and that the e-mail and one printed copy of the document have been isolated pending litigation. The document is stamped "secret" and contains the heading "Information Paper," according to the subpoena.

The subpoena was issued after the ACLU refused a verbal demand from Assistant U.S. Attorney Jennifer G. Rodgers to turn over all copies of the memo, the group said. Despite the government's keen interest in the document, Romero said, the document does not appear to be particularly important or damaging.

"The government has made this document much more newsworthy now than it perhaps was at first blush," Romero said.

U.S. Subpoena Is Seen As Bid To Stop Leaks (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, December 14, 2006

Federal prosecutors are trying to force the American Civil Liberties Union to turn over copies of a classified document it received from a source, using what legal experts called a new extension of the Bush administration's efforts to protect national-security secrets.

The novelty in the government's approach is in its broad use of a grand jury subpoena, which is typically a way to gather evidence, rather than to confiscate all traces of it. But the subpoena issued to the A.C.L.U. seeks "any and all copies" of a document e-mailed to it unsolicited in October, indicating that the government also wants to prevent further dissemination of the information in the document.

The subpoena was revealed in court papers unsealed in federal court in Manhattan yesterday. The subject of the grand jury's investigation is not known, but the A.C.L.U. said that it had been told it was not a target of the investigation.

The subpoena, however, raised the possibility that the government had found a new tool to stop the dissemination of secrets, one that could avoid the all but absolute constitutional prohibition on prior restraints on publication.

The disputed document, according to the A.C.L.U., is three-and-a-half pages long and unremarkable, and its disclosure would be only mildly embarrassing to the government. It added that the document "has nothing to do with national defense."

"The government may be wanting to have its cake and eat it, too," said Rodney A. Smolla, the dean of the University of Richmond's law school. "It may want to present this to the court as not carrying heavy First Amendment implications. But to the extent the government wants to prevent the A.C.L.U. from disclosing the content of the document by virtue of this subpoena, it is a prior restraint."

John C. Eastman, a law professor at Chapman University, disagreed, saying that the subpoena was unusual but not improper and a sign of a moderate approach to a significant problem.

"Assuming it's properly classified," Professor Eastman said of the document, "I actually think the government is bending over backwards to accommodate the A.C.L.U. rather than pulling the trigger in prosecuting them."

"I'm not troubled by the fact that when we're dealing with classified documents there may be action taken to retrieve them," he added.

The A.C.L.U. said the subpoena was an effort to chill speech about the Bush administration. "The government is involved in a very conscious effort to suppress its critics," said Anthony D. Romero, the A.C.L.U.'s executive director.

Lauren McDonough, a spokeswoman for Michael J. Garcia, the United States attorney in Manhattan, declined to comment beyond acknowledging the A.C.L.U.'s filing.

In the past, the government has fired and prosecuted government officials who provided classified information to people not authorized to have it. It has also tried to force reporters and others to identify the government officials who leaked to them.

But the Supreme Court has drawn the line at efforts to restrain or punish the dissemination of truthful information about matters of public concern.

The Bush administration has been particularly vigilant in trying to keep its secrets. It has threatened, for instance, to prosecute reporters for publishing classified information.

The A.C.L.U.'s lawyers said in court papers filed Monday that such subpoenas, if upheld by the court, would pose a direct threat to journalists.

"Many of the most important news articles of the past year (such as those concerning N.S.A. eavesdropping, rendition of foreign prisoners of our nation to other nations, Defense Secretary Rumsfeld's views on the deteriorating situation in Iraq, National Security Adviser Hadley's assessment of Iraqi Prime Minister Maliki, and the report on the Iraq insurgency's funding sources) have been based on classified documents leaked to reporters," the group's motion said.

Those articles, the motion continued, "could not be prepared and published as they have been were the government allowed to use subpoenas to confiscate 'any and all' copies of classified documents it learns are in the hands journalists and other public advocates and critics."

Experts in First Amendment law said that political advocacy groups like the A.C.L.U. are entitled to the same constitutional free-speech protections that journalists receive.

"In this case," said Floyd Abrams, a First Amendment lawyer, "the A.C.L.U.'s function is presslike" in that it collects, analyzes and disseminates information about the government.

DOJ_NMG_0106251

In its motion to quash the subpoena, the A.C.L.U. said, “The document is nothing more than a policy, promulgated in December 2005.”

It added, “The document contains no information concerning matters such as troop movements, communications methods, intelligence sources or the like.”

The group’s lawyers have agreed for now not to disclose the contents of the document, but hyperlinks to the papers posted yesterday on its Web site include the word “torture.”

The identity of the source is known to both the A.C.L.U. and the government, the organization’s lawyers said. The A.C.L.U. declined to name the source.

In November, Jennifer G. Rodgers, a federal prosecutor, called the A.C.L.U. and demanded the return of the document and all copies, according to court documents. She knew the date on which it had been e-mailed to the group, court papers say.

A subpoena followed. The A.C.L.U. moved to quash it, and Judge Jed S. Rakoff of the Federal District Court in Manhattan yesterday ordered the unsealing of the organization’s filings and the subpoena itself. The judge will rule on the motion to quash shortly.

The Espionage Act makes it a crime for people who have unauthorized possession of some kinds of national security information to receive, retain, disseminate or refuse to turn it over to the government when asked. But A.C.L.U. lawyers say the document does not meet the statute’s definition and that, in any event, a subpoena is an improper way to enforce the law.

In its filing, the A.C.L.U. also argues that the government is misusing the grand jury that issued the subpoena.

“Despite extensive research,” the motion to quash says, “we have been unable to find a single reported decision even mentioning, much less enforcing, a subpoena purporting to preclude the subpoenaed party from retaining a copy of subpoenaed documents. There is no possible argument that there is an investigative purpose to such a subpoena.”

"Girls Gone Wild" Producer Given Community Service (AP)

By Melissa Nelson, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 14, 2006

(AP) - PANAMA CITY, Florida-The multimillionaire founder of the popular "Girls Gone Wild" video empire was sentenced to community service on Wednesday after the company pleaded guilty to federal charges of failing to monitor the ages of the women it films.

Mantra Films Inc. also agreed to pay $1.6 million (â,¬1.21 million) in fines for using drunken 17-year-olds in videos it filed on Panama City Beach during Spring Break and failing to properly label its DVDs and videos as required by federal law.

U.S. District Judge Richard Smoak told company founder Joe Francis he added the community service to the fine because it did not appear a fine would be a meaningful punishment to the 33-year-old Francis, who makes an estimated $40 million (â,¬30.15 million) a year.

The fine represents less than 3 percent of Mantra films' profits since 2002 and only 12 percent of Mantra's 2005 profits, Smoak said.

Besides Francis, company president Scott Barbour also was ordered to complete eight hours of community service monthly for the next 30 months. Smoak said two other Mantra executives - likely the general counsel and chief financial officer - would also have to complete the community service, though the judge gave Francis the option of "stepping up" and serving 16 hours a month of community service himself and voiding his corporate officers' obligations to do the service.

"It does not take a very brave man to go out and corner a girl in the middle of spring break who had four drinks," Smoak told Francis.

Francis said his policy has always been not to film girls under 18 and that the girls filmed in Panama City lied about their ages. Aaron Dyer, an attorney for Francis and the company, said his client would serve the judge's sentence.

Founded in 1997, Mantra released 83 different titles and sold 4.5 million videos and DVDs in 2002, according to Hoover's Inc., a business data firm in Austin, Texas.

A second company owned by Francis, MRA Holdings LLC, entered into a deferred agreement on charges of improper labeling. Under that agreement with prosecutors, the charges would be dismissed after three years if MRA Holdings cooperates with future government prosecutions, admits wrongdoing and pays fines.

Also pending against Francis are state felony charges in which he is accused of using children in sexual performances. He is accused of participating in the filming of two 17-year-old girls in sexual situations at a Panama City Beach motel in the same 2003 case that led to the federal charges.

Boeing Laptop Stolen, Putting 382,000 At Risk For Identity Theft (AP)

AP, December 14, 2006

(AP) - CHICAGO-A Boeing Co. laptop containing the names and Social Security numbers of 382,000 workers and retirees has been stolen, putting the employees at risk for identity theft and credit-card fraud.

The theft, which was confirmed Tuesday, was the third such incident at Boeing in just over a year.

Files on the computer also contained home addresses, phone numbers and birth dates. Some of the files listed salary information.

"It's very disturbing to us when things like this happen, and there are certain steps you can take right away ... but we realize we need to go above and beyond those," said Tim Neale, a spokesman for Chicago-based Boeing.

The laptop was stolen earlier this month when an employee left it unattended, Neale said. He would not reveal where the theft happened, but said no proprietary, customer or supplier data were on the computer.

The computer was turned off when it was stolen and a password is needed to log onto the desktop, Neale said Wednesday.

Boeing began contacting current and former employees Tuesday night, and it will provide credit-monitoring services for three years for those affected, Neale said.

There is no evidence that any of the previous thefts have resulted in wrongdoing, he said.

A Boeing laptop containing information on roughly 160,000 current and former employees was stolen in November 2005. Then, in April, a laptop containing information on 3,600 employees and retirees was stolen.

Neale would not say whether any disciplinary action has been taken against the employee involved in the recent theft. However, he acknowledged that in each of the incidents company policy was violated.

"It's frustrating because obviously you don't want to see this happen," he said.

ID-theft Rings Catered To Illegal Workers (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand, Usa Today

USA Today, December 14, 2006

A federal investigation that ended Tuesday in a raid on six meatpacking plants has uncovered criminal groups around the country that steal real birth certificates, Social Security cards and other documents and sell them to illegal workers, federal officials said.

One fraud ring mailed dozens of Puerto Rican birth certificates to a Worthington, Minn., man who resold them for as much as $1,000 to illegal workers as part of a set of identity documents. Some of the sets were bought by workers at the meatpacking plants, Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) spokesman Marc Raimondi said.

In its largest workplace raid ever, ICE agents on Tuesday arrested 1,282 workers at Swift & Co. meat-packing plants in Worthington, Minn.; Greeley, Colo.; Cactus, Texas; Grand Island, Neb.; Marshalltown, Iowa; and Hyrum, Utah. Workers were from Mexico, Guatemala, Honduras, El Salvador, Laos, Sudan and other countries, Raimondi said.

Illegal workers have traditionally forged documents and invented social security numbers, ICE Assistant Secretary Julie Myers said.

"The investigation uncovered substantial evidence that hundreds of illegal aliens working at Swift had apparently stolen the identities of U.S. citizens," Myers said. "The illegal aliens had obtained these documents from a variety of document rings and vendors."

In recent months, ICE agents have arrested members of document rings in Minnesota, Texas, Utah and Puerto Rico. Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said federal agents continue to investigate fraud rings tied to Tuesday's arrests.

More than 400 former Swift workers thought to be in the USA illegally are missing. In October and November, Swift interviewed 450 employees it suspected were working illegally and found 90% to 95% did not have proper documents, but Swift did not notify ICE, the court documents say. More than 400 workers were fired or failed to show up.

"Neither Swift nor ICE knows where those 400 workers are now," U.S. District Judge Mary Lou Robinson wrote in a court ruling on Dec. 7.

Agents were tipped to the fraud ring in February while in Marshalltown interviewing workers who had admitted assuming fake identities, Myers said.

ICE agents in July reviewed employment eligibility forms for 1,157 workers at the Swift plant in Hyrum. They found 300 people — 26% of the Swift workforce — had suspect identities.

One of those people was Jose Esteban Aleman of Logan, Utah, hired at Swift in 2005 under the name of Christopher Padilla, 22, according to a sworn statement. Investigators tracked the real Padilla to the Cook County, Ill., jail, where he had been held on murder-related charges since 2004, court documents say. Aleman has been charged with felony forgery and felony identity theft.

Swift said Wednesday it had resumed operations.

Pellicano Co-defendant Pleads Guilty To Federal Fraud And Wiretapping Charges (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 14, 2006

Daniel Nicherie admits hiring the former private investigator to wiretap a businessman.

The federal investigation of Anthony Pellicano took a surprising turn Tuesday when one of his co-defendants pleaded guilty to using the former private eye to wiretap a Beverly Hills businessman six years ago.

In an appearance before U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer, Daniel Nicherie also pleaded guilty to three other felony counts of defrauding the Beverly Hills businessman and others through pension fraud, wire fraud and money laundering.

Nicherie, 46, is the fifth person to plead guilty to having Pellicano wiretap his clients' courtroom adversaries or business rivals. Additionally, a former Beverly Hills police officer has admitted he illegally accessed government computers for Pellicano, and a onetime SBC employee has pleaded guilty to helping Pellicano by turning over confidential phone company records.

It was not immediately clear what effect Nicherie's plea will have on the ongoing Pellicano investigation because the U.S. government's allegations about Nicherie's actions would clearly make him a troubling witness for the prosecution.

Still, as the latest defendant to admit to wiretapping charges, Nicherie could provide authorities with another example of how Pellicano illegally spied on others.

"If you start adding up the number of people who have pleaded guilty to wiretapping, and then you hear … Pellicano denying that he wiretapped people, you have to ask yourself how believable he is," said one federal law enforcement source, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the ongoing probe.

Early this year, authorities unsealed a federal grand jury indictment that alleged Nicherie, his brother, Abner, and others hired — or worked with — Pellicano to wiretap others.

Although Pellicano and several co-defendants are alleged to have illegally gone after numerous celebrities or business executives, the sweeping 110-count indictment names the Nicheries in only one count: wiretapping businessman Ami Shafrir in late 2000.

At the time, authorities have alleged, Nicherie was posing as an attorney and investment banker in order to defraud Shafrir and his ex-wife out of some $40 million in cash, real estate and businesses. The fraud, according to an April 2004 indictment, involved an elaborate scheme through which Nicherie took control of Shafrir's companies, drained their assets and put the businesses into bankruptcy.

In that same indictment, Nicherie was accused of also defrauding Gil and Ezra Mileikowsky of Los Angeles out of $275,000 by persuading them to invest in a bogus business venture.

The fraud involving Shafrir looms as an especially significant event because at least one of Pellicano's alleged wiretaps intercepted a conversation between Shafrir and an FBI agent who was looking into the matter, records and interviews show.

DOJ_NMG_0106254

The alleged intercept occurred more than a year before federal agents raided Pellicano's offices in 2002 in connection with a botched attempt to intimidate a Los Angeles Times reporter.

Until Tuesday, Nicherie had steadfastly maintained that he was innocent of the charges in the two federal cases against him. Like Pellicano, he had been held in federal custody without bond because authorities had persuaded the judge that he was too great a flight risk.

After pleading guilty in the case, Nicherie was taken from the courtroom and remained in custody. His attorney for the sentencing phase declined to comment, as did prosecutors in the ongoing Pellicano case.

Assistant U.S. Atty. Jason Gonzalez, who prosecuted the fraud case and presented the plea agreement in court, said: "It's safe to say everyone is pleased it has been resolved."

Meanwhile, the Beverly Hills businessman targeted by Nicherie called the guilty plea "a major step towards justice.

"I am pleased to see him acknowledge responsibility, and I commend the [prosecutor] for his role in this process," Shafrir said in a statement. "Unfortunately, this is only the tip of the iceberg which has yet to expose the underbelly of the corruption involving Pellicano, phone company employees, certain police officers and departments who collectively participated in fleecing me out of millions of dollars."

Pellicano and five others, including a former Los Angeles Police Department detective and another former SBC employee, have pleaded not guilty in the case, which is scheduled for trial next summer.

Nicherie is scheduled to be sentenced in March and faces a maximum prison term of 35 years, although federal sentencing guidelines recommend a lesser penalty.

Criminal Mind On Death Row, Fate Of Mentally Ill Is Thorny Problem (WSJ)

By Gary Fields

Wall Street Journal, December 14, 2006

NASHVILLE, Tenn. -- At 8:30 a.m., Gregory Thompson, his hands cuffed to his waist, has already swallowed eight of the 12 pills he takes a day.

Mr. Thompson is on death row at the Riverbend Maximum Security Institution, and like many prison inmates, he is mentally ill. In addition to his daily drug regimen, he receives an antipsychotic injection twice a month. The medication controls his paranoia, delusions, schizophrenia and depression. It may also make him competent enough to be executed in the oversized wooden chair housed in a building less than 100 yards away.

Why the 45-year-old is here isn't in dispute. On New Year's Day 1985, he abducted Brenda Blanton Lane from a shopping-center parking lot in Shelbyville, Tenn., while stealing her car. He fatally stabbed the 28-year-old four times in the back. The last strike had such force that the butcher's knife he used came within millimeters of passing through her body. He left her to die at the end of an icy dirt road.

Today, however, Mr. Thompson's case is at the center of a complex debate about the death penalty in the U.S. Recently, the Supreme Court ruled that mentally retarded defendants and juveniles cannot be sentenced to death. Mr. Thompson is asking the courts to decide whether mentally ill prisoners can be executed if rendered competent only by medication. His twice-delayed execution and similar cases are working through the judicial system; one will likely end up in front of the high court.

There are more than 3,300 people awaiting execution in the U.S., according to the Death Penalty Information Center, a nonprofit group critical of how the death penalty is administered. Various organizations conservatively estimate that at least 10% of them suffer from serious mental illness. In all, about 17% of the nation's prisoners have a diagnosis of serious mental illness.

The Supreme Court ruled 20 years ago that federal and state authorities could not execute defendants too insane to understand that they were about to be killed. But states have wide latitude to determine how sane a defendant must be in order to be executed. They can also choose to medicate defendants to reach that point, a practice that's been outlawed in at least three states with the death penalty. Some medical and legal groups argue that it puts doctors in an ethical bind: having to treat people in order for them to be killed.

Little is straightforward in these kinds of cases. "Although there is a growing clamor to exclude the mentally ill from execution, mental illness is not easily defined," says David Elliott, who heads the National Coalition to Abolish the Death Penalty, a Washington, D.C., group. "With juveniles, you're 17 or you aren't. With mental retardation, they can do tests. Mental illness is much more complicated."

One of the most closely watched fights involves Steven Kenneth Staley, who murdered a restaurant manager during a 1989 robbery. The Texas Court of Appeals declined to hear his appeal recently, meaning Mr. Staley can be forcibly medicated. No decision has been made about how his case will proceed. Prosecutors argue that defendants could scam the system by feigning mental illness while others might avoid execution by refusing their medication.

DEATH WATCH

• Deathwatch3, where inmates are taken 72 hours prior to execution

Mr. Thompson, the Tennessee death-row inmate, takes Haldol, Cogentine, lithium and Prolexin. In the late 1990s, he was forcibly medicated. In 2001, the state requested the appointment of an official overseer to make sure Mr. Thompson took his medication. The state says Mr. Thompson is now doing so voluntarily. His court-appointed attorney, Dana Hansen Chavis, says that's only because Mr. Thompson "reasonably fears for his safety if he discontinues taking them."

"If I stop taking them, I'll end up naked and restrained again, so I take them," says Mr. Thompson in an interview.

The state doesn't dispute that medication alone makes Mr. Thompson competent. Rather, it argues on procedural grounds that he shouldn't be allowed to argue the matter in court. The only issue, the state argues, is Mr. Thompson's current mental status. His "submissions arguing for his escape from the death penalty are of themselves evidence that he is competent to die," the state says in its filings.

Mr. Thompson was born in Thomaston, Ga., in 1961 and from the age of five was raised by his grandmother after his mother was killed in a car accident. In documents filed with the court, his grandmother said she took to bed for six weeks after her daughter's death, drinking and not caring for her three young grandchildren. They occasionally got a meal or a can of food from neighbors, according to court documents. Other times, they would steal money from under the grandmother's mattress.

In 1979, Mr. Thompson graduated from Pike County High School in Georgia and joined the Navy. It was there he began experiencing bouts of paranoia and sudden anger, family and friends said in court testimony. He stayed in the military until he was dishonorably discharged in 1982 after attacking a noncommissioned officer. He returned home, worked a series of minimum-wage jobs and became prone to screaming and bouts of unprovoked anger, his family told the court.

During this period, he met Joanna McNamara, an unwed teenage mother. On Dec. 29, 1984, Mr. Thompson, then 24, and Ms. McNamara, then 15, traveled by bus from Marietta, Ga., to Shelbyville, Tenn., where they stayed with a family friend after claiming to be married. When the friend realized this wasn't true, she reported Ms. McNamara as a runaway, according to court documents.

As Mr. Thompson waited for relatives to wire money, he began imagining Ku Klux Klan members chasing the couple. Mr. Thompson is black, Ms. McNamara, white. To get away, he decided to steal a car.

The pair encountered Ms. Lane on the evening of Jan. 1 as she walked to her car in the Wal-Mart parking lot -- he picked Ms. Lane because she smiled and spoke to him, he recalls. She'd gone there to buy aluminum foil, recalls Sue Allison, a close friend and Ms. Lane's former boss. Ms. Lane, a newlywed, played piano for the Sunday school, ran a church prison ministry and had worked for several years as a local newspaper reporter.

"He chose the most gentle woman he could have found. Brenda would have given him the car," says Ms. Allison. "Brenda was one of just a few people I knew opposed to the death penalty."

According to testimony given at Mr. Thompson's trial, he forced Ms. Lane into the car at knifepoint and, as she recited the Lord's Prayer, drove around for over an hour looking for a place to leave her. He settled on a rural area in the lightly populated Coffee County in Tennessee's south-central region. As Ms. Lane walked away from the car, Mr. Thompson stabbed her.

Tennessee police initially thought she might have been abducted by someone she encountered through her prison ministry. Soon after, officials in Georgia called to say they'd caught Ms. McNamara and Mr. Thompson. The pair confessed and told investigators where to find Ms. Lane.

Authorities found her at 4 a.m. on Jan. 3, lying on her back at the end of a dirt road near the entrance to a soybean field. One of her lungs had been punctured, causing fatal internal bleeding. She remained conscious for about 10 minutes, according to the autopsy report.

Mr. Thompson's mental status has been the subject of a tangled dispute ever since he first stood trial and was sentenced to death. The first time Mr. Thompson's appeal traveled through the legal system, Tennessee's Supreme Court and federal district court both noted that no evidence had been presented proving he was mentally ill when the crime was committed. The Sixth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals agreed.

In June 2004, when a federal appellate judge was preparing a law-review article on the case, an intern working for him asked why none of the mental-health experts who examined Mr. Thompson addressed his mental state during his original trial.

The judge, Richard Suhrheinrich, studied the voluminous files and discovered that depositions and information from a North Carolina forensic and clinical psychology expert had been left out of the case. The expert, Faye Sultan, diagnosed Mr. Thompson with "Schizoaffective Disorder, Bipolar Type" and concluded he would have been suffering from symptoms at the time he murdered Ms. Lane.

"This mental illness would have substantially impaired Mr. Thompson's ability to conform his conduct to the requirements of the law," Ms. Sultan wrote in a report filed with court. Citing the missing evidence, the Sixth Circuit appeals court reopened the case and overturned its earlier ruling.

The Supreme Court intervened at the behest of the state and ruled in 2005 that the Sixth Circuit had overstepped its authority. Justice Stephen Breyer, in writing the dissent in the 5-4 decision, said the case "arises out of unusual circumstances -- circumstances of a kind that I have not previously experienced in the 25 years I have served on the bench."

Once a new execution date was set, Mr. Thompson's attorneys were allowed to file another appeal, although this time challenging only the sentence, not the original conviction. Nearly 22 years after the crime, his case is moving through the courts for a second time.

Mr. Thompson is now arguing he is not competent to be executed because his mental condition has deteriorated. His appeal also tries to make the case that it's unconstitutional to execute a defendant made competent only through medication.

In April, the federal district court sided with the state and found that Mr. Thompson was competent to be executed. The district court also held that "even if Thompson had demonstrated that the state authorities were actually forcing him to take the medications, he has not shown that executing him in his medicated state is unconstitutional."

The case is back with the Sixth Circuit, where Mr. Thompson is challenging his execution on the same grounds. "Any fleeting semblance of competency is achieved by the use of powerful medication which was initiated against Thompson's will," his lawyers argue in a filing. Whatever the verdict, the next step will likely be a return to the Supreme Court.

Opponents of medicating death-row inmates to make them competent argue that the practice violates the Eighth Amendment's prohibition of "cruel and unusual punishments." Many groups argue that the mentally ill shouldn't face capital charges under any circumstances. Such defendants, they argue, have reduced ability to control their conduct and therefore less moral culpability.

The Supreme Court has never addressed the medication question in a capital-case ruling. It ducked the issue in the 1990s in the case of Michael Perry, a Louisiana death-row inmate, by sending the case back to the Louisiana Supreme Court. The state's high court decided it wouldn't force Mr. Perry to take medication, due in part to the ethical dilemma such a move would present to doctors. He remains on death row.

In 2003, in the case of convicted murderer Charles L. Singleton, the Supreme Court let stand an appeals-court ruling that there is no constitutional barrier to executing someone who is medicated. Mr. Singleton, who suffered from schizophrenia, was being treated against his will because he was considered a danger to himself and others. He was executed in January 2004.

The American Medical Association has tried to weave a path through this thorny problem. It says physicians shouldn't treat an inmate to restore competence except if medical intervention is needed to mitigate suffering, which could also hasten an execution. The AMA acknowledges "it will not always be easy" to decide whether or not to medicate and leaves the ultimate decision to the treating physicians.

Mr. Thompson's appeal is the first Tennessee death-row case questioning the validity of "chemical competency," and is taking the state into uncharted territory.

"Our organization has not considered whether we should take a stance on this issue," says Terrence Clark, president of the Tennessee Psychiatric Association. Dr. Clark said his personal opinion would turn on whether he, as a physician, is administering the medication to treat the patient's mental illness or whether he is acting as an agent of the state to further the execution.

Meanwhile, Mr. Thompson remains at Unit 2 at Riverbend, about four miles from downtown Nashville. The loudest sound comes from the clanking chains that keep Mr. Thompson's hands strapped close to his body. At 6 feet 3 inches and 263 pounds, he seems to wear the 4-by-4-foot room more than sit in it.

In a nearby building is the death chamber, with a gurney for lethal injections and an electric chair for electrocution. The chair is a wooden, brown behemoth, nearly 3 feet wide, with a back nearly 6 feet high. Plexiglas covers the seat. It hasn't been used since Nov. 7, 1960, but it has been refurbished. Inmates who committed their crimes before Jan. 1, 1999, can request it rather than lethal injection. Mr. Thompson says he'd prefer the chair.

With barely a blink of eyes yellowed by years of medication, Mr. Thompson talked for nearly an hour about his life and impending death, meandering between fact and fiction.

At one point he spoke of having his Grammy-winning career as a songwriter. The night earlier, he said, a dog came out of the floor of his cell, followed by a man he didn't recognize. "I didn't want to go through that, demons and angels coming out of the walls, things on the other side of death," he said.

He also has moments of lucidity. Mr. Thompson said he has had trouble sleeping, but "today is a good day. Right now I'm pretty clear on what happened." He added: "I killed her and they intend to kill me for it."

Political Drama Re-enacts Moments In A Death Chamber (NYT)

By Jesse Mckinley

New York Times, December 14, 2006

BERKELEY, Calif., Dec. 13 — As drama, what happened on stage at the Black Repertory Theater of Berkeley early Wednesday morning was not classic theatrical fare. The actors were mostly motionless, the play had only one line, and everyone in the audience knew how the story was going to end.

But creating a compelling narrative may not have been the authors' point. The play was a re-enactment of the execution of the convicted killer Stanley Tookie Williams, staged on the first anniversary of his death by lethal injection at San Quentin State Prison.

The performance was written and produced by Barbara Becnel and Shirley Neal, two friends of Mr. Williams and death penalty opponents, who were unapologetic about their play's being agitprop.

"This is political theater in the extreme," Ms. Becnel told a crowd of about 150 people who gathered to watch the performance. "But it's political theater in the extreme because we need it."

The execution of Mr. Williams, 51, a founder of the Crips gang who was convicted of murdering four people in 1979, has continued to be a rallying point for death penalty opponents as well as a source of contention about the methods of lethal injection.

In September, a representative of the state attorney general's office acknowledged that prison guards and nurses had botched Mr. Williams's lethal injection, failing to hook up a backup intravenous line to his arm. Ms. Becnel said Mr. Williams was in agony during his execution, which took 35 minutes to complete.

"I was there, I saw what they did," Ms. Becnel said. "And I can tell you it was a 35-minute torture-murder."

State officials deny that Mr. Williams suffered unnecessarily. "The execution went exactly as the protocol is designed to carry it out," said Nathan Barankin, a spokesman for Attorney General Bill Lockyer. "The lack of the extra IV line was definitely a mistake, but it didn't affect the execution."

Michael Rushford, president of the Criminal Justice Legal Foundation, an advocate for victims' rights and law enforcement, said he believed Mr. Williams was a bad role model for a play.

"I think it hurts the anti-death-penalty movement to hold up as dastardly a criminal as Tookie," Mr. Rushford said, citing Mr. Williams's work with the Crips, a violent gang based in Los Angeles.

Mr. Rushford added that Wednesday morning's performance was simply "preaching to the choir" of Mr. Williams's supporters, many of whom rallied in front of San Quentin the night of his execution.

"I don't expect an accurate portrayal of what happened," he said. "But when you've made such a big deal of it, you can't just let it drop after a year."

Mr. Williams's experiences in the death chamber were part of a Federal District Court hearing in September — stemming from a lawsuit by Michael Morales, a condemned rapist and killer — that may affect death penalty methodology in California. The judge overseeing the hearings, Jeremy Fogel, effectively halted executions in California until he could hear arguments on whether methods of lethal injection caused undue pain. Judge Fogel is expected to issue a ruling soon.

For supporters of Mr. Williams, his execution, which drew international press attention and a cadre of celebrity protesters, was unjust, in part because of his post-incarceration work speaking about the dangers of gangs through a series of children's books, lectures and memoirs, many of which were written with Ms. Becnel. Mr. Williams also claimed to be innocent.

On Wednesday, the theatrical re-enactment began at 12:01 a.m., the time Mr. Williams entered the death chamber. It was performed by six actors, including Darby Tillis, 64, an exonerated death row inmate from Chicago who played Mr. Williams and said he had little trouble connecting with the role.

"When you're on death row, you always have an imaginary scene that you live out many times: how you would feel if you went down for an execution," Mr. Tillis said.

With a simple set — folding chairs, a gurney and a platform — the play's action was minimal: three witnesses stood, a guard strapped Mr. Tillis to a gurney, a nurse fumbled with an IV. Only once did anyone speak, when Mr. Tillis asked the actor playing the frustrated nurse whether she knew what she was doing. The entire performance took about 12 minutes — about a third of the actual execution time.

And while the audience was silent throughout, some said the experience had left them shaken. Kirya Traber, 22, who wore a Save Tookie T-shirt, said she had been outside San Quentin the year before, but felt a lot closer to the drama on Wednesday.

"Here tonight," Ms. Traber said, "was a lot more solemn."

Gumshoe's Intuition: Spotting Counterfeits At Port Of Antwerp (WSJ)

By John W. Miller

Wall Street Journal, December 14, 2006

ANTWERP, Belgium -- From his perch at the North Sea port of Antwerp, Chris De Buysscher can look at thousands of 40-foot container units and pick out those most likely to contain fake Nikes, Marlboros or Dior jackets.

When he's off work, the 51-year-old Belgian can spot a knockoff Louis Vuitton bag from across a crowded, smoke-filled room.

Mr. De Buysscher is widely regarded among his peers as the best counterfeit-goods inspector in the world. "He's a genius, plain and simple," says Christophe Zimmermann, director of the anticounterfeiting unit at the World Customs Organization, an intergovernmental voluntary association that coordinates among the world's 170 customs agencies.

The global boom in counterfeit goods has Mr. De Buysscher very busy. In the past two years, tiny Belgium has seized about 40 million counterfeit items, the most taken by any nation in the European Union. And about 90% of the Belgian seizures came from Mr. De Buysscher's three-person team policing the 22 miles of Antwerp docks.

Mr. De Buysscher is the main attraction of a WCO training program. He has made presentations in the Philippines, Morocco, Senegal, China, Croatia, Hungary and Algeria. Next year, he plans trips to Japan and Mexico. "In the morning, we give theoretical classes," says Mr. Zimmermann. "In the afternoon, Chris shows what he can do."

His skills are a low-tech blend of old-fashioned gumshoe detective work and intuition. On a recent trip to Algeria, Mr. De Buysscher singled out a shipping container from China for checking at the port of Oran. It was supposed to contain shoes -- and it did -- fake Nikes.

On the road, he and Mr. Zimmermann spend evenings and nights out, indulging in their favorite spectator sport: spotting counterfeit goods in restaurants and bars. What was fake in Algeria? "Absolutely everything," says Mr. De Buysscher. "People in Africa want Dolce & Gabbana, too."

Antwerp recruited Mr. De Buysscher to its new counterfeit-goods team a dozen years ago. Almost everything in international commerce is shipped in 20-foot to 40-foot units, containers that can be easily transferred within ports, then mounted on ship, truck or train. The challenge is to find out which ones hide counterfeits. The first years were hard. Mr. De Buysscher seized only 15 to 20 containers. This year, he's at 106 -- and counting.

At a time when ports are hiring mathematicians to do sophisticated risk analysis and installing programs and X-ray machines to keep up with the tsunami of knockoffs, Mr. De Buysscher is old school. He relentlessly checks thousands of bills of lading for subtle slip-ups. The problem with computers, he says, is that counterfeiters are always a step ahead. "They're working on giving me a computer program to work with," he says. "I don't need it." In other ports, computers do this work. Operators plug in data such as origin, type of good and shipping lane, and use an algorithm to calculate the likelihood that a box will contain counterfeit goods. Customs officers don't necessarily read the bills of lading with their own eyes.

His office and home are museums displaying choice counterfeit junk. It's a hobby many customs agents have. Recent catches include a Frosted Flakes mug, fake vodka labels and a Chinese Angelina Jolie doll from one of her "Tomb Raider" movies.

Part of his expertise comes from knowing brand-name goods. He visits outlet malls to study the products of Nike and Oscar de la Renta. He knows how things are packed in certain countries. Boxes from India, for instance, usually have red rims. "If one of those says 'Made in USA,' there's a problem," he says.

He's also up on fashion and can recognize 10 perfumes by nose alone, he says. "Chanel, Dior and Yves Saint Laurent smells are trademarked, just like the bottles they're in."

A container billed as dark tea from Ningbo, China, that had passed through Singapore recently raised several flags. "Boats from China usually go through Hong Kong," he says. "Also, everybody knows the Indians make dark tea and the Chinese make green tea." Inside were nine million fake Marlboros.

Roughly half the container boxes that Mr. De Buysscher opens contain fakes. "An astonishing ratio," says Mr. Zimmermann. An inspector needs to have a high batting average because there are so many boxes coming through and nobody could check them all. The port of Antwerp usually takes in more than 15,000 containers a day. Customs officials have the resources to check less than 0.5% of them. Opening and unloading a container can cost up to $3,000 in labor and other costs.

Fatalistic customs officials admit that despite their efforts, a lot of counterfeit goods get through. "We're overwhelmed," says Mr. De Buysscher. Playing the odds, Antwerp anticounterfeit agents don't bother to check boats coming from North America.

The need for Mr. De Buysscher's skills is growing. There are 400 million container boxes in the world, and the number is growing by 9% a year. The growth of the $500 billion counterfeit goods industry is one of the biggest economic challenges facing European and American companies as they relocate production to Asia. "This is nothing short of an economic crisis," says EU trade commissioner Peter Mandelson.

China, the source of almost two-thirds of all counterfeit goods seized in the EU, has agreed to crack down on counterfeiters. But WCO officials say progress is slow. Pirates are branching out beyond shirts and CDs to cargo such as auto parts and prescription drugs. "Losing the battle against counterfeit goods could cost human lives," says Michel Danet, secretary-general of the WCO.

One afternoon recently, Mr. De Buysscher read the paperwork for a box on the 2,500-container ship Wan Hai 312 that was labeled "women's coat." Several elements raised a bushy eyebrow. First, all freight was prepaid, a common smugglers' move to get goods through a port quickly. The bill of lading didn't include a brand name, nor did it contain an official port of origin number in the top right-hand corner.

He ordered the box impounded. The next day, he received a panicked fax from the importer, a Chinese man in Paris. "There has been a mistake, please ship back to China," he wrote.

Mr. De Buysscher didn't do that. When he opened the box, he took out a jacket and read the label. It said "Ice-Dior." He pulled the fake fur off the hood. "Dior wouldn't make this," he sniffed.

Mr. De Buysscher called Daniel De Jaeger, a Brussels lawyer who handles hundreds of cases a year for Dior. Mr. De Jaeger filed a complaint with Belgian customs to prevent delivery of the shipment. Dior pays to destroy counterfeit goods, at a cost of between $6,600 and $13,200 a year. "We can't go to China to catch counterfeiters," says Mr. De Jaeger, "so we have to get them when they cross our borders."

Small-Town Judge's Personal Justice Stirs Concern (NYT)

By William Glaberson

New York Times, December 14, 2006

KEESEVILLE, N.Y. — Like many teenagers in this bleak old mill village near Lake Champlain, Michael C. Burrell had been in trouble before. But when an attempted assault case landed him at age 19 in the courtroom of the village justice, the experience was unlike anything he had faced before.

He said the justice, George J. Head, insisted that they meet each week outside court, in what people around here call his "judge's probation" program.

There is no such thing as judge's probation, and private sessions between a judge and a defendant facing jail violate rules of judicial conduct.

But Justice Head seems to have stretched the rules in a number of ways. When he sentenced young men to regular probation, he sometimes drove them to their appointments. One young man was discovered driving the justice's car, and others say they met with the justice at his home. One said he even wound up moving in for eight months.

"He's the judge," said Mr. Burrell, who said he met privately with Justice Head several times last year. "He tells me to do something, I'm going to do it."

One of the bedrock principles of American law is that judges are supposed to be impartial toward the people who come before them. They are to be decision makers, not participants, in cases. They are not to befriend defendants, and are barred from meeting with them outside the presence of their lawyers or prosecutors, or outside court. At the very least, they are required to avoid any personal involvement that makes it appear they have taken sides.

But bedrock principles have a way of getting lost in New York's town and village courts, a sprawling world of more than 1,250 small courtrooms. Over the decades justices have illegally jailed people, threatened enemies, protected friends and made grievous legal errors, with little supervision or penalty. The law often counts for little, because three-quarters of the justices are not lawyers. Now the system is under scrutiny by state officials, who are holding hearings and taking steps to fix some of its most glaring flaws.

What has played out in this remote village in northeastern New York provides one more startling look at what can happen when meager training mixes with plenty of unchecked power.

"Judge Head rules Keeseville, and God help you if you oppose him," said Diane Webster-Brady, the lawyer who handled Mr. Burrell's case.

'It Wasn't Professional'

Justice Head, 72, a retired state trooper who has been a justice in the area for 15 years, declined repeated requests for an interview. But lawyers say he has told them over the years that he can supervise Keeseville's wayward youth better than county probation officers.

In interviews and documents, several young men — some of them high school dropouts, adrift from their families, and some with serious police records — said he seemed to offer relief from their poverty and troubled lives, providing shelter, food, the use of his car, or even tuition or lawyers' fees.

But most said they felt unsettled or threatened by the control the justice had over them, and by his unusual version of probation. They described regular meetings — once a week or more — at which the justice would check on their progress, with the suggestion that if they went along, they would be treated well, but that if they did not, there would be trouble.

Sometimes, they said, the meetings were in the house of the justice, who is long separated from his wife. Sometimes they were in the justice's small office off the village courtroom, where Mr. Burrell said he met with Justice Head last year.

"It was me and him talking," said Mr. Burrell, who had run away from a substance abuse program where Justice Head sent him after several arrests in connection with attempted assault and other crimes. Mr. Burrell said the justice discussed his own background, and asked about his.

"It wasn't professional," he said. "I think he crossed the boundaries."

Other people noticed the unorthodox meetings, too. More than a dozen current or former prosecutors, lawyers and officials in the area said they were aware of the justice's out-of-court dealings with defendants, and many said they questioned the propriety of his actions.

In January, one prosecutor filed a motion to transfer a drunken-driving case out of the village court because the 20-year-old driver had been at the wheel of Justice Head's car, with its official license plates. After the arrest, the prosecutor wrote, the young man was "picked up by the Honorable George Head from the police station."

Still, the lawyers and officials said they could not publicly challenge the justice because of his power here. One lawyer said he had reluctantly agreed to "judge's probation" for a client because it won him a better deal.

The Clinton County probation director, David M. Marcoux, acknowledged he had heard that Justice Head accompanied some young defendants to their probation appointments. And when asked, he said that no other judge in the county did so. But he would not say any more about Justice Head or his special probation program.

"He's still a sitting judge in the county," Mr. Marcoux said, "and it's nothing I feel I should make any comment on."

Yet people are being asked to speak up by the state agency that investigates misconduct by judges. In recent weeks, the Commission on Judicial Conduct has been hearing testimony about Justice Head from local officials and some of the young men. Commission officials would not discuss the status of their investigation.

Meanwhile, state judicial officials have begun a series of sweeping changes to the entire system of town and village courts, which are also known as justice courts. On Thursday, two committees of the State Assembly plan to hold a joint hearing into whether the courts should be overhauled even further.

Several legal experts said in interviews that Justice Head's methods appeared to be the kind of conduct that made people question the system's fairness and professionalism. Judges in New York have been disciplined for inviting defendants to their homes, or meeting privately with parties in a legal case.

Ann E. Pfeiffer, a former Rochester City Court judge who teaches at Syracuse Law School, said it was not proper for a judge to take on the role of a social worker, roommate, confidant or friend. "A judge, particularly in a small town, should be as detached as he can be," she said.

A Hard Place to Grow Up

Keeseville, with a population of 1,850, is certainly small, the kind of remote place where critics of the justice courts say it may be most difficult for state judiciary officials to monitor the justices. It has a few churches, not many jobs, the hulk of an old Grand Union on desolate Front Street and a changing cast of aimless teenagers who say they feel trapped in a place that seems forgotten.

The village, which has a reputation for drug crimes, bar fights and beatings, can be a hard place to grow up. One recent Sunday, two young men were hit by a car on Main Street about 3 a.m., and one was killed. Witnesses told the police that the driver, 28, was drunk. When the two men were hit, they were rolling around in the road, fighting.

Seven years ago, Mr. Head, a jowly, broad-shouldered man, was elected village justice, after eight years as a town justice in the area. He had attended college but did not graduate, according to a document he filed with court officials. He has no law degree; the only training that New York has given its justices for decades is six days of initial schooling and an annual refresher course.

Keeseville's mayor, Mark J. Whitney, said Justice Head had "performed well for us."

But Theodore Carter had a different impression. A high school dropout with a long arrest record, he ended up before Justice Head two years ago, when he was 18. He had tried to beat up another teenager, he said, and because he could not make bail, he spent 20 days in jail.

When he was released to attend Keeseville's regular afternoon court session, he said, Justice Head told him that to avoid more jail time, he would have to serve judge's probation and chop wood for the village.

"I didn't think it was any big thing," Mr. Carter said, "until he told me I'd have to go meet with him." Justice Head set the location: his office in the old school building that Keeseville uses as a community center. "He told me to meet him at 8:30 at night," Mr. Carter said.

When he arrived, the rooms all around the office were empty. The halls were dark. "Nobody was there except for the judge," Mr. Carter said. "It made me feel uncomfortable."

Justice Head, he said, talked about himself and gave Mr. Carter his home phone number to call at any hour of the day or night. "It was kind of awkward," Mr. Carter said.

In later meetings, Mr. Carter said, he seemed to disappoint Justice Head because he did not reveal much about himself. Eventually, in a private session two months ago, he said, the justice adopted a harsh tone, taking three folders out of a drawer — the records, Mr. Carter said, of three harassment charges against him that had not moved forward.

The justice, he said, seemed to hint that he could activate the cases. Asked what he made of that, Mr. Carter said, "I think he means he's going to hold it over me."

Visiting the Justice

For another young man, the meetings started the same way: In court, Justice Head declared that he would see him weekly. But the location would be even more private.

"Judge Head," the man said, "said he wanted to see me at his house the following day."

The young man, an unemployed laborer who is now 24, agreed to be interviewed for this article on the condition that his name not be used, saying he was embarrassed about receiving favored treatment from the justice.

His years of interacting with Justice Head, he said, began when he was 18 and facing a petty larceny charge, having already served jail time for sexual abuse. They would meet, he said, at the justice's home or office, almost always alone.

"At first he didn't want nobody knowing about it," the man said. But eventually, he said, people saw him at "George's house" or driving "George's car."

Later, he said, Justice Head bought him a used car, and once paid for a lawyer when he was charged with a sex crime in another town.

"I just didn't want to go back to jail," the man said, explaining his dealings with the justice. "When you are at the lowest you can be, who else do you want to befriend you than a judge?"

Another young man, then 17, said the justice invited him home the night before he was to be sentenced to community service, according to notes of a 2005 statement he gave to a law enforcement official, who shared the notes with The New York Times. The man declined to be interviewed for this article, but he told the official that the justice tried to have him do work at the house as a form of community service.

And one young defendant described a deal that went even further.

"We had a meeting," the man, Dennis C. Valentin, recalled in a recent interview. "He was going to help me study, and he offered me the place to stay in his mansion."

Mr. Valentin, 25, said his life was in bad shape back then, in 2001. A high school dropout, 19 at the time, he had grown up in a broken, sometimes violent home, he said. He had been arrested after a drunken street brawl, but had run away at first instead of facing the charges.

He turned himself in to Justice Head, who he said got him talking about his ambitions: to get into the Army, or otherwise get out of Keeseville. "It's just a rough little town," Mr. Valentin said.

He jumped at the justice's offer. "I pretty much went to stay with him," he said. The justice approved a plea deal: instead of jail, Mr. Valentin would get a conditional discharge that would free him if he stayed out of trouble for six months.

DOJ_NMG_0106263

Already living in the justice's house, Mr. Valentin said, were a 21-year-old man whom the justice sometimes drove to Alcoholics Anonymous meetings, and a man in his late 20s who also had gotten in trouble with the law.

That older man had lived in the house for years, and the justice had helped pay his parochial school tuition, Mr. Valentin said.

Mr. Valentin said he stayed for eight months, with free room and board. "He pretty much tried to get me on the right track," he said.

The effort apparently did not work. Two years later, Mr. Valentin was arrested again — this time, he said, for statutory rape. He is now serving six years of probation, ordered by another judge.

But he remains grateful for his time in Justice Head's home.

"It was a nice place to be," he said. "The judge is really smart. You can sit down and watch 'Jeopardy' on TV, and he is going to get practically every question."

Assisted Suicide Advocate Jack Kevorkian To Be Paroled In June (AP)

By Kathy Barks Hoffman, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 14, 2006

(AP) - LANSING, Michigan.-Assisted suicide advocate Jack Kevorkian, the ailing former pathologist who claimed to have assisted in at least 130 deaths in the 1990s, will be paroled in June, state Corrections Department spokesman Leo Lalonde said Wednesday.

Kevorkian, 78, is serving a 10- to 25-year sentence for second-degree murder in the 1998 poisoning of Thomas Youk, who suffered from Lou Gehrig's disease. Kevorkian called Youk's death, which was videotaped and shown on CBS "60 Minutes," a mercy killing.

Kevorkian has promised he would not assist in a suicide if he was released from prison.

Lalonde did not reveal any other details and directed calls to Russ Marlan, another spokesman for the department. A message seeking comment was left with Marlan Wednesday afternoon.

Mayer Morganroth, Kevorkian's attorney, said in July that his client had less than a year to live. Gov. Jennifer Granholm ordered corrections authorities to carry out an independent medical evaluation of Kevorkian, but did not commute the retired pathologist's sentence, as Morganroth had hoped.

Morganroth said in June that Kevorkian's weight had dropped to 113 pounds (51 kilograms) and that he was suffering from hepatitis C and diabetes.

Michigan banned assisted suicides in 1998.

Ala. College Desegregation Case Ends (AP)

December 13, 2006, 7:06 Pm Est

AP, December 14, 2006

U.S. District Judge Harold Murphy approved agreements settling the case, which has so far generated $210 million in state funds for the desegregation effort, most of it going to historically black Alabama A&M and Alabama State universities.

In his order Tuesday, Murphy agreed with both sides that there is no reason for further action.

He said the state, its historically white universities and other defendants have eliminated traces of segregation "to the extent practicable and consistent with sound educational practice ... and have demonstrated their commitment to continuing to operate in a constitutional and nondiscriminatory fashion."

One of the plaintiffs, retired teacher Alease Sims of Birmingham, said the legal fight had accomplished a lot.

"It has been a privilege and an honor for me to do something to help my people and all the citizens of Alabama," she told The Birmingham News.

DOJ_NMG_0106264

"We worked hard to have a court ... say those kinds of things about higher education in Alabama. That's quite an accomplishment," state's attorney Robert Hunter said.

Orders and agreements in the case have produced or will lead to additional courses, new money for classroom buildings, diversity scholarship and endowment funds for the state's historically black universities.

The case also has led to creation of a unified Alabama Cooperative Extension Service, increased funding for a need-based scholarship program, and agreements by the historically white universities and some of the state's two-year schools to work to boost their numbers of black faculty members and administrators.

By 2014, when the last of the court-ordered requirements expire, A&M and ASU each will have received more than $200 million, said state Rep. John Knight, a key plaintiff in the case.

The case began in 1979, when the U.S. Department of Education found "vestiges of segregation" in the state's higher education system, chiefly the number of black students and faculty members at predominantly white colleges, and funding and degree-program disparities between white and black campuses.

The U.S. Justice Department sued Alabama in 1981, after state officials and university administrators were unable to agree on a corrective plan. More plaintiffs were added over the years.

A spinoff issue, involving Alabama's lowest-in-the-nation property tax structure, is still being litigated. Plaintiffs contend it keeps blacks from getting financial aid needed for higher education. Murphy ruled against the plaintiffs, who are appealing to the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

South Elgin To Allow Group Home Under Settlement With DOJ (AP)

SOUTH ELGIN, Ill. - The village will allow Unity House Inc. to operate a home for up to seven residents recovering from drug or alcohol addiction under an agreement that settles allegations of Fair Housing Act violations, the U.S. Justice Department announced Wednesday.

Federal prosecutors had argued the Village of South Elgin violated the act by refusing a permit for the establishment of a group home for alleged substance abusers. Village Attorney Derke Price said officials had been concerned about allowing a business in a residential area.

The settlement also calls for South Elgin to pay $25,000 in damages to Unity House, $7,500 each to two residents who were not able to live in the home when the permit was denied and $15,000 to the United States as a civil penalty.

The village board approved the settlement at a Dec. 6 board meeting. It still must be approved by the U.S. District Court in Chicago.

"This settlement should send a message to other communities that no municipality, driven by neighborhood opposition, can prohibit persons recovering from addictions from enjoying the benefits of living in the safe and supportive environment of a group home," U.S. Attorney Patrick J. Fitzgerald said in a statement.

On Nov. 17, 2003, South Elgin denied a special use permit to Unity House for a group home that was to house nine unrelated men.

Price said at the time of the application, Unity House operator Bret Mathis failed to prove the facility could handle that number of people, in addition to parking all the residents' cars on the property, as state laws require.

"He believed we were turning him down and discriminating," said Price, who added that the village has no problem with group homes. "We are not admitting to any wrong doing by agreeing to the settlement."

A message seeking comment was left Wednesday evening for Mathis.

Lacrosse Players Tout DNA Test Results (AP)

By David Scott

AP, December 14, 2006

RALEIGH, N.C. - DNA testing in the Duke lacrosse rape case found genetic material from several males in the accuser's body and her underwear - but none from any team member, defense attorneys said in court papers Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0106265

The papers were filed by attorneys for the three lacrosse players charged, Reade Seligmann, Collin Finnerty and David Evans. They complained that the information about DNA from other men was not disclosed in a report prosecutors provided earlier this year to the defense.

The testing was conducted at a private laboratory for the prosecution.

"This is strong evidence of innocence in a case in which the accuser denied engaging in any sexual activity in the days before the alleged assault, told police she last had consensual sexual intercourse a week before the assault, and claimed that her attackers did not use condoms and ejaculated," the defense said.

In an interview, defense attorney Joseph Cheshire said the findings suggest the accuser had sex shortly before the March team party where she was hired to perform as a stripper. The woman has said three lacrosse team members gang-raped her in a bathroom at the party.

"None of (the DNA material) happens to be from lacrosse players who are supposed to have had sex with her, which is pretty significant," said Cheshire, who represents Evans.

District Attorney Mike Nifong declined to comment on the defense motion. A trial is not expected to start until spring.

Prosecutors ordered the testing at DNA Security of Burlington after an initial round conducted by the state crime lab failed to find a conclusive match between the 27-year-old accuser and any lacrosse player, a fact trumpeted by the defense attorneys.

Stan Goldman, a criminal law expert at Loyola Law School in Los Angeles, said the defense can use what DNA Security found to argue that if their clients did in fact rape the accuser, the extensive testing should have uncovered their DNA. But he downplayed suggestions that the report could be the key to winning the case.

"There seems to be so many problems with this case, it's hard to say one more will be fatal," Goldman said. "If the jury was going to believe the case before this, it strikes me this is not going to be fatal."

DNA In Duke Rape Case Not Linked To Athletes (LAT)

By David Zucchino, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 14, 2006

A private lab used by prosecutors failed to report finding genetic material that didn't match samples from suspects, a defense motion says.

DURHAM, N.C. — A private lab used by prosecutors in the Duke University lacrosse rape case failed to disclose that it had found DNA from unidentified males in samples taken from the accuser's body and underwear, according to a defense motion filed Wednesday.

The DNA did not match samples taken from three Duke lacrosse players charged with raping an exotic dancer during an off-campus party March 14. Nor did it match DNA taken from 43 other members of the university lacrosse team, or the accuser's boyfriend, the defense motion said.

"This is strong evidence of innocence in a case in which the accuser denied engaging in any sexual activity in the days before the alleged assault," lawyers for the three accused players wrote in the 61-page motion.

The DNA — which the motion said came from "multiple males" — was not mentioned in the lab's final report, submitted to the Durham district attorney's office in May and subsequently provided to the defense.

Defense lawyers found references to the DNA while scouring 1,844 documents handed over by the lab Oct. 27 under a judge's order. DNA Security Inc. in Burlington, N.C., initially refused to provide them, citing cost and privacy.

The accuser, a black student at North Carolina Central University in Durham who was hired to perform at a team party, told police she was raped in a bathroom by three white players who did not use condoms.

A few hours after the alleged rape, a doctor and nurse collected standard rape kit evidence from the woman at a hospital.

"Enough of that DNA existed for DNA Security to conclude that none of it matched the defendants, their teammates … or anyone else who submitted a DNA sample to the investigation," the motion said.

The lab performed DNA tests on more than a dozen items, but its final report to prosecutors in May included analyses of only three items, the motion said.

According to the lab's protocols, which were provided in the defense motion, "results for each DNA test" must be included in all reports.

The defense motion seeks all DNA Security documents related to the lacrosse case, including chain-of-custody accountings, internal e-mails, DNA analysis reports and databases, and records of any tests conducted after the lab's May report.

DNA tests conducted by the North Carolina State Bureau of Investigation laboratory in late March did not find evidence of semen, blood or saliva in samples taken from the accuser. DNA Security told a police investigator, Michelle Soucie, that it could perform more sophisticated tests using a technique that isolates Y chromosomes — the male chromosome.

According to Soucie's notes, DNA Security lab director Brian Meehan said he could "possibly adjust prices because they would really like to be involved in [the] case."

Neither Meehan nor Dist. Atty. Mike Nifong could be reached for comment Wednesday night.

Last week, U.S. Rep. Walter B. Jones (R-N.C.) asked the Justice Department to investigate whether Nifong committed "prosecutorial misconduct" and violated the defendants' civil rights.

Nifong, who called the defendants "hooligans," allegedly allowed police to conduct a photo lineup in which the accuser was shown only photos of Duke lacrosse players.

The three accused athletes have said they are not guilty. A trial is scheduled for the spring.

Backers Of Anti-gay Marriage Amendment File Federal Lawsuit (AP)

By Steve Leblanc, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 14, 2006

(AP) - BOSTON-Supporters of an anti-gay marriage measure filed a lawsuit in federal court Wednesday seeking up to $5 million (â,¬3.8 million) in damages from Massachusetts lawmakers who blocked a final vote on the proposed constitutional amendment last month.

The lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court by the group VoteOnMarriage.org, claims the 109 state lawmakers violated the supporters' rights to free speech and right to petition the government.

The state House and Senate last month chose to end debate before discussing an amendment that would ban gay marriage in the only state that allows it. VoteOnMarriage.org is asking the court to interpret the recess as a vote in favor of the amendment. Many lawmakers said the vote was designed to kill the amendment.

The legislature is scheduled to take up the question again Jan. 2, the last day of the session. Supporters of the question fear lawmakers will again avoid taking a vote, killing the proposed amendment.

Glen Lavy, a lawyer representing the group, says the lawsuit is needed to force lawmakers to follow the constitution. It seeks $500,000 (â,¬380,000) from the lawmakers for the cost of the group's legal battles and another $5 million (â,¬3.8 million) in punitive damages. The damages would be split 109 ways and lawmakers would be held personally liable, he said.

"We would like to put an end to the Massachusetts Legislature thumbing its nose at citizen initiatives," Lavy said. "This lawsuit is about holding those legislators responsible for their illegal conduct."

Gary Buseck, legal director of Gay & Lesbian Advocates & Defenders, calls the lawsuit "laughable" and said it was at the "outer limits of plausibility."

It is the second lawsuit designed to force lawmakers to take a vote on the question.

Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and other opponents of gay marriage filed a suit with the state Supreme Judicial Court asking the court to force lawmakers to take a vote on the proposed amendment or, if they fail to act, to put the question on the 2008 ballot anyway. The case is pending.

The Massachusetts Supreme Court ruled in 2003 that the state must allow gay marriage. Massachusetts is the only state to do so, although Connecticut and Vermont allow same-sex civil unions.

Airline Mergers Could Raise Fares In '07 (AP)

By Dave Carpenter

AP, December 14, 2006

CHICAGO (AP) -- A long-anticipated consolidation of U.S. airlines could mean higher fares for travelers as overlapping routes are eliminated, experts said Wednesday as talk of likely deals reverberated throughout the industry.

That's one reason why any such buyouts could draw intensified regulatory scrutiny, along with the potential for increased labor and service disruptions, as some consumer advocates warn.

Don't tell that to Wall Street. Airline stocks surged on news that United and Continental are holding preliminary discussions and after Air Tran launched a hostile takeover bid for Midwest, with other carriers also examining how to merge to keep up with bigger competition.

Numerous regulatory and other obstacles remain before any deal can occur, but industry observers said all the talks and recent airline restructurings have set the stage for big changes in the business next year.

"We're off to the races," said airline expert Terry Trippler, who has been monitoring the industry for 38 years. "2007 is going to be a major year -- we are going to see some major consolidation."

UAL Corp.'s United Airlines and Continental Airlines Inc. declined comment on whether they are talking about teaming up. But a person close to the airlines who asked not to be identified said they have been exploring a possible combination in discussions that stepped up after US Airways Group Inc. made a hostile bid for bankrupt rival Delta Air Lines Inc. last month. The talks were said to be very preliminary, with no deal imminent.

The person did not want to be named because of the sensitive nature of the talks.

Putting together the nation's second- and fifth-largest carriers would produce an airline superpower -- the nation's largest -- merging United's strengths in the Pacific and western U.S. with Continental's successful operations in Latin America and the Atlantic market and its prosperous hub in Newark, N.J., a popular gateway to Europe.

That could enable United, slimmed down from a three-year bankruptcy restructuring that ended in February, and Continental to use their combined clout to reduce operating costs and become more profitable.

Analysts say other potential deal permutations that may be explored -- if they haven't been already -- include AMR Corp.'s American Airlines linking up with Northwest Airlines Corp., and they stress that counterparts routinely talk with one other about consolidation options.

But would a mega-airline be good for consumers? That depends on who's asked.

Most experts agree that less competition would boost fares, but some see boons for passengers, too.

Trippler, with the Web site MyVacationPassport.com, said consumers will benefit in the long run from healthier airlines and, as a result, a much more stable transportation system. He said competition should remain strong and fares shouldn't climb much.

Kevin Mitchell, however, said ticket prices would rise significantly and the public can expect service disruptions, repercussions from labor strife and more job insecurity in the airline industry if the carriers merge. He said that if all the deals in discussion come about, there will effectively be three fewer U.S. network airlines in operation.

"Shareholders, advisers and other firms are the big winners here," said Mitchell, chairman of the Business Travel Coalition, an advocacy group. "I would view it, if I'm a business traveler, on the customer service side as many years of unimaginable pain."

Joe Brancatelli, an independent business travel analyst, said consumers already are losers from merger mania -- with or without deals being consummated.

"So much management time is being consumed by creating or fighting a merger," said Brancatelli, who runs a Web site for business travelers called joesentme.com. "All that time would have otherwise been spent on plugging holes in the already creaky system."

Rep. James Oberstar, D-Minn., who will chair the House Transportation Committee in Congress next year, said he will not hesitate to hold hearings next year to "expose the anti-competitive effects" of airline industry consolidation and to "nudge the Justice Department" to use its power to stop potential acquisitions.

While discount airlines aren't the focus of merger speculation, combining the larger, so-called legacy carriers could provide an opening for budget carriers such as Southwest Airlines Co., JetBlue Airways Corp. and AirTran Holdings Inc. to push their ticket prices higher as well.

Orlando-based AirTran said Wednesday its $290 million offer for rival Midwest Air Group Inc. was rejected but it will continue trying to acquire the Milwaukee-based regional carrier.

Elk Grove Village, Ill.-based United and Continental have many hurdles to clear to make any deal come about.

Regulators could look at the combined airline's added strength in the Northeast as detrimental to competition, with Continental's Newark hub and United's at Washington-Dulles. United already has endured a failed merger with US Airways in 2000 because of regulatory opposition.

United's prickly labor situation also could be problematic after multiple cuts and layoffs in recent years. The carrier's outspoken flight attendants union quickly served notice Wednesday that it has "severe reservations."

"Any type of business combination is historically fraught with difficulties including regulatory problems, huge expenses, corporate governance issues and, most notably, employee relations," said Greg Davidowitch, president of the United branch of the Association of Flight Attendants.

Also, Northwest could block any acquisition of Continental by virtue of the "golden share" it holds in its Houston-based business partner. A 2000 deal between the airlines gave Northwest that power in exchange for letting Continental buy back some of its stock that its code-share ally held.

Nevertheless, United reportedly has for months been studying ways to merge with either Continental or Delta, and the combination of private-equity funding and the willingness of both sides could get a deal done.

The two carriers led a rally in most airline stocks. Shares in UAL jumped $2.01, or 4.6 percent, to close at $45.24, and Continental rose $1.88, or 4.4 percent, to $44.76.

Big Consolidated Airline Inc. (NYT)

By Jeff Bailey

New York Times, December 14, 2006

AirTran Holdings is roughly a tenth the size of its main competitor, Delta Air Lines. So AirTran executives would seem unlikely cheerleaders of a potential merger that would make Delta 60 percent larger.

But the recent $8.5 billion takeover offer for Delta by US Airways has found a fan in Joseph B. Leonard, chief executive at AirTran, which, like Delta, flies routes across the Southeast from its hub in Atlanta.

“I’m rooting for it,” Mr. Leonard said yesterday in an interview, after announcing his own proposed takeover of Midwest Air, an airline based in Oak Creek, Ill., for $290 million.

Mr. Leonard may relish his role as underdog but that is not why he hopes the carriers merge — he just wants to see fewer jets in the sky. After all, US Airways’ proposed takeover would reduce the two airlines’ combined jet fleet about 10 percent.

That, in turn, would allow the merged Delta — and AirTran — to raise fares on many routes, significantly increasing profits.

“It doesn’t take much,” he said.

The prospect of higher profits has stimulated a new round of merger talks in the industry, whose fortunes have started to improve after more than $30 billion in losses over the last five years.

Discussions about a possible deal between United Airlines and Continental Airlines came to light this week. And if one big merger goes through, other airlines will probably feel compelled to pair off as well or wind up at a competitive disadvantage because they have higher costs or smaller route networks.

But less financial misery for airlines often means more bad news for their passengers — since, in this business, misery tends to be a zero-sum game.

Fewer planes would lead, certainly in the short term, to more-crowded flights and higher fares.

Airline mergers are already on the political radar screen. Concerned about rising fares and the potential for reduced air service to small communities, Representative James L. Oberstar, Democrat of Minnesota, the next chairman of the House Committee on Commerce and Transportation, said yesterday that the Justice Department should block any major airline merger.

If it does not, Mr. Oberstar said, he would call hearings before his committee to consider action to block such mergers (three steps are necessary to approve an airline deal: the Transportation Department must determine that a merger is financially viable, the Federal Aviation Administration must approve a certificate of safety, and the Justice Department must determine that there are no antitrust issues).

Mr. Oberstar said the public could be harmed only by the sort of large mergers contemplated by US Airways and by United and Continental, and that those in turn would lead to other mergers.

"I don't think there's any benefit from mergers except for the benefit of stockholders and airline officials," Mr. Oberstar said. "There is no benefit to the traveling public."

Mr. Oberstar's district is centered on Duluth, considerably north of the headquarters of Northwest Airlines, which are near Minneapolis-St. Paul, but he is sensitive to the desires of his home state's airline to remain independent. Northwest, which has lucrative Asian routes but is operating in bankruptcy, could be vulnerable to a takeover if Delta succumbs to US Airways.

The industry's recent history serves to bolster Mr. Oberstar's argument.

The domestic airlines' fleet shrank about 12 percent from 2000 to 2005, the Transportation Department reported, to 3,938 big jets from 4,462. That, in combination with an improving economy, permitted airlines to raise fares about 15 percent over the last year.

And the smaller fleet will continue to help prop up prices for an industry still heavily in debt and vulnerable to the next economic downturn. The Transportation Department does not expect the fleet to return to its year 2000 size until 2011, as most deliveries of jetliners are scheduled to occur outside the United States.

Airlines have also cut costs and jobs to stay afloat. Big network carriers have cut their combined payrolls to 264,000 workers in September 2006 from about 420,000 in September 2001, a 37 percent cut, according to the Transportation Department. And many of those remaining workers are being paid about one third less.

But whether consumers are always harmed by mergers is debatable. If a high-cost airline is acquired by another carrier, travelers may benefit.

A study conducted by Clifford Winston, an economist at the Brookings Institution, found that travelers would suffer, not surprisingly, if a number of airlines left the business. For example, in the year 2000, travelers would have lost $19.6 billion, attributable to higher air fares and less-frequent service, if Southwest Airlines did not exist.

But he also found that customers would have benefited over all that year, by about $3.6 billion, if US Airways had stopped operating, because its service probably would have been replaced by lower-fare airlines with more-frequent service.

He also found that travelers would have benefited by $3.7 billion if American had left the business, and $2.4 billion if Continental had left.

It was an academic exercise, and one intended to measure the loss of only a single airline at a time, but one that shows that some airlines tend to reduce industry fares while others prop them up.

To be sure, a more recent study would lead to different results, because US Airways and other airlines have revamped in recent years.

"It really matters who you lose and who comes in to take their place," Mr. Winston said.

Any price increases that airlines are able to push through as a result of mergers could also end up being relatively short term. Southwest, AirTran, JetBlue Airways and other low-cost airlines have collectively grown to about 35 percent of the industry from about 10 percent in 1990, said Daniel M. Kasper, a managing director at LECG, a consulting firm.

And those carriers are growing as the bigger, established airlines shrink. If history is any guide, Southwest and the others can be counted on to start flying routes where US Airways or other network carriers reduce service.

"The market is perfectly capable of sorting these things out," Mr. Kasper said.

While some in the industry insist there is too much airline capacity, Mr. Kasper said the problem was that too much of the capacity remained in the hands of older network carriers. More cutbacks by these airlines would help hasten that shift, he added, increasing the number of seats available on low-cost airlines.

DOJ_NMG_0106270

Domestic air fares as of last year were roughly the same as in 1988, the Air Transport Association said, and when adjusted for inflation, fares have been falling steadily for decades as bigger and more-efficient airplanes reduced costs and spurred competition.

More recently, consumers have kept fares from rising by using the Internet to shop. Consumers' ability to compare American Airlines' prices, say, with Southwest's has kept fares from rising faster this last year.

In coming days, much of the industry will be waiting to see if US Airways is able to persuade Delta's unsecured creditors to help press its case. Those creditors, whose claims will convert into common stock that controls the company after Delta's exit from bankruptcy, can demand that Delta permit US Airways to inspect its books and otherwise research the proposed takeover.

Delta's management opposes the deal and plans to file its stand-alone plan in bankruptcy court next week. Delta claims soared about 50 percent after the US Airways offer was made Nov. 15. Delta executives face pressure to present a plan that could justify something close to that higher value.

Just as crucially, Delta management is expected to raise concerns about the US Airways proposal, especially its ability to pass muster with antitrust regulators.

"We are skeptical," Ed Bastian, Delta's chief financial officer, said in an interview.

Mr. Kasper, the consultant, said that regulators would try to determine whether any competition lost because of the merger would be replaced within two years. Delta and US Airways own the two New York shuttle operations to Boston and Washington, and presumably one of them would have to be sold. And US Airways said the two airlines dominate only a relatively small number of their combined markets.

Delta management's success at resisting US Airways "could be the tipping point," that either spurs more deals or ends the industry merger talk, said the chief executive of another big airline, who asked not to be identified because his company could end up in merger negotiations, too.

"There's a chance nothing will get done," he said.

Delta Rally: 'We Are Not For Sale' (AJC)

By Dave Hirschman, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

Atlanta Journal-Constitution, December 14, 2006

A raucous crowd of more than 3,000 Delta Air Lines workers alternately cheered, booed, clapped and hissed Wednesday as they loudly expressed opposition to a takeover bid by rival US Airways.

Delta employee groups used the nearly two-hour rally to bash Tempe, Ariz.-based US Airways and its CEO, Doug Parker, in pointed, personal terms. He was compared to vilified airline raiders Carl Icahn and Frank Lorenzo and even the fictional Gordon Gekko from the movie "Wall Street."

"You have underestimated your opponent!" Delta pilot union chairman Lee Moak thundered at the meeting in a convention hall near the Atlanta airport, which combined the fervor of a tent revival with the pragmatism of a political strategy session.

"Go back to the desert of Arizona. Thousands of loyal Delta employees in this room are telling you that Delta is our company and we are not for sale!"

Georgia's U.S. senators, Saxby Chambliss and Johnny Isakson, lauded the Delta workers and urged them to back management efforts to preserve Delta's history and independence.

Chambliss said he told Parker in a Washington meeting that he and other members of the Georgia delegation stoutly oppose the deal and plan hearings to pressure the Justice Department to reject it as anti-competitive.

"The proposed deal is a bad deal for Delta and we're opposed to it," Chambliss said to a standing ovation. "It's going to lead to additional mergers that aren't good for the passengers you serve."

His argument may have been buttressed by reports Wednesday that United and Continental airlines are talking about a merger. Most analysts say that would be a defensive option to trump the effect of a US Airways-Delta marriage. And AirTran Airways, Atlanta's second-largest carrier behind Delta, said it's pursuing a nearly $290 million buyout of Midwest Airlines despite that carrier's initial rejection.

DOJ_NMG_0106271

US Airways announced its unsolicited $8.7 billion Delta bid in November, after being rebuffed in earlier private approaches. Delta executives — who did not attend Wednesday's rally — say they want to finish the carrier's Chapter 11 restructuring as an independent company.

But the airline's creditors have a big say in the outcome. They are analyzing the value and other merits of the US Airways offer and will weigh it against a Delta reorganization plan expected to be filed in bankruptcy court as soon as next week.

Wednesday's quickly organized rally aimed to prove that opposition goes deeper than top management.

Oversized TV screens showed film clips from Delta's humble beginnings as a crop-dusting service, along with commercials through the decades.

U.S. Rep. David Scott (D-Ga.) praised Delta workers for enduring five years of pay cuts, furloughs and adversity capped by the Chapter 11 filing. He lambasted US Airways for terminating its employee pension plans during its own bankruptcy case, then aiming to take over Delta, which has announced a deal to save its main non-pilot pension plan.

"You're writing the greatest recovery story in the history of American business," Scott told the Delta workers.

Scott called US Airways executives "vultures" for attempting to profit from the sacrifices of Delta workers, and said the proposed merger was "anti-competitive and anti-American."

US Airways has said it would adopt the Delta name if the merger went through but hasn't said where the combined company would be based. Many experts consider Tempe the likely choice since Parker and his lieutenants would run the airline. They previously ran Tempe-based America West Airlines, which merged with the larger US Airways and adopted its name in 2005.

"How can Atlanta be Atlanta without Delta?" said 58-year-old Delta retiree Carol Kirkland, who attended the rally. "Tempe, Arizona? Come on."

Moak recently held a pilot union meeting outside the former US Airways offices in Arlington, Va., to highlight what he believes would be Atlanta's fate if the deal goes forward. He said US Airways plans to expand its Tempe headquarters.

"Is there any real question as to where the corporate headquarters will land?" he said.

Moak also noted that Parker and his team are still at work on integrating America West and US Airways. "If you want to run an airline," he said mockingly, "why don't you start with the one you already have?"

Concern about the loss of Delta's headquarters has given management many local allies. Earlier Wednesday, the board of Central Atlanta Progress, which includes executives from some of Atlanta's top companies, passed a resolution supporting Delta's independence.

Phil Gee, a spokesman for US Airways, said he isn't surprised by the emotional opposition. "It's something we definitely expected to encounter," he said. "Delta people are very passionate. You'd be hard pressed to find employees with more pride for their company than they have."

US Airways contends a merger would be a bold move to create a stronger airline — and one less vulnerable to the financial crises that overtook both US Airways and Delta in recent years.

The United-Continental talks are not new, though they have become more serious since US Airways approached Delta, according to published reports. A deal remains far from certain. One big obstacle: Northwest Airlines may be able to stop it under a 2000 cross-marketing agreement with Continental.

The Wall Street Journal reported that, in addition to talks with Continental, United also has informally pitched itself to Delta as a better merger partner than US Airways if Delta or its creditors conclude a deal is unavoidable.

Kevin Mitchell, chairman of the Business Travel Coalition, said if such a "tsunami" of airline consolidation were to occur, repercussions for fliers would be disastrous, with fares rising as competition waned.

"What's more, these potential transactions represent a near-term fix to the industry's difficulties and do not address systemic profitability problems and root causes," he said.

Airlines are rebounding this year, partly on the wings of cost cuts from layoffs and restructurings. But they still must battle the high cost of fuel. Many analysts believe consolidation would enable carriers to cut overlapping routes and reduce capacity, making it easier to raise fares.

DOJ_NMG_0106272

Others note the industry's troubled history with getting cooperation from labor groups, not to mention the difficulties of bringing different fleets, maintenance schedules and cultures under one umbrella. Said veteran airline consultant Mike Boyd: "You're dealing with a lot of emotion here that may not make sense in the light of day."

Utah Officials Express Concern Over Possible Delta Merger (KSL)

KSL-TV Salt Lake City, December 14, 2006

(KSL News) Utah legislators are concerned about the future of Delta Airlines, especially if the company merges with US Airways.

Even though Delta has given no indication of a merger Utah officials are being proactive-- asking the Justice Department now to consider the risks such a move would pose for Utah's economy before approving a merger in the future.

Rep. Greg Curtis (R), Utah Speaker of the House: "We're simply trying to make sure that there's a heightened awareness. Make sure this works within the statutory framework. Not asking for a statutory change."

When US Airways made the offer to Delta last month they assured Governor Huntsman the move would not adversely affect Utah.

Legislators say their request to the Justice Department is just making sure that promise is kept.

Airline Industry Poised For Shake-up? (USAT)

By Dan Reed

USA Today, December 14, 2006

One small takeover bid — and the possibility of a much bigger one — rocked the airline world Wednesday, moving stock prices and fueling speculation about the future shape of the industry.

Midwest Airlines, a small Milwaukee-based carrier highly regarded by Midwesterners for its quality of service, rejected a public offer of $290 million in stock and cash from Orlando-based AirTran, one of the USA's fast-growing low-cost carriers.

But AirTran CEO Joe Leonard says he won't give up his pursuit, which has involved several previous, private offers that Midwest's board rebuffed.

Meanwhile, continued speculation about a possible merger of United Airlines and Continental Airlines fueled a growing buzz about industry consolidation first prompted by US Airways' Nov. 15 bid to acquire Delta Air Lines out of Chapter 11 bankruptcy.

Adding to industry chatter: the announcement late Wednesday of the sale of Australia's Qantas. Qantas agreed to a sweetened $8.64 billion offer less than 24 hours after rejecting a slightly smaller bid from the same group. The acquiring group, Airline Partners Australia, includes Texas Pacific Group, the U.S. private equity company led by financier David Bonderman. Texas Pacific previously has held large stakes in both Continental Airlines and America West, now part of US Airways, and continues to hold a big stake in Europe's Ryanair.

Neither Continental nor United would confirm that they are in talks. Two industry sources with knowledge of the discussions, being conducted privately, said the merger talks are active. They cautioned that no announcement is imminent and that a merger may never occur.

The airline activity stirred Wall Street. On a day when oil prices inched upward and the Dow Jones industrial average was flat, the Amex Airline index rose almost 3%. United and Continental shares gained the most, 4.7% and 4.4%, respectively. Most other airline stocks also rose, though US Airways' shares fell 0.4%.

Analyst Ray Neidl at Calyon Securities told clients that a United-Continental merger makes sense because their route networks are complementary. But he warned that it "entails addressing a series of operational issues, as well as antitrust concerns."

Also on the merger front: Delta executives, who are resisting the US Airways takeover, told their top creditors that the airline would be worth more than the takeover bid if it's allowed to exit bankruptcy in 2007 as a stand-alone carrier. Delta management estimates the carrier's worth then would be as much as $12 billion, vs. the pending offer of about $8.5 billion.

Chicago Tribune, December 14, 2006

What the frenzy of airline mergers and reports of new takeover bids might mean for passengers, Chicago and the industry

Once the frenzy has subsided, and all the airline industry consolidation has been digested, Chicago could find itself home to the country's biggest carrier, a supersize United Airlines, or home to none at all.

Passengers could be looking at higher fares or more bargains. They also could be in for a long, confusing period of service upheaval, industry analysts say.

Tens of thousands of workers could be affected as airlines merge, with some getting bigger and others disappearing.

Nothing was for certain Wednesday, except that it had been a remarkable 24 hours for airline takeover action and merger talk, as an industry that has appeared ripe for consolidation for years suddenly began moving toward one of the biggest, and maybe fastest, realignments ever seen in American business.

"This is the big bang," said Kevin Mitchell, chairman of the Business Travel Coalition, a Radnor, Pa.-based advocacy group for corporate buyers of air travel. "Everything could happen from here."

Elk Grove Township-based United was at the center of the action, negotiating a potential merger with Continental Airlines and reportedly looking over Delta Air Lines Inc., the object of an unfriendly offer from US Airways.

Meanwhile, AirTran Airways said Wednesday that it would continue its hostile pursuit of Milwaukee-based Midwest Airlines, a move aimed at shaking Southwest Airlines' lock on low-cost service in the region from its base at Midway Airport.

And Australia's Qantas Airways Ltd. announced that it accepted an $8.7 billion takeover offer from a consortium of private-equity funds, led by Texas Pacific Group and Macquarie Bank Ltd.

Further speculation is that American Airlines is checking out Northwest Airlines, which is in bankruptcy along with Delta. Mindful of the talk, Northwest Chief Executive Douglas Steenland told employees this week that the Minnesota-based carrier intends to emerge from Chapter 11 next year as a stand-alone company.

When the dust settles, analysts think the six major airlines atop the U.S. market could meld into three megacarriers, though there is no guarantee any of the deals will get done.

"This is a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity," said Alan Sbarra, principal with Roach and Sbarra, an airline consulting firm based in the San Francisco area. "I really think that if there's going to be consolidation, this is the time to do it."

Any deals must be approved by federal antitrust regulators, however, and they traditionally have been wary of large-scale consolidation.

And even if they pass muster, massive airline mergers would be exceptionally difficult to pull off, experts say. To do so, carriers must mesh schedules involving thousands of daily flights around the globe, resolve differing cultures that go back generations and combine workforces the size of a small city.

Most aviation mergers in the U.S. over the past 30 years have faltered, and even airlines that pull off this feat tend to be plagued by service problems for years afterward.

The typical miscues that plague merging employee groups would be greatly amplified if virtually every large American airline is swept up in a dealmaking frenzy, experts say.

"You're essentially putting the whole system in play," said Mitchell. "There would be customer-service disruption for years."

Changing the work habits of huge numbers of frontline employees will run the risk of miscommunication, miscues and other problems.

That's bad news for consumers since the four of the airlines in play—Delta, US Airways, Continental and United—are struggling with service problems. They generated the four worst scores for customer complaints among U.S. carriers during October, according to a recent report by the Bureau of Transportation Statistics.

However, many in aviation remain skeptical that the industry-shattering change under contemplation will materialize.

Delta's management team remains adamantly opposed to US Airways' $8.5 billion bid and, like Northwest, has vowed to emerge from bankruptcy without a merger partner.

"I take Delta at their word," said William Brandt, a Chicago-based restructuring expert. "If they do manage to beat the US Airways bid, and the chances of that happening are 50-50, then Delta will stand alone and not go running to United."

Meanwhile, United and Continental's merger talks, described as preliminary, appear hung up on the issue of which management team would lead the combined company, said a person familiar with the negotiations.

That's a crucial issue that has some civic leaders on edge since it could determine where the airline's headquarters is based. For now, United still plans to move its headquarters to downtown Chicago early next year, said a spokeswoman.

The airline hasn't talked to city officials about if or how consolidation would affect the high-profile move, which United announced this summer in exchange for millions of dollars in federal and state aid.

"It's always a nervous thing, but this city gives them the whole world, and Houston does not," said Paul O'Connor, executive director of World Business Chicago, a non-profit group that promotes economic development in the city.

The two airlines have talked several times about joining forces over the past decade. However, Continental's previous overtures to United and CEO Glenn Tilton faltered after the two disagreed on management control, sources said.

United is the second-largest U.S. carrier, while Continental ranks fifth. Even so, Continental CEO Lawrence Kellner wouldn't be content to play second-fiddle to Tilton, say people who know him.

"Remember, these guys have big egos," said Tom Buffenbarger, international president of the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, which represents ramp workers and gate agents at United and flight attendants at Continental. "Glenn Tilton is an oilman. It would be a battle of Texas titans."

Mergers always generate much anxiety for airline workers, who worry about losing their jobs as well as seniority, which determines the pay and perks they receive.

But there's a silver lining for United workers: Any merger likely would force management to reopen the airline's current, unpopular labor contracts, analysts say. They otherwise wouldn't be subject to revision before late 2009.

While consumer advocates warn that consolidation could lead to higher ticket prices, one of Wednesday's bids could have the opposite effect for Chicago passengers.

Thwarted by Southwest in an earlier attempt to become the largest airline at Midway, AirTran is looking to establish a major hub in Milwaukee through its hostile offer for Midwest Airlines.

The up to $330 million bid, made Oct. 20 and disclosed Wednesday, would give AirTran control of about half of the operations at Milwaukee's Mitchell International Airport. Midwest rejected the offer Dec. 6, but AirTran said it would keep trying.

An increased presence in the Midwest would make AirTran a potent rival to Southwest, capable of drawing bargain-hunting passengers from across the Chicago area. The increased competition should keep prices down, experts say.

"Milwaukee is a perfectly suited alternative to Chicago," said Sbarra, the airline consultant.

Obstacle Looms In United-Continental Deal (WT)

By Sean Lengell

Washington Times, December 14, 2006

Reported talks between Continental and United airlines over a proposed merger may be doomed as the result of an unusual relationship between Continental and a third airline.

Northwest Airlines holds a special preferred "golden share" of Continental Airlines stock, giving Northwest the right to block Continental from consolidating with another airline.

The alliance dates to late 2000 when Northwest agreed to sell shares of Continental common stock back to Continental after the Justice Department accused Northwest of anti-competitive behavior.

As a condition of the sale, a special class of preferred Continental stock was created and sold to Northwest, giving the airline veto power if Continental attempted to merge with another airline.

Northwest declined to say whether it would consider exercising its veto. But airline analyst Anthony Tangorra said the Eagan, Minn., airline wouldn't hesitate because a Continental-United combination would create the world's largest carrier, dwarfing Northwest.

"Northwest highly values its right to block the acquisition of Continental Airlines," said Mr. Tangorra, chief executive of Latitude Transport Advisory of New York.

Sources who confirmed the United-Continental talks asked not to be identified because the discussions are private. United and Continental officially declined to comment on the talks.

Continental still could proceed with an acquisition, despite objections from Northwest, if the deal doesn't require a vote of Continental stockholders.

Moreover, if Northwest is engaged in a merger of its own, its veto power over Continental would be voided under terms of its 2000 alliance.

"There are a lot of hurdles to this [United-Continental proposal], so it's anything but a done deal," said Ray Neidl, an airline analyst with Calyon Securities.

A Continental-United partnership would make sense because United's strong presence in the Pacific and Western U.S. would complement Continental's presence in the Latin American and trans-Atlantic markets, analysts say.

Just how serious are Continental and United about merging?

"Continental and United have been talking for years," Mr. Tangorra said. "As a matter of fact, every airline has been talking to every airline for years. The moment of those talks have an ebb and flow."

The United-Continental acquisition proposal is one of several for airlines in recent weeks.

US Airways Group Inc. last month proposed an $8 billion takeover of bankrupt Delta Air Lines. Delta has said it has no interest in the offer.

AirTran Holdings Inc. yesterday made a $290 million stock and cash bid for Midwest Air Group Inc., the parent company of Midwest Airlines, an Oak Creek, Wis., carrier with hubs in Milwaukee and Kansas City, Mo.

Australia's Qantas Airways staved off a recent takeover bid led by an investment bank and two private-equity firms.

United also has been reported to be considering an acquisition of Delta.

"The industry is fragmented and primed for consolidation," Mr. Neidl said.

Continental Shares Reach Post-9/11 High (AO)

AP, December 14, 2006

NEW YORK --Shares of Continental Airlines Inc. soared to their highest level since before the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks, as the company talks with United Airlines about a possible combination to create a mega-carrier.

Houston-based Continental's stock jumped $1.82, or 4.2 percent, to $44.70 in midday trading on the New York Stock Exchange. They climbed as high as $46.29 earlier in the session, topping their prior 52-week high of $45.76 set earlier this week. It is the stock's highest level since Aug. 9, 2001, when shares reached $47.10.

Shares of United's parent UAL Corp., meanwhile, surged $2.26, or 5.2 percent, to $45.49 on the Nasdaq. They reached $46.54 earlier in the session, their highest point since they began trading in February following UAL's emergence from Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection. The stock's prior high was $45.20, set earlier this week.

Analysts recommended patience. The carriers are likely watching to see if US Airways Group Inc.'s proposed hostile takeover of Delta Air Lines Inc. goes through, they said.

Prudential analyst Bob McAdoo wrote in a research report that he doubts Continental wants a deal, but it might do one contingent on the Delta/US Airways deal being approved by federal regulators.

He said American Airlines' parent AMR Corp. likely has a similar strategy and could link up with Northwest Airlines Corp.

Calyon Securities analyst Ray Neidl said a United/Continental marriage would make a good fit, bringing together United's strong Pacific network with Continental's Latin American strength and Newark, N.J., hub.

However, any deal involving Continental must account for the so-called "golden share" that Northwest holds in the carrier. Through a special voting series of Continental preferred stock, Northwest can block a merger between Continental and another major carrier.

Consolidation has long been a hot topic for the airline industry. Goldman Sachs analyst Robert Barry said in a research report that merger activity would be a rising tide that lifts at least most stocks for the industry.

Combinations would allow airlines to reduce available seats, giving them more pricing power to raise fares and boost profits amid high fuel prices.

DOJ_NMG_0106276

Such deals, though, would likely face tough federal antitrust scrutiny, analysts say.

Qantas Agrees To A$11.1bn Takeover Offer (FT)

By Sundeep Tucker In Hong Kong And Raphael Minder In Sydney

Financial Times, December 14, 2006

Qantas has agreed to an A$11.1bn (US$8.7bn) takeover offer by a consortium including Australia's Macquarie Bank and Texas Pacific Group, a US buy-out fund.

The airline rejected the consortium's opening offer on Wednesday but early on Thursday it recommended a sweetened A$5.60-a-share offer.

Shares in Qantas jumped nearly 5 per cent to A$5.33 by early Thursday afternoon. The buy-out offer is 29 per cent more than the stock traded at November 21, when Qantas first said it had been approached.

Margaret Jackson, chairman, said Thursday that, subject to receiving an opinion by independent expert Grant Samuel, the non-executive directors unanimously intended to recommend the bid.

The move coincides with upheaval in the airlines industry in the US. Northwest Airlines is expected to use its right to block any proposed merger between Continental and United, derailing attempts to advance talks to create the world's largest carrier.

A Qantas sale would require government approval and must be backed by investors holding more than 90 per cent of the airline's equity. Capital Group of the US is the largest shareholder, with 12.8 per cent.

If endorsed by investors, the agreement would mark one of the biggest aviation deals in history and follows a spate of multi-billion dollar buyouts in Australia this year.

Geoff Dixon, Qantas' chief executive hit out at a warning by Moody's Investor Service Wednesday that it might downgrade its rating on the airline's debt to junk status in the wake of the buyout. "I believe the statement that was made was right out of line," he told reporters. "I do not believe it has any validity at all."

The agreement follows a day of drama in Australia on Wednesday that began with the airline rejecting the consortium's opening offer of A$5.50 a share, which valued Qantas at A$10.9bn.

Qantas's non-executive directors said "the terms of the proposal are not acceptable" as these included "complex conditions" such as a break fee payable to the consortium.

This unexpected rejection sparked a day of talks between Qantas executives and representatives of the consortium. The private equity groups dropped some of their conditions and raised the offer price by 10 cents to A$5.60.

The consortium is understood to have dropped the demand for a break fee, set at A$100m, in theory freeing Qantas to entertain rival buy-out approaches.

Macquarie confirmed a report that the consortium, called Airline Partners Australia, would be majority-Australian owned. Lawmakers have been concerned about the possible buy-out. The airline is subject to ownership restrictions that limit foreigners to a combined 49 per cent stake.

Macquarie said it would own less than 15 per cent, with local rivals Allco Finance Group taking 11 per cent and Allco Equity Partners the biggest single investor with 34 per cent. Offshore investors would hold less than 40 per cent, with neither Texas Pacific nor Canada's Onex holding more than 15 per cent.

Qantas Deal Reflects Private Equity's Wider Horizon (WSJ)

By Henny Sender And Kate Linebaugh

Wall Street Journal, December 14, 2006

The $8.7 billion transaction for Australia's Qantas Airways Ltd. suggests the global deal-making frenzy spawned by private equity may be turning its sights to the recovering airline sector.

The board of Qantas yesterday unanimously approved a sweetened takeover bid by a private-equity consortium being led by Texas Pacific Group and Australia's Allco Equity Partners Ltd. The bid, of 5.60 Australian dollars a share, was increased by 10 Australian cents a share after the board rejected a bid a day earlier. Other terms were also changed.

Qantas shares were up almost 5% to A$5.34 in early afternoon trading on the Australian Stock Exchange. The offer price is 33% higher than the share price when speculation about the deal began on Nov. 6.

Under the terms of the deal, Qantas will be delisted from the Australian exchange -- but retain majority Australian ownership, as required by law, with Allco becoming the company's largest shareholder. Qantas Chief Executive Officer Geoff Dixon and Chief Financial Officer Peter Gregg will retain their positions, and at least two-thirds of the board will be Australian citizens.

Private equity's increasing role in financial markets comes as airlines world-wide have recovered from their doldrums, and private-equity firms and other private investors have shown increasing interest in an industry famously troublesome for investors. Private-equity firms were significant investors in the recent reorganizations of ATA Holdings Corp. and Aloha Airgroup Inc. in the U.S. Hedge funds participated in the reorganization and merger that created the current US Airways Group Inc. Private-equity and hedge-fund firm Wexford Capital LLC, which partly owns Republic Airways Holdings Inc., based in Indianapolis, last year arranged the purchase of regional jets and landing slots from US Airways for $110 million. (See related article1.)

For Texas Pacific, the Qantas deal represents a return to an area of core competence. The firm's first, iconic deal was the purchase of Continental Airlines out of bankruptcy protection. And while Texas Pacific has a Sydney office, two of its four original partners, co-founder David Bonderman and Rick Schifter, who worked on the original Continental deal, were deeply involved in the negotiations over Qantas.

The Qantas deal marks a change in thinking at Texas Pacific, which until recently was cautious about prospects for the airline sector. For example, when Air Canada was put up for sale in 2004, the firm bid far less than the ultimate buyer, Cerberus Capital Management LP. At the time, the firm said that the kind of profits of a Continental deal were a thing of the past, given the competition from low-cost airlines.

But with the Air Canada deal looking just fine, Texas Pacific is on the prowl once more. In addition to Qantas, it is looking at other airlines, particularly in Asia.

Qantas is the dominant airline in Australia and remains profitable. Early this month, Qantas said it expects annual pretax profit to rise as much as 30%.

"The consortium members have made it clear that to us they recognize the immense value of the Qantas brand and intend to improve and grow the business," Qantas Chairman Margaret Jackson said in a release.

The bidding consortium, called Airline Partners Australia, plans a capital-expenditure program of more than A$10 billion to upgrade the fleet and improve Qantas's premium offering. The group is planning to acquire more than 70 aircraft, raising capacity by 40% and expanding services particularly internationally. Macquarie Bank Ltd., Allco Finance Group and Canada's Onex Corp. are among the buyers.

Australian Prime Minister John Howard said today the government will monitor the takeover bid, but the deal was ultimately a matter for the market. The government plans to review the offer to ensure it meets competition laws and foreign-ownership laws, set as part of the 1995 privatization of the airline, based in Sydney.

Under its structure, the deal adheres to the ownership rules which should help avert a backlash from lawmakers who have voiced concern about the takeover of a national icon. The Australian companies in the consortium will have greater voting rights than the overseas investors. Allco's companies will have 46% voting rights, but only 35% economic interests, while Texas Pacific will have a 25% economic interest, but its voting interest will be less than 15%. Macquarie will have less than a 15% stake.

Qantas Board Accepts Offer Of $8.7 Billion For A Buyout (NYT)

By Tim Johnston

New York Times, December 14, 2006

SYDNEY, Australia, Thursday, Dec. 14 — Qantas Airways, Australia's largest airline, agreed on Thursday to accept a sweetened buyout offer of 11.1 billion Australian dollars ($8.7 billion) from a consortium led by Macquarie Bank and the Texas Pacific Group.

In a statement, the board of Qantas said it would recommend that shareholders allow the company to be taken private. If the deal goes ahead, it will be Australia's biggest takeover, and would be the latest move in a global revival in airline stocks, which have languished since Sept. 11, 2001.

"The directors believe this offer allows Qantas shareholders to realize significant value for their shares that has not been fully recognized in the public market," the chairman, Margaret Jackson, said Wednesday.

The bid values the company at 5.60 Australian dollars a share, substantially more than its closing price on Wednesday of 5.09 Australian dollars and analysts' prebid valuations of 4.10 to 4.60 Australian dollars.

The consortium — Airline Partners Australia — includes Texas Pacific, Macquarie Bank, Allco Equity Partners and the Allco Finance Group of Australia, and Onex, the Canadian leveraged buyout company.

The group also brings together an array of aviation talent, including David Bonderman of Texas Pacific; Rod Eddington of Allco Finance, the former chief executive of British Airways; and David Turnbull of Allco Finance, formerly of Cathay Pacific .

Few analysts expect investors to block the deal.

The board had rejected an offer of 5.50 Australian dollars a share on Wednesday. In addition to the increased offer, the bidders agreed to drop their demand for a 1 percent breakup fee.

Matt Crowe, an analyst with J. P. Morgan in Sydney, said he believed that it was not just the price that swayed the board's decision.

"Qantas management have been frustrated for some time by the progress of their cost-reduction program," Mr. Crowe said. "It is harder to make difficult cost reductions that might cause disruption in the short term. Going private will make that easier."

Within the consortium, a complex division of the shareholdings is intended to satisfy the Australian government's requirement that no more than 49 percent of the company is foreign-owned.

Onex and Texas Pacific will hold less than 40 percent of the airline, with Allco Equity Partners expected to hold about 34 percent; the Allco Finance Group, 11 percent; and Macquarie, less than 15 percent.

The arrangement is also unlikely to jeopardize Qantas's participation in bilateral air services agreements — the arrangements between countries that stipulate which airline is allowed to fly what routes and at what capacity — that require that participating airlines be "substantially" domestically owned.

"If this acquisition is successful, Qantas will remain a majority Australian-owned, Australia-based airline," Ms. Jackson said.

Qantas's chief executive, Geoff Dixon, will stay on. Peter Harbison of the Center for Asia Pacific Aviation in Sydney, said that although the airline was already one of the world's most profitable, Mr. Dixon was preparing for a time of less government protection and was betting that the new ownership would give Qantas easier access to capital to continue its expansion beyond Australia into the growth areas of Asia.

Alltel Agrees To Sell 4 Markets (AP)

AP, December 14, 2006

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. (AP) -- Wireless carrier Alltel Corp. said Wednesday it agreed to sell four Minnesota markets to Rural Cellular Corp., in order to meet divestiture requirements established by the U.S. Department of Justice.

Financial terms weren't disclosed.

In October, the company received approval from the Justice Department for its $1.1 billion acquisition of Midwest Wireless on the condition that the combined company sell some assets in markets where they both operate.

The Minnesota markets that will be sold to Rural Cellular have been managed by a trustee by the Department of Justice since October.

Rural Cellular said it plans to use cash on hand to finance the purchase, which is expected to close in the first quarter of 2007.

Shares of Alltel closed up 10 cents at $58.16 on the New York Stock Exchange, while shares of Rural Cellular closed up 7 cents at $12.68 on the Nasdaq.

State Paper Firm Indicted On Charges Of Price Fixing (MJS)

By Joel Dresang

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, December 14, 2006

The U.S. Justice Department announced an indictment Wednesday against a Wisconsin-based paper company in an investigation of price fixing for magazine paper.

DOJ_NMG_0106279

Justice officials said a federal grand jury in Connecticut indicted Stora Enso North America Corp. on charges of conspiring to set prices in consultation with competitors.

The company is the North American subsidiary of the Finnish paper company that bought out Wisconsin Rapids-based Consolidated Papers Inc. in 2000. Stora Enso North America has kept its headquarters in Wisconsin Rapids and employs about 2,700 workers in Wisconsin at mills in Biron, Kimberly, Niagara, Stevens Point, Whiting and Wisconsin Rapids.

According to Justice Department officials, the indictment claims that Stora Enso met with competitors and agreed to increase prices for coated publication papers used in magazines and high-volume catalogs. The indictment contends that Stora Enso sold paper "at collusive and non-competitive prices" from August 2002 to June 2003.

Executives for Stora Enso in Wisconsin Rapids did not return calls late Wednesday. Tim Laatsch, a company spokesman, told the Associated Press that he would not comment because he had not read the indictment.

Last month, parent Stora Enso Oyj reported that the European Commission had closed its investigation of a suspected publication paper cartel.

The U.S. charges against Stora Enso carry a fine of up to $10 million, which could be increased to twice the gain derived from the alleged crime or twice the loss suffered by the alleged victims, if either of those amounts is greater.

Wis. Firm Accused Of Price-fixing Magazine Paper Prices (AP)

By Stephen Singer

AP, December 14, 2006

HARTFORD, Conn. - A federal grand jury on Wednesday indicted a paper products company in a price-fixing conspiracy designed to drive up the sale of paper used to print magazines and catalogues.

Stora Enso North America Corp., based in Wisconsin Rapids, Wis., is accused of conspiring to inflate the prices from August 2002 through June 2003, the U.S. Department of Justice said in a statement.

The paper is primarily used to print magazines, news weeklies and high-volume catalogues. The company agreed to the scheme in a meeting with an unidentified competitor, according to the indictment.

"The price of coated paper used in magazines affects nearly every American," said Thomas O. Barnett, assistant attorney general in charge of the Justice Department's antitrust division.

Stora Enso spokesman Tim Laatsch said he has not read the indictment and would not comment.

Stora Enso is a U.S.-based subsidiary of Stora Enso Oyj of Helsinki, Finland, the second-largest magazine paper producer in the world. Its paper sales are marketed to publishers, retailers, catalog producers, commercial printers and merchants.

Stora Enso has sales offices in Connecticut, Georgia and other states. The conspiracy charged in the indictment, which was handed up in Hartford, was carried out in Connecticut and elsewhere, the Justice Department said.

Violations occurring before June 22, 2004, carry a maximum fine of $10 million, which may be increased.

Stora Enso's stock closed at $15.95, unchanged, on the New York Stock Exchange Wednesday.

Citigroup To Buy Grupo Cuscatlan, U.K.'s Quilter (WSJ)

By David Enrich

Wall Street Journal, December 14, 2006

Citigroup Inc. agreed to buy a Central American banking company in a $1.51 billion cash-and-stock deal that marks the latest in a series of recent overseas acquisitions.

Citigroup said it is buying the subsidiaries of Grupo Cuscatlan from Corporacion UBC Internacional SA, a commercial- and corporate-banking group that does business in El Salvador, Guatemala, Costa Rica, Honduras and Panama. Citigroup also is acquiring the group's pension and insurance operations in El Salvador.

Citigroup, after a yearlong deal-making hiatus imposed by the Federal Reserve, has been on a small shopping spree lately. The company also announced yesterday that it has agreed to buy Quilter, a Morgan Stanley wealth-management unit in the United Kingdom. Terms weren't disclosed.

The Central American deal, coming the day before top Citigroup executives host their annual investor day at their Park Avenue headquarters in New York, is Citigroup's second recent deal in the region and its fifth international deal this fall.

In October, Citigroup bought Grupo Financiero Uno, which it described as Central America's No. 1 credit-card issuer. The bank didn't disclose the terms of that deal. That month, Citigroup also agreed to buy a 20% stake in a big Turkish bank, Akbank TAS. In November, Citigroup led a group that agreed to buy about 86% of Guangdong Development Bank, a southern Chinese lender.

The moves illustrate a bet by Chief Executive Charles Prince that fast-growing overseas markets hold greater potential for the world's biggest bank in market value than the U.S. But it isn't clear the deals will quickly jump-start Citigroup's sluggish revenue streams, a source of angst among many Citigroup investors.

The Grupo Cuscatlan deal "is another significant step in expanding Citigroup's businesses in Latin America," Mr. Prince said in a statement. Coupled with the pending Grupo Uno deal, "these transactions quickly and significantly strengthen our distribution capabilities and product offerings to serve retail and corporate clients in Central America."

Citigroup said Grupo Cuscatlan has $5.4 billion in assets, including $3.5 billion in loans and $3.4 billion in deposits.

Hearst Expects To Close Daily Breeze Purchase This Week (AP)

AP, December 14, 2006

Torrance, Calif. (AP) -- Hearst Corp. expects to complete its purchase of the Daily Breeze on Friday as part of a deal to resell the newspaper to MediaNews Group Inc., according to a court document filed by the two newspaper operators.

The document was filed Wednesday in a pending federal antitrust case involving Denver-based MediaNews and New York-based Hearst, owner of the San Francisco Chronicle, over their plans to consolidate some of the business operations of their San Francisco Bay area newspapers.

A San Francisco investor is trying to block the deal, claiming such cooperation violates antitrust laws.

The two companies also said they had finished negotiations in their swap deal. Under the agreement, Hearst will purchase the Torrance-based Breeze from The Copley Press Inc. and then sell it to MediaNews along with two other publications, the Monterey County (Calif.) Herald and the St. Paul (Minn.) Pioneer Press.

San Diego-based Copley, whose flagship paper is the San Diego Union-Tribune, cited competitive pressures when it indicated in June it wanted to sell its Copley Los Angeles Newspapers. Those papers include the Breeze, the Palos Verdes Peninsula News and The Beach Reporter.

EU's Efforts Stymied? (WSJ)

By KENNETH MAXWELL And SANTIAGO PEREZ

Wall Street Journal, December 14, 2006

MILAN -- Autostrade SpA of Italy and Abertis Infraestructuras SA of Spain halted an agreement to merge and create the world's largest toll-road operator, citing blocks imposed by Italy's government and transportation regulator.

The companies said they remain convinced that a deal should be done, and said they hope to be back with a fresh plan at some point in the future. The companies struck a cash-and-shares deal to merge in April that would have resulted in a company with a market capitalization of €25 billion ($33.2 billion).

As time to secure the deal before a year-end deadline on the original agreement all but ran out, Autostrade and Abertis said in a joint statement that they "acknowledged the impossibility of carrying out the merger."

The failed merger highlights the fact that cross-border European mergers and acquisitions, agreed or hostile, stir up as much of a hornet's nest as ever, despite the European Union's best efforts to promote the notion of a single marketplace.

The companies made it clear that the project isn't dead and buried. "The companies hope that future conditions will allow the plan to be viewed in a different light and with this in mind aim to jointly proceed with initiatives and dialogue at institutional level," they said.

Speaking at a shareholders meeting in Rome, Autostrade Chairman Gian Maria Gros-Pietro made sure to point out that the door to a merger remains open. "We're prepared to discuss Abertis with the government," he said. "If we have a settled [operating] framework, we'll see if a deal's possible."

Abertis Chief Executive Salvador Alemany has said he remains willing to continue talks with Italian regulators. Italian Infrastructure Minister Antonio Di Pietro completed the circle by saying he is also open to more talks on the tie-up.

Investors reacted cautiously, sending Abertis shares higher on hopes for an end to wrangling in Italy for the time being, while Autostrade's stock slipped as the likelihood of a deal, which would be transformational for the company, receded. Abertis's stock price rose 2.6% to €22.80 yesterday in Madrid, while in Milan trading, Autostrade fell 1.5% to €21.80.

In a private note to clients, Lehman Brothers said the halt was more of an "arrivederci" than a farewell. "Both Autostrade and Abertis are convinced they'll resume the merger, which they've stopped for the time being for external reasons," the bank wrote. "There's no need to rush on this one," it added.

People familiar with the situation said the companies' commitment to the deal burns on.

"They've been explicitly vague on the future because they really don't know how long this could take," one person said. "But there are no chances of tangible advances until the Italian government outlines a new regulatory framework. The Italian government has the last word," the person said.

Unable to proceed with the merger for the time being, Autostrade yesterday scrapped a plan to propose a €2.1 billion dividend payout to Autostrade shareholders. The payout was conceived as a means to equalize the valuations of the two companies, along with an agreed swap ratio of 1.05 Abertis shares for every Autostrade share.

Since the merger announcement, the Italian government and transportation regulator have raised one objection after another. Imposing a variety of legal obstacles, the government has sought to wring maximum investment guarantees from the merger partners as a means to boost Italy's transportation system and economic growth without tapping the nation's already-stretched budget.

From the start, the industrial and financial logic of the merger won praise from investors and analysts alike in the unglamorous but highly profitable sector.

The logic of a deal remains compelling for Autostrade, Italy's main roads operator, and Abertis, which is also prominent in other infrastructure sectors. A merger would allow them to pool their global expertise and have greater financial power to target ripening markets in the U.S. and Eastern Europe, and help Abertis secure a key extension of the average lifetime of its licenses to operate highways.

The companies had expected to get full clearance for the transaction before the shareholders meeting scheduled for yesterday to vote on the special dividend payment lined up as part of the merger.

Instead, the Italian government intensified efforts to block the transaction during recent months, seeking to modify license terms for the toll roads operated by Autostrade and threatening to launch lawsuits on grounds that Autostrade allegedly failed to honor investment commitments.

The European Union, which gave the green light to the merger plan, has objected to Italy's efforts to derail the proposed transaction. Yesterday, the European Commission said it might continue its investigations into whether the Italian government has broken antitrust laws and rules ensuring the free movement of capital, even though the merger has been suspended.

The halt represents the second time in the past two years that a Spanish company has been forced to pull takeover plans in Italy because of hurdles imposed in Rome.

Last year, banking giant Banco Bilbao Vizcaya Argentaria SA lost out on buying Banca Nazionale del Lavoro SpA, with BBVA complaining about regulatory interference as Antonio Fazio, who at the time was the Bank of Italy's governor, was widely perceived to strongly back Italian bidders.

Intelligence Chairman Botches Islam Facts (HC)

By Michelle Mittelstadt, Houston Chronicle Washington Bureau

Houston Chronicle, December 14, 2006

Reyes' fumbled answers about terrorists raise questions about his fitness to serve

WASHINGTON — It's hardly the way Texan Silvestre Reyes wanted to ascend to the chairmanship of the influential House Intelligence Committee.

But the world of bloggers buzzed and critics flapped Tuesday about a botched pop quiz that raised questions about the El Paso Democrat's understanding of the al-Qaida terrorist network and other Islamist extremists.

Reyes, who takes the helm of the committee in January and has served on the panel since 2001, didn't know that al-Qaida was a Sunni organization, and couldn't pin down Hezbollah's Shiite affiliations, during an interview last week with Congressional Quarterly's national security editor.

The differences between the Sunni and Shiites are more than semantics. Islam's 1,400-year-old rift is playing out in deadly fashion across Iraq, where ordinary citizens are caught in a crossfire between insurgents, terrorists and militias motivated by politics and religion.

Conservative radio commentator Rush Limbaugh said Tuesday that Reyes' lapse was proof of the Democrats' inattention to national security.

"Do you think the Democrats are concerned about al-Qaida and Hezbollah?" he said, contending that Democrats care more about investigating President Bush and his anti-terrorism policies than going after terrorists.

Reyes declined an interview request Tuesday. In a statement Monday, he said he was "acutely aware of al-Qaida's desire to harm Americans. The Intelligence Committee will keep its eye on the ball, and focus on the pressing security and intelligence issues facing us."

The former Vietnam combat veteran has traveled to Iraq five times and to Afghanistan three times. He also recently toured Lebanon and Israel.

Some experts suggested that Reyes is just one example of a U.S. policy establishment that has paid little attention to the tricky nuances of politics, religion and sectarian differences that have riven the Middle East.

"When it comes to someone in a position of staff responsibility ... it's a little unnerving to discover that they don't know much about the subject," said Loch Johnson, a University of Georgia professor and former congressional aide.

Danielle Pletka, a Middle East and terrorism expert at the conservative American Enterprise Institute, was shocked by Reyes' lack of knowledge.

"If you don't really care enough about the challenge of Islamic extremism and terrorism to learn the basics, then perhaps when offered a plum position, you should say no," she said. "That goes against the grain in a town that likes titles, but it is the honorable course."

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, who tapped Reyes after passing over two more senior Intelligence Committee Democrats with whom she had differences, stands by her pick.

San Bernardino Gang Raid Nets Cash, 45 Suspects (LAT)

By Maeve Reston, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 13, 2006

The arrests cap a seven-month operation in which 35 pounds of meth and 56 guns were seized. The goal is to dismantle the organization, the DEA says.

San Bernardino police and federal officials on Tuesday confiscated $500,000 in cash and arrested 45 alleged gang members believed to be major suppliers of methamphetamine in San Bernardino and the surrounding area, authorities announced.

The bust was the culmination of a seven-month investigation by San Bernardino police and the Los Angeles field office of the Drug Enforcement Administration.

Over the course of the investigation, officers confiscated $820,000 in cash, 56 guns, 41 vehicles and 35 pounds of methamphetamine — the primary drug distributed by the group, federal agents said.

During the seven months, officials arrested 119 people, including five men believed to be top Mexican Mafia associates in San Bernardino, police officials said.

Crime has emerged as a major political issue in San Bernardino in recent years, as the number of murders and violent crimes has increased after a lull in the late 1990s.

DOJ_NMG_0106283

It was the central issue in the mayor's campaign this year, and city residents recently approved a sales tax increase to generate revenue for more officers and crime-prevention programs.

San Bernardino police requested the assistance of the DEA to deal with the surge in methamphetamine and weapons trafficking by gangs in the city.

"When you take this much drugs, this much money and this many guns off the street, it's going to have an impact on crime," said Lt. Mark Garcia, a spokesman for the San Bernardino Police Department.

Special Agent Sarah Pullen, a spokeswoman for the DEA, said the drug seizures and arrests Tuesday morning involved 400 officers who served 43 simultaneous search warrants in Riverside and San Bernardino counties, including five at the reservation of the San Manuel Band of Mission Indians in Highland.

She said those arrested ranged from the "shot-callers" to street-level dealers and muscle.

"The goal of this investigation was to dismantle this organization," said Pullen, who said authorities could not provide details about who was part of the organization or how they operated.

"We are hopeful that over the next few months that basically the entire organization operating out here will be pretty much gone."

The San Bernardino County district attorney's office is expected to file weapons, drug and probation charges against many of the alleged gang members as early as today, Pullen said.

Suspected Leaders Of Major Drug Ring Jailed (ADS)

Arizona Daily Star, December 14, 2006

An international drug-trafficking organization that brought violence and thousands of pounds of marijuana into Southern Arizona has been busted, according to court documents made public Wednesday.

The organization, led by Carlos Molinares-Nuñez for the last five years, has been linked to homicides both in Mexico and the United States that appear to be drug-related, court documents state.

The Molinares-Nuñez drug operation is also responsible for moving thousands of pounds of marijuana into Southern Arizona during a three-year period in which it was being closely monitored by the Drug Enforcement Administration, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, the FBI and the Bisbee Police Department, records show.

An indictment filed in federal court in November was unsealed Wednesday, detailing the intricacies of the ring, which has at least 20 employees.

Only three people, including Molinares-Nuñez, were named in the indictment. The other two are considered to be his top co-conspirators — Luis Alfonso Carillo-Landavazo and Luis Carlos Quijada-Soto, according to a memorandum filed in U.S. District Court.

The memo details how Molinares-Nuñez set up a command center in his home in Naco, Sonora, where, using high-tech equipment, he monitored law enforcement radio frequencies, including those of federal agents in the United States.

"On numerous occasions, agents were frustrated in their enforcement efforts due to active physical and electronic counter-surveillance techniques, which were routinely performed by members" of the drug gang, court documents state.

Agents were not only frustrated by those barriers but also with the fights that the organization would put up any time law enforcement caught them transporting marijuana into the country.

Many tons of marijuana would be transported at one time in modified vehicles that would enter the country by driving in between designated ports of entry to avoid law officers, the memo said.

The drivers were told to evade officers if detected, which resulted in a number of high-speed pursuits as they attempted to return to Mexico.

In one incident near Naco, Ariz., a vehicle became disabled, and the smugglers had to make their way back to Mexico on foot, documents show.

After their escape, they fired across the border with semi- automatic guns.

In another incident detailed in court records, an agent working the case got into a shootout when members of the drug organization confronted the agent at his home.

On Saturday, Molinares-Nuñez — a Mexican national who is a lawful permanent resident — was arrested in Tucson while he was staying with his wife's relatives, his attorney, Walter Nash, said Wednesday.

At the time, he had $4,600 in U.S. currency, a concealed handcuff key and cocaine.

Carillo-Landavazo — who according to court documents was an upper-level manager in charge of the distribution of marijuana from Mexico to Tucson and Phoenix — was arrested on Monday after he was seen leaving a residence linked to the drug gang. He had a border-crossing card, which has been rescinded.

Quijada-Soto, who was also arrested Monday, was responsible for obtaining the vehicles used by the ring and securing drug stash houses in Tucson, court documents state.

He was arrested at the Douglas port of entry while trying to enter the United States.

All three men remained in custody Wednesday at a federal detention center, Nash said.

A hearing will be held at 10:30 a.m. Wednesday to determine if they will be held without bond.

Molinares-Nuñez was indicted on two charges — continuing a criminal enterprise and conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute marijuana — and is facing a 20-year mandatory minimum sentence.

His co-defendants, who were both indicted on the conspiracy charge only, are facing at least 10 years.

17 Arrested In North Country Drug Sweep (AP)

AP, December 13, 2006

PLATTSBURGH, N.Y. (AP) _ A drug bust in the North Country netted 17 arrests Wednesday.

Most of the accused live in and around Plattsburgh and were suspected of dealing marijuana, heroin, methamphetamines, cocaine and crack.

The bust was the work of the Adirondack Drug Task Force, which includes State Police, Plattsburgh Police, the Clinton County Sheriff's Department, the U.S. Border Patrol and the federal Drug Enforcement Administration.

The arrests came after months of investigation and surveillance, DEA Agent James Farnsworth said.

It's becoming more common for people from the New York City area to move to the North Country to sell drugs because they can fetch a higher price in the smaller market, Farnsworth said.

UPDATED: S. Texas Drug Bust Is Huge (SEN)

San Antonio Express, December 14, 2006

If there were any doubts, federal authorities say, a kilo of cocaine that agents found in the underwear of 81-year-old Josefina Campos solidified a case targeting a large smuggling ring centered in San Antonio and Floresville.

Campos' arrest Nov. 28 is but a piece of a puzzle that became more complete Wednesday as officials announced they had smashed a drug-smuggling cell that netted seizures of more than 210 kilograms of cocaine and $4.5 million in cash.

A federal indictment unsealed Wednesday in San Antonio — the fruits of an operation that began in May 2005 — names Campos and 37 other people on charges of conspiracy to commit drug trafficking, conspiracy to launder more than $5 million and related charges.

Officials said at a news briefing that the cocaine was found on Campos when she and her daughter, Yolanda Benavidez, 59, crossed back from Mexico at Eagle Pass. Besides those women, the probe snared an elementary school teacher, a registered nurse, a postal employee and an alleged member of the Mara Salvatrucha, or MS-13, gang.

"As a prosecutor, you think you've seen it all, and then something like this (cocaine concealed in underwear) happens," said U.S. Attorney Johnny Sutton, whose San Antonio-based federal district stretches from Waco south to Eagle Pass and west to El Paso. "It just goes to show you that there's people who will go into this business to make money and sell this poison in the community. We are going to go after these folks no matter what their age."

Express-News Extra

•The Indictment: Details on the charges

DOJ_NMG_0106285

The ring is accused of transporting the cocaine primarily to the Ohio cities of Cleveland and Youngstown, while some loads of the drug hit the streets of San Antonio, Austin, Houston and other Texas cities, according to officials and court records.

Most of the drugs were smuggled across the Mexico border at Eagle Pass-Piedras Negras, according to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration.

"Over the past several days, 29 of the 38 suspects have been arrested in six Texas cities, effectively dismantling a major cocaine organization that was based in San Antonio," said Joe Arabit, assistant special agent in charge of the DEA in San Antonio.

"The roles of those arrested ranged from the (alleged) leader, Jorge Euresti, to many of his distributors, transporters and facilitators whose purpose was to store cash and drugs for this organization."

The case also was unusual given the manner in which much of the alleged drug proceeds were smuggled back to Mexico.

Members of the DEA Task Force and the High Intensity Drug Trafficking Area task force made several seizures that included large amounts of cash, wrapped in plastic, hidden in large boxes of laundry detergent and buckets of construction joint compound.

The largest single seizure was $1.1 million on Aug. 25, 2005, in San Antonio, followed by $647,131 intercepted on Sept. 8, 2005, in Columbus.

The main targets of the drug probe included Euresti, 27, and Suzel Mireles, 30, both of San Antonio, who have been arrested, and Sergio Javier Garza, 33, of Floresville, who's not in custody.

The trio are alleged to have coordinated cocaine trafficking activities; Campos and Benavidez are accused of coordinating money laundering from Eagle Pass.

The probe also netted Joette Natasha Barnes, 25, of League City, a fourth-grade special education teacher for the Galveston Independent School District who lived in San Antonio from 2000 to 2004. Also arrested were postal employee Jonah Davidson, 30, of Tyler; Joy Zwerneman, 38, a registered nurse from San Antonio; and Homero Rodriguez, 28; of Houston, alleged to be linked to the MS-13 gang, officials said.

Other key suspects include San Antonio residents Quincy Dupree Todd, 28; Henry Earl Todd, 35; and brothers Manuel Martinez Zertuche, 65, and Rene Martinez Zertuche, 59, both formerly of Floresville, officials said. The Martinezes were among eight suspects who still were at large Wednesday. A ninth person named in the indictment was expected to surrender today.

Besides the criminal charges, the government also seeks a judgment against the defendants for almost $5.4 million. gcontreras@express-news.net

More Details Behind International Drug Bust In SA (WOAI)

WOAI-TV, December 13, 2006

A major cocaine ring is in shambles after a major bust. 29 people have been arrested, including a 4th grade school teacher. Nine suspects are still on the loose.

The DEA says the drugs came from Piedras Negras, Mexico, then moved right across the border to Eagle Pass and then brought to San Antonio and Houston.

More than 200 kilos of cocaine were seized over the past year and a half, but more importantly is the fact that the organization is out of commission.

"I'm sure that they will feel it, because we seized $4.5 million in cash. Anytime you deprive them of their revenue, they feel it", said DEA Agent Joe Arabit.

Agents say the ring was working for the Arturo Beltran drug cartel in Mexico, and has been in operation since at least 2003. Investigators say the group moved between 200 to 400 kilos of cocaine a month from across the border into Texas, and then north as far as Cleveland, Ohio.

The DEA busted Jorge Uresti at his San Antonio home on the northwest side Tuesday. Investigators say he ran operations for the cartel out of that house. Neighbors who lived near Uresti say the bust wasn't a big shock.

DOJ_NMG_0106286

Nine suspects are still at large, including Manuel and Rene Zertuche, who are believed to have run the ring's operations out of Houston. Investigators are asking anybody with information to call the DEA's office.

Ten Houses Seized In Massive Drug Sweep (UL)

The Union Leader, December 14, 2006

CONCORD – Six people have been arrested and ten “mini-mansions” seized in southern New Hampshire after a joint state-federal drug investigation.

An estimated 6,000 marijuana plants were confiscated with a possible value of $24 million.

The operation was conducted by New Hampshire State Police, the federal Drug Enforcement Administration and the United States Attorney.

Law enforcement authorities say that they may not have identified all the properties involved in this massive drug ring. They are asking people across the state to pay close attention to their neighbors – or nearby empty homes.

Police said recent raids in Hooksett and Epsom (see links below) were linked to this statewide enforcement effort.

Ten homes were seized by authorities as part of this drug sweep.

6,000 Pot Plants Seized At 10 Homes (UL)

Union Leader, December 14, 2006

Concord – Using upscale, mostly suburban "McMansions" as a front, a drug ring converted the pricey properties into marijuana labs where more than 6,000 plants, worth about $24 million on the street, were seized by police in coordinated raids yesterday.

Ten houses, from Derry to Andover -- most costing between $300,000 and $400,000 each -- were confiscated and six people were taken into custody during "Operation Green Thumb," the name given the multi-agency probe launched after investigators stumbled upon two similar pot-growing operations in Hooksett and Epsom this fall.

State Attorney General Kelly A. Ayotte said the joint federal, state and local law enforcement effort disrupted "what has to be the largest seizure of marijuana in this state's history."

"It will have a significant impact on the illegal drug trade not only in this state ... but certainly throughout New England," she added.

New Hampshire State Police officials said the investigation continues and acknowledged more houses may be operating undetected. They urged the public to be aware of homes where buyers never moved in or suspicious activity occurs at night. They also set up a toll-free tip line, 1-800-NAB-DOPE (1-800-622-3673).

State Police Col. Frederick H. Booth said investigators were surprised by the sophisticated nature of the operation and the residential homes used to grow the plants from seedlings to harvest.

"It's not the type of houses you would typically look at and say 'That's a drug house,'" he said of the fairly new homes on suburban lots with sweeping lawns and stands of trees.

Armed with federal search warrants, nearly 200 law enforcement officers carried out simultaneous raids at homes in Concord, Derry, Pembroke, Andover, Chester, Weare, Hopkinton, Londonderry and Canterbury, starting about 9 a.m. yesterday, said State Police Maj. David Kelley.

Six individuals were taken into custody and are expected to be arraigned in U.S. District Court in Concord today, said Thomas P. Colantuono, U.S. Attorney for New Hampshire.

Their names and charges against them were not available yesterday, Colantuono said, noting investigators still were collecting evidence and preparing complaints during yesterday's mid-afternoon press conference.

While people lived in some of the houses, most were unoccupied, police said. Those arrested are "not necessarily the (home) owners," Kelley said.

The alleged drug growers bypassed electric meters and apparently used electricians to install their own meters capable of supporting the extensive lighting and ventilation systems needed to grow the plants, which ranged from several hundred to 1,500 in a single home.

"This outrageous behavior not only was criminal, it was calculated and sneaky and without regard to anyone's safety," said June Stansbury, special agent-in-charge of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency's New England Division.

Both underground and above-ground methods of bypassing electric meters were used, posing a public safety hazard, particularly with live electricity coursing through damp ground surrounding the homes, investigators said.

Large supplies of fertilizer, chemicals and other growing materials increased the danger, they said.

Police first discovered the pot-growing operation when an underground electrical bypass used in a Hooksett home caught fire Oct. 14.

Firefighters found about 700 plants in a basement greenhouse. About two weeks later, a blown transformer supplying power to an Epsom home led authorities to nearly 1,400 infant marijuana plants.

Since then, the State Police Narcotics and Investigations Unit, DEA, state Attorney General's Drug Task Force and numerous local police agencies began investigating indoor marijuana-growing operations across the state and identified the 10 houses raided yesterday, Kelley said.

Investigators have heard similar pot-growing operations are "rampant" in Canada, Colantuono said.

"We are going to very aggressively target this and stop this from gaining a foothold here in New Hampshire," he added.

Booth said the alleged drug-growing ring is a "wake-up call" not only to law enforcement, but also the banking industry and Realtors who deal with home sales and the nurseries that sell fertilizers and other materials needed to grow plants on such a massive scale.

Police gave the following addresses and owners of houses seized yesterday:

21 Penacook St., Chester, Hai Bui; 10 Partridge Lane, Chester, Dung Nguyen; 22 O'Neil Drive, Andover, Hong Bach Nguyen; 345 Intervale Road, Canterbury, Thuy Anh Nguyen; 8 Gulf Road, Derry, Hung Tran; 7 Danbury Court, Londonderry, Da Vav Ha; 62 Graham Road, Concord, Michelle Nguyen; 542 Rebecca Way, Pembroke, Cong Nguyen; 1191 Maple St., Hopkinton, Nu Thi Tran; and 1070 River Road, Weare, Robert Nguyen.

Mark J. Furtado, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement's resident agent in charge for New Hampshire, said his agents are investigating where the homeowners came from and how they obtained their equipment.

Colantuono said his office also is exploring whether the 10 houses seized, which have a total purchase price of $3.9 million, are subject to forfeiture under federal drug laws.

Pot Bust Nabs Six, 6,000 Plants Seized (AP)

AP, December 14, 2006

CONCORD, N.H. - A multi-agency investigation of marijuana growing operations resulted in six arrests Wednesday and the seizure of 10 homes, at least 6,000 marijuana plants and growing materials.

For the past two months, the New Hampshire State Police Narcotics and Investigations Unit, assisted by the United States Drug Enforcement Agency, the New Hampshire Attorney General's Drug Task Force, the U.S. Attorney's office in New Hampshire and numerous local police agencies have been investigating residential marijuana growing operations throughout the state.

As a result of recent marijuana seizures in Hooksett and Epsom, investigators developed information that led to the identification of 10 other residences in Concord, Derry, Pembroke, Andover, Chester, Weare, Hopkinton, Londonderry, and Canterbury that were suspected of housing large-scale marijuana grow operations.

The house-based operations also involve the theft of large amounts electricity "by bypassing the electric meter at the residences, utilizing both underground and above-ground methods," police said in a news release. In Hooksett, the underground electrical bypass caused the residence to catch fire and the rerouting of power caused pole transformers to explode, police said.

(CBS4) NEW HAMPSHIRE A multi-agency investigation of marijuana growing operations resulted in six arrests Wednesday and the seizure of 10 homes, at least 6,000 marijuana plants and growing materials worth around $24 million dollars.

For the past two months, the New Hampshire State Police Narcotics and Investigations Unit, assisted by the United States Drug Enforcement Agency, the New Hampshire Attorney General's Drug Task Force, the U.S. Attorney's office in New Hampshire and numerous local police agencies have been investigating residential marijuana growing operations throughout the state.

Police said the 10 homes were purchased with the sole intent of growing marijuana. Outside they look like ordinary suburban southern New Hampshire homes, but inside they're sophisticated drug labs.

As a result of recent marijuana seizures in Hooksett and Epsom, investigators developed information that led to the identification of 10 other residences in Concord, Derry, Pembroke, Andover, Chester, Weare, Hopkinton, Londonderry, and Canterbury that were suspected of housing large-scale marijuana grow operations.

The house-based operations also involve the theft of large amounts electricity "by bypassing the electric meter at the residences, utilizing both underground and above-ground methods," police said in a news release. In Hooksett, the underground electrical bypass caused the residence to catch fire and the rerouting of power caused pole transformers to explode, police said.

Police Chief's Son Sentenced For Drug Conviction (AP)

AP, December 13, 2006

ALBANY, N.Y. -- The son of Miami Police Chief John Timoney was sentenced Wednesday to 18 months in federal prison for trying to buy 400 pounds of marijuana from an undercover agent in 2005.

Sean Timoney pleaded guilty in December 2005 to giving an undercover Drug Enforcement Administration agent a gym bag filled with about $455,000 in cash as partial payment for what he and a partner believed would be the delivery of 400 pounds of marijuana.

Timoney, 26, had faced a maximum of 40 years in prison and a $2 million fine after pleading guilty to conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute marijuana.

After his release from prison, Timoney will be supervised for four years and required to enter a drug treatment program.

Timoney and Jae Seu, 24, of Glenside, Pa., were arrested the night of Nov. 1 in a Spring Valley, N.Y., hotel room. Seu pleaded guilty to the marijuana conspiracy charge in February and was sentenced to 37 months in prison on July 27.

Chief Timoney is one of South Florida's most prominent law enforcement officials. He rose through the ranks of the New York Police Department to become a chief and first deputy commissioner. He later became chief of police in Philadelphia before moving to Miami. He was in court Wednesday, but did not comment.

Isle Teacher Free On Bond In Drug Case (GCDN)

Galveston County Daily News, December 14, 2006

GALVESTON — A Galveston school teacher was freed on bond Wednesday when officials released information about the multimillion-dollar cocaine and money-laundering ring in which she is accused of taking a part.

Galveston Police Department vice/narcotics officer Joey Quiroga pulled Joette Natasha Barnes, 25, out of class last week and arrested her. U.S. marshals then took her to San Antonio.

There, she faces federal charges of conspiracy to possess more than 5 kilograms of cocaine with intent to deliver; aiding and abetting the possession of cocaine with intent to deliver; and conspiracy to commit money laundering.

The federal indictment under which Barnes was arrested had been sealed. Federal officials unsealed the indictment Wednesday morning.

Barnes, who lived in San Antonio from 2000 to 2004, is one of 38 people charged in what the federal agents called a drug ring.

The alleged operation brought cocaine from Mexico into Texas, where it reportedly was distributed at various spots throughout the state and part of Ohio.

“Of course, a big part of these operations is getting the cash back across the border,” said Johnny Sutton, U.S. attorney for the Western District of Texas.

Barnes’ charges pertain to allegations she was holding money that came from cocaine sales.

DOJ_NMG_0106289

"We believe she was a facilitator," said Joe Arabit, assistant special agent in charge for the Drug Enforcement Administration's San Antonio office. "Not to minimize it, but that was the role of several people in this operation — to hold drug proceeds for other defendants."

Agents have arrested 29 of the 38 suspects in the case, and Arabit said more arrests were likely. Agents also seized $4.5 million and 214 kilograms of cocaine. They allege $39,000 came from Barnes' League City apartment,

The cocaine carries a wholesale value of nearly $4 million, Arabit said.

Area narcotics investigators said that much cocaine could retail for $10 million to $20 million, depending on how it was processed and how much was "cut," or diluted with other substances.

Sutton said investigators were surprised by the ages of the people suspected in the cocaine ring. At 25, Barnes is one of the youngest defendants in the group.

"A lot of times, the people running these are younger, in their 20s, but we had a lot of middle-aged people and even some in their 50s and 60s," the prosecutor said.

The oldest of the group was Josefina Campos, 82, arrested Nov. 28 on the Texas-Mexico border by officials who allege they found a package containing a kilogram of cocaine concealed in her underwear.

Arabit and Sutton both called the law-enforcement operation that led to the arrests "a major success." It started in May 2005 and involved DEA agents, as well as DEA and High Intensity Drug Trafficking Area task-force members, who come from nearly 20 different law-enforcement agencies, in all.

While Barnes was free, she was not back in the classroom. Galveston Independent School District Superintendent Lynne Cleveland told The Daily News last week that Barnes would likely be terminated, due to the severity of the charges.

Her arrest interrupted Barnes' third year of teaching fourth-grade special education at Scott Elementary School.

Alleged Drug Ring Busted In Texas (WT?UPI)

The Washington Times/UPI, December 13, 2006

Law-enforcement authorities have broken up a Texas-based ring that allegedly smuggled 400-pound quantities of cocaine into Ohio and Tennessee from Mexico.

A federal indictment unsealed Wednesday charges 38 people -- including a Galveston, Texas, school teacher -- with drug-trafficking conspiracy and money-laundering conspiracy, the Express-News of San Antonio reported.

Most of the 38 were arrested in the past two weeks, and some have already been released on bond, court records show.

The ring is accused of transporting cocaine to Ohio and Tennessee, among other states, after storing it in San Antonio between Jan. 1, 2004, and Dec. 6 of this year.

The drugs were often smuggled in large boxes of powdered detergent or construction joint compound, affidavits show.

Feds Seize $1 Million In Pickup Truck Stopped In Alabama On I-10 (AP)

AP, December 14, 2006

Federal agents confiscated $1 million in cash concealed in a pickup truck stopped for speeding by Alabama state troopers on Interstate 10, authorities said.

Tom Wade, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's agent in Mobile, said the stacks of $20 bills packed in a concealed compartment were turned over to the U.S. Marshals Service. He said cash can be confiscated if investigators believe it was associated with criminal activity, but that $1 million is a "significant" seizure for such a traffic stop.

The truck driver, whose name was not released, was not charged or taken into custody. A trooper confiscated the cash, handed the driver a printed receipt and called the DEA, troopers said. Wade said Wednesday the DEA is investigating where the driver began his trip and his final destination.

Officials said the driver could claim the cash and try to get it back through the courts, but that is rare in such seizure cases and it will likely be distributed to state and federal agencies. The $1 million seizure was first reported Wednesday by the Press-Register.

DOJ_NMG_0106290

Alabama Department of Public Safety spokeswoman Martha Earnhardt said the driver was alone in a 2006 Ford F-350, registered in Washington state and headed west on I-10 about 3:15 p.m. Sunday, when he was pulled over and issued a warning for speeding.

Working on a "saturation patrol" designed to investigate beyond an initial traffic stop, Earnhardt said the trooper brought out a drug-sniffing dog and a search revealed the hidden cash.

Temple Black of New Orleans, a spokesman for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, said there was a concern that the driver had a false passport, but that turned out not to be the case and he was released.

Wade said authorities usually find no more than $100,000 in similar DEA seizure cases.

Investigators often find that drugs are moved east on I-10 and cash from drug sales is transferred back west along the interstate, Wade said.

"Just the fact of life is that the source of a lot of our drugs is Mexico," Wade said. "Drug dealers want to get their money back to the source.

"Someone coming from Washington state is kind of an anomaly around here. I rarely see license plates from that part of the country."

Lucky Break Leads To Gun Theft Arrest (AJC)

By George Chidi, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

Atlanta Journal-Constitution, December 14, 2006

A lucky traffic stop by a Snellville police officer led to the arrest of two teens accused of stealing dozens of guns from a Lilburn pawn shop, police said Wednesday.

Federal agents and local police arrested two Duluth teenagers late Tuesday night, Lilburn police said in a news release. Dwayne Allen Hickman, 17, and Jimar Shane O'Riley, 17, were charged with one count of armed robbery, with other state charges pending. Police said they could be charged as adults.

In the Dec. 6 armed robbery, the two fled with 53 guns. But more than half of the guns stolen from the Mr. Pawn store in Lilburn remain unaccounted for after the arrests.

Police believe they entered the Mr. Pawn store on Lawrenceville Highway wearing masks with guns drawn and emptied the store's gun cabinet into a bag. Initial reports indicated that 55 guns were stolen, including a pump-action shotgun and an AR-15 assault rifle — the civilian semi-automatic version of a military M-16.

Police said Wednesday that 53 guns had been stolen.

Lilburn Police called in the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms to help investigate, but police caught a quick break in their investigation.

Tuesday afternoon, Snellville Police officer Greg Perry stopped a car near Ga. 124 and Ronald Reagan Parkway for improperly tinted windows, Snellville Police Chief Roy Whitehead said.

"The driver of the vehicle became inordinately nervous," Whitehead said. He had no valid driver's license and was going to jail, Whitehead said.

Perry searched the car and found a gun that had been registered as stolen five days earlier from Mr. Pawn, Whitehead said.

The arrest led police to Hickman and O'Riley.

Snellville police had been concerned when they heard about the pawn shop theft. A group appeared to have been casing the city's sole pawn shop shortly before the Lilburn robbery, Whitehead said.

Whitehead attributed the arrest to diligent police training, but conceded, "When you consider how many cars are driving down the street ... we got lucky."

Police obtained search warrants for an address at the Palisades Club apartment complex near Duluth. Police also set up a false meeting with the two to buy guns, said Lilburn police spokesman, Sgt. Tyler Thomas.

"These weapons were being sold in the $200 to $300 range on the streets," Thomas said.

ATF agents, Gwinnett County's SWAT team, Snellville and Lilburn police officers met the two. The initial investigation points to a possible gang connection in this case, Thomas said.

DOJ_NMG_0106291

The teens had 20 of the stolen weapons and a stolen vehicle, Thomas said. Two more guns were found at the apartment and a third was found in a different vehicle.

But that leaves 29 weapons unaccounted for, not counting the guns used in the robbery, Thomas said. Police recovered the shotgun, but not the rifle among the stolen weapons, he said.

"Our initial investigation indicates that at least some of those guns may have been sold," he said. "We might be able to track them down. We're pleased that we've been able to take a good chunk of those guns off the street."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Senator Undergoing Brain Surgery, Sources Say (CNN)

CNN, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Sen. Tim Johnson of South Dakota was undergoing brain surgery early Thursday at George Washington University Hospital after suffering stroke-like symptoms, two Democratic sources familiar with his condition told CNN.

Johnson, 59, was taken to the hospital Wednesday morning after he appeared to suffer stroke-like symptoms, although a spokeswoman for the senator said subsequent evaluation showed he did not suffer a stroke or a heart attack.

Staffers told CNN Johnson was conscious when he was transported to the hospital.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nevada, spent time at the hospital out of concern for Johnson, Reid's spokesman said.

Johnson spokeswoman Julianne Fisher said the senator was in the Capitol on Wednesday morning conducting a conference call with South Dakota reporters when "his speech pattern slipped off." (Listen to Johnson's difficulty speaking during a WNAX radio interview -- MP3, 749 kb)

Fisher said the senator was able to walk back to his office in the Hart Senate Office Building, then began having problems with his right arm. He thought he was all right, she said, and went to his desk, but came out a few minutes later and "it was apparent he needed help."

Staffers put him on a couch in the office and called the Capitol doctor, she said. He was taken to the hospital shortly afterward. His wife, in the office to have lunch with him, rode with him, Fisher said.

"It transpired very fast," she said, adding the senator's staff was shaken by the incident.

But, she said of the hospital, "we keep reminding ourselves, this is where they take Dick Cheney."

Should Johnson not be able to complete his term, which ends in 2008, South Dakota Gov. Mike Rounds, a Republican, could appoint his replacement, which could shift the balance of power in the Senate.

South Dakota Secretary of State Chris Nelson said the appointment would fill the vacancy until a general election could be held in November 2008. There are no restrictions on who the governor can appoint, beyond meeting the legal requirements for Senate membership, he said.

Although the issue of incapacitation is not spelled out in state law, Nelson said he believes there would be "precedent at the federal level."

South Dakota has not faced the replacement of an elected office holder "in recent history."

Rounds issued a statement saying his prayers were with Johnson and his family. "We are hopeful of good news for our friend and colleague," the governor said.

Johnson battled prostate cancer in 2004, and after surgery, tests showed he no longer had the disease, according to his Web site.

Democratic Sen. Johnson In Hospital (WP)

By Charles Babington And Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, December 14, 2006

Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) was hospitalized yesterday after falling ill at the Capitol, introducing a note of uncertainty over control of the Senate just weeks before Democrats are to take over with a one-vote margin.

DOJ_NMG_0106292

Johnson, 59, was taken to George Washington University Hospital shortly after noon, where he underwent "a comprehensive evaluation by the stroke team," his office said. Aides later said he had not suffered a stroke or heart attack, but they offered no further comment.

The two-term senator's illness -- which sent Senate Democratic leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) rushing to the hospital to check on Johnson -- underscored the fragility of Democrats' hold on the next Senate, which they won by the narrowest of margins in the Nov. 7 elections. Should Johnson be unable to complete his term, South Dakota's Republican governor, Michael Rounds, would name a replacement for the next two years.

With Johnson in office, Democrats would hold a 51-to-49 edge in the Senate that convenes Jan. 4 as part of the 110th Congress. (The two independents have said they will caucus with the Democrats.) But if he is to leave office before then and Rounds replaces him with a Republican, the GOP would control the chamber.

In a 50-50 Senate, Vice President Cheney could break tie votes in the GOP's favor. But a Senate that becomes evenly split after it is in session would not necessarily fall to Republicans, Senate historians said. Rules and precedents could leave a party in charge of the chamber even after its membership falls below that of the other party.

"It's what happens in January that counts," said Senate associate historian Donald A. Ritchie, referring to when party leaders hash out rules governing the chamber's organization.

Rounds's office declined to comment on the situation yesterday except for a statement from the governor, which offered prayers for Johnson and hope for "good news for our friend and colleague."

Johnson spokesman Noah Pinegar said the senator "became disoriented" during a late-morning conference call with reporters, placed from the Capitol's Senate recording studio. "He had difficulty completing a response to a question," Pinegar said, so aides ended the call and walked with him back to Hart Senate Office Building.

When they arrived, Pinegar said, Johnson "wasn't himself." A team from the Capitol physician's office quickly arrived and sent the senator to the hospital by ambulance. Johnson's wife, Barbara, was with him at the hospital as tests were being conducted last night, Pinegar said.

Reid spent much of the afternoon and evening with Johnson's family at the hospital, said spokesman Jim Manley. He would not comment on Johnson's condition.

The Sioux Falls Argus Leader's Web site said that Rep. Stephanie Herseth (D-S.D.) asked constituents to pray for Johnson and that she said she thought Johnson had suffered a severe stroke. But that was before Johnson's staff had ruled out a stroke.

The only time that partisan control of the Senate changed in mid-session, historians say, was in 2001. Republicans began the year controlling the 50-50 chamber with Cheney's tie-breaking vote. But Democrats, mindful of the recent sudden death of Sen. Paul Coverdell (R-Ga.), were aware they could be a heartbeat away from the majority.

In order to adopt new rules organizing the Senate, the two parties must reach nearly unanimous agreement. Democrats in 2001 blocked the naming of committee chairmen and members, demanding concessions before agreeing to the rules. Among those concessions: Should the numerical advantage change, all committee assignments and chairmanships would be nullified, and new organization would have to be submitted.

That's what happened, not because of a death but because disgruntled moderate Republican Sen. James M. Jeffords (Vt.) decided to caucus with the Democrats, giving them a 51-49 edge and the powers of the majority. Senate Republican sources said yesterday that their party is likely to press for similar concessions when negotiating the operating rules for the next Congress. But even if Johnson were incapacitated, Democratic aides say, they would resist.

A different scenario unfolded in 1954, after the deaths and replacements of several senators over two years. Republicans remained the majority party even though Democrats eventually outnumbered them, 48 to 47, with one independent. Democratic leader Lyndon B. Johnson did not challenge the GOP's control, in part, historians said, because the independent, Wayne L. Morse of Oregon, warned that he would caucus with the Republicans if need be. That would have led to a 48-48 chamber, and Vice President Richard M. Nixon would have broken the tie in Republicans' favor.

Tim Johnson has a quiet demeanor and low profile in Washington, but he won two impressive Senate victories. As a House member in 1996, he ousted GOP Sen. Larry Pressler, then chairman of the Commerce Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0106293

Six years later, Johnson managed a 524-vote win over Republican challenger John Thune. Thune returned two years later to defeat Thomas A. Daschle, the Senate Democratic leader, in a costly, closely watched election.

Thune had attacked Johnson for voting against the Persian Gulf War resolution in January 1991. When Congress in 2002 debated authorizing Bush to invade Iraq, Johnson announced he would vote aye.

In a floor speech, he said: "There is a strong possibility that I may be voting to send my own son into combat, and that gives me special empathy for the families of other American service men and women whose own sons and daughters may also be sent to Iraq. Nevertheless, I am willing to cast this vote -- one of the most important in my career both as a senator and certainly as a father -- because I recognize the threat that Saddam Hussein represents to world peace."

The senator's son, Staff Sgt. Brooks Johnson, was stationed in Afghanistan and Iraq before becoming an Army recruiter in Illinois.

Given Johnson's narrow reelection win over Thune, and South Dakota's GOP tilt -- Bush carried the state by 22 percentage points in 2004 -- Republicans consider Johnson one of their top targets in the 2008 Senate elections.

The leading candidate to oppose him is Rounds, who was reelected to a second term last month. Johnson had previously committed to seeking a third term. Should he not run, Democrats probably would turn first to Herseth, who easily won reelection last month.

Staff writers Lindsey Layton and Allan Lengel, political researcher Zachary A. Goldfarb, staff researcher Madonna Lebling and washingtonpost.com staff writer Chris Cillizza contributed to this report.

Sen. Johnson Falls Ill, Is Hospitalized (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, December 14, 2006

Sen. Tim Johnson, South Dakota Democrat, was taken to George Washington University Hospital yesterday for an undisclosed condition, just a few weeks before his party was scheduled to take control of the upper chamber of Congress.

Spokeswoman Julianne Fisher said her boss was hospitalized with an undiagnosed condition but added that Mr. Johnson did not suffer a stroke or heart attack. She said Mr. Johnson was undergoing more tests at George Washington last night and that no official comment on his condition would be released until today.

A statement issued by his office earlier in the afternoon said the 59-year-old senator was "suffering from a possible stroke" and was "undergoing a comprehensive evaluation by the stroke team."

During a phone call with reporters yesterday, Mr. Johnson became disoriented, stuttering in response to a question. He appeared to recover, asking whether there were any additional questions and then signing off.

According to his office, the Capitol physician examined the senator and advised that he be sent to a hospital.

"Senator Johnson is a dear friend to me and to all of us here in the Senate," said incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat. "Every member of the United States Senate sends our best to him and to his family at this difficult time, and we wish him a full recovery."

Miss Fisher said Mr. Reid was at George Washington to check on Mr. Johnson.

The White House also wished Mr. Johnson a speedy recovery.

"Our thoughts and prayers are with Senator Johnson and his family," spokesman Alex Conant said.

The hospitalization touched off speculation about control of the upper chamber of Congress. If for any reason Mr. Johnson is unable to continue serving, South Dakota Gov. Michael Rounds, a Republican, would appoint a replacement to fill out the term until the 2008 election. A Republican appointee would give the party majority status in the Senate.

Last month, Democrats won control of the chamber but only narrowly after Sen. George Allen, Virginia Republican, conceded to his Democratic opponent, James H. Webb Jr. Before his concession, it appeared that Republicans might hold on their majority with a 50-50 tie with Vice President Dick Cheney casting tie-breaking votes. With the Allen loss, Democrats were given a 51-49 majority, with two members of their caucus being independents.

South Dakota Secretary of State Chris Nelson said yesterday that no special restrictions on such an appointment are in place and that a replacement does not have to be from the same political party.

Mr. Johnson, who won re-election in 2002 by 524 votes, is a conservative Democrat and is wary that Senate Democrats are considerably more liberal than his home-state voters. Sen. John Thune, who lost that 2002 race to Mr. Johnson, in 2004 beat incumbent Democratic leader Tom Daschle.

Democratic Sen. Johnson Undergoes Surgery (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) was undergoing surgery early today after becoming ill Wednesday at the Capitol, raising concern among Democrats about their slim new majority in the Senate.

Johnson, a centrist elected to the Senate 10 years ago, became disoriented during a midday conference call with reporters. He was taken to George Washington University Hospital, where he was evaluated for a "possible stroke," a statement from his office said.

The hospital would provide no details on his condition or the reason for the surgery.

A spokeswoman for the senator said Wednesday afternoon that doctors had found no evidence that Johnson, who turns 60 in two weeks, had suffered either a stroke or a heart attack.

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada issued a statement wishing Johnson "a full recovery."

If Johnson is not able to serve when Congress convenes in January, the Senate — which Democrats narrowly captured in November's election, 51 to 49 — could revert to GOP control.

Under South Dakota law, Gov. Michael Rounds, a Republican, would appoint a replacement, presumably from his own party — giving each party 50 seats. Because an evenly divided Senate would give the tiebreaking vote to Vice President Dick Cheney, Republicans would control the chamber.

Johnson's term is up in 2008.

Sen. Johnson Undergoing Evaluation For Possible Stroke (CQ)

By Martin Kady II

Congressional Quarterly, December 14, 2006

Sen. Tim Johnson suffered a possible stroke early Wednesday and was taken to George Washington University Hospital Center. The severity of his condition was unclear, but his office released a statement confirming that he was “undergoing a comprehensive evaluation” by a stroke team.

An aide said Johnson, D-S.D., who will turn 60 in two weeks, is in “good hands.” But the aide said no other information would be released until a full determination of his condition can be made.

If the stroke is serious and Johnson is incapacitated, an interim replacement would have to appointed by South Dakota Republican Gov. Mike Rounds until a special election could be held to elect a permanent replacement.

Rounds’ decision could effectively shift control of the Senate in the 110th Congress from the Democrats to a 50-50 balance between the parties if he were to appoint a Republican in place of Johnson, who chairs the Senate Ethics Committee. A 50-50 split would effectively give control of the chamber to Republicans, since Vice President Dick Cheney would be in a position to cast tie-breaking votes.

Johnson is a cancer survivor, having undergone successful surgery for prostate cancer in 2004.

Aides to incoming Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., declined to comment on Johnson’s condition, saying they wanted to avoid “speculation” about his condition.

“We are being cautious,” said Reid spokesman Jim Manley.

Johnson Hospitalized; Condition Unclear (AL)

Argus Leader.com, December 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0106295

Sen. Tim Johnson, South Dakota's senior lawmaker and influential member of the U.S. Senate, remained hospitalized early today after suffering stroke-like symptoms, a sudden illness that could potentially change the balance of power in Washington.

Johnson, 59, was rushed to George Washington University Hospital Wednesday after he became disoriented during a late-morning conference call with reporters.

He stuttered in response to a question, appeared to recover, but then complained of not feeling well after walking back to his office.

A Capitol physician examined Johnson and sent him to the hospital, spokeswoman Julianne Fisher said.

Word of Johnson's problems spread fast across South Dakota.

"It's terrible," said Bill Delaney of Sioux Falls, after hearing the news. "I wish his family well. It's hard times for them."

Fisher said Wednesday evening that Johnson had not experienced a stroke or heart attack. But a team of stroke specialists evaluated him and doctors continued tests late in the day, said Admiral John Eisold, attending physician of the United States Capitol.

As of late Wednesday, doctors had not released an official diagnosis.

A Capitol Police black Suburban pulled up in the driveway to the emergency room during the afternoon. Several television cameras were also set up outside the hospital's Ronald Reagan Institute of Emergency Medicine.

In Sioux Falls, Rep. Stephanie Herseth announced at an afternoon meeting that Sen. Johnson had been taken to a hospital.

In a shaking voice, she called on South Dakotans for their prayers. At the time, Herseth said she believed the senator had suffered a severe stroke.

Sioux Falls Mayor Dave Munson, who was at the Sioux Falls water meeting, said "I'm really saddened by this. Our prayers go out to the senator and his family. This has really taken me by surprise."

Gov. Mike Rounds said "our prayers are with Tim, Barbara and their family."

"We are hopeful of good news for our friend and colleague," Rounds said.

Sen. John Thune and his wife Kimberley said: "Our prayers are with Senator Johnson and his family during this difficult time. We encourage all South Dakotans to keep him and his family in their thoughts and prayers."

The White House also issued a statement wishing him a speedy recovery.

"Our thoughts and prayers are with Senator Johnson and his family," said White House spokesman Alex Conant.

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada was by Johnson's side at the hospital, a visible sign of Johnson's stature at a time when Democrats hold a razor-thin margin.

After the Nov. 7 election, Democrats earned a 51-to-49 edge in the Senate, which convenes Jan. 4.

But if Johnson's illness proves severe enough that he must leave office, Rounds would appoint a replacement, and if he named a Republican, it would leave a 50-50 tie. Republican Vice President Dick Cheney would cast the tie-breaking votes, shifting power in the Senate back to the GOP.

Rounds did not comment on the matter, but he does have a history to suggest he might make such a move. In 2002, after Democratic state Sen. Dick Hagen of Pine Ridge died, Rounds appointed a Republican to replace him.

Johnson's wife Barbara was with her husband all afternoon, Fisher said. She had been at the Capitol to attend a luncheon with him and was there when he became ill. The couple's sons were flying into Washington, Fisher said.

Back in Sioux Falls, some residents expressed disbelief. All hoped for the best.

"I think he provides a moderate balance politically to the state," said Mike Crane of Sioux Falls. "I think he has the best interest of the citizenry at heart."

Johnson Illness Imperils Democrats' Senate Control (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck And Jeanne Cummings

DOJ_NMG_0106296

The Wall Street Journal, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The sudden illness that sent Democratic Sen. Tim Johnson to the hospital also stunned the Capitol as it underscored his party's tenuous hold on control of the Senate in the new Congress.

The South Dakota lawmaker was admitted to George Washington University Hospital after becoming disoriented yesterday, just weeks before Democrats are to take control of the Senate by a two-vote margin following the midterm elections.

If Mr. Johnson is unable to continue to serve, South Dakota Republican Gov. Mike Rounds would be able to appoint his successor until 2009 and put the Senate in a 50-50 tie. That would allow Vice President Dick Cheney to break ties on behalf of Republicans, helping give committee chairmanships to Republicans and boost President Bush's policies at least in the Senate. Democrats will control the House by a 31-vote margin.

As Mr. Johnson's family gathered at the hospital last night, his office wasn't making public details of his condition. In late afternoon, a brief statement said he had suffered a "possible stroke" and was being evaluated by a stroke team.

Later, a spokeswoman for Mr. Johnson said he hadn't suffered a stroke or a heart attack. "He continues to undergo testing and procedures" at the hospital, the spokeswoman said in an email. "We expect to have more information in the morning."

Mr. Johnson, 59 years old, became disoriented during a conference call with reporters at about 11:45 a.m. and stuttered while answering a question. After the call, he walked to the subway in the basement of the Capitol, rode to the Hart Senate Office Building and went to his office, a spokesman said.

There, Mr. Johnson soon collapsed and aides called the Capitol physician, who examined him and told him to go to the hospital. "I think we caught it early," the spokesman said.

A former House member, Mr. Johnson hails from the party's moderate wing and operated for years in the shadow of fellow Democrat and former Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle. Mr. Johnson was one of a handful of Democrats to back President Bush's tax cuts in 2001, and to vote to confirm Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito in 2006. He won his Senate seat in 1996 and was re-elected by just 524 votes in 2002.

Mr. Johnson won over Republican ranchers in his state by standing up to the meat-packing industry. He was treated for prostate cancer in 2004, and was later declared cancer-free.

Only once in Senate history has partisan control of the chamber flipped between elections. That was in 2001, when James Jeffords, a Vermont Republican, changed to an independent and caucused with Democrats. That gave Democrats a slim majority until they lost it in the 2002 election.

Johnson's Hospitalization Might Put Senate Divide In Play (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, December 14, 2006

Democratic Sen. Tim Johnson of South Dakota was hospitalized Wednesday with an undisclosed ailment that could affect which party controls the Senate next year.

Johnson, 59, was taken to the George Washington University Hospital at the recommendation of the Capitol physician after he had difficulty talking during a call with reporters and complained of not feeling well.

Julianne Fisher, a Johnson spokeswoman, said the senator "is still undergoing testing and procedures."

A shaken Rep. Stephanie Herseth, D-S.D., told a group in Sioux Falls that she believed her colleague suffered a severe stroke, the Argus Leader in Sioux Falls, S.D. reported.

Johnson's illness has national ramifications because of the narrow political divide in the Senate that convenes Jan. 4. The November election gave Democrats a 51-49 edge. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut and Bernie Sanders of Vermont were elected as independents but have said they will vote with Democrats.

If Johnson were unable to complete the remaining two years of his term, South Dakota Gov. Mike Rounds, a Republican, could appoint a replacement, presumably another Republican. That would deadlock the Senate at 50-50 with Vice President Cheney, a Republican, holding the tie-breaking vote.

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., was at the hospital with Johnson on Wednesday evening, Reid spokesman Jim Manley said. In a statement, Reid wished his "dear friend" a "full recovery."

DOJ_NMG_0106297

Political scientist David Brady of Stanford University's Hoover Institution said history is filled with examples of lawmakers remaining in office no matter how severe their disabilities.

Brady recalled Sen. Clair Engle of California, unable to speak because of a brain tumor, casting an "aye" vote for the 1964 Civil Rights Act by pointing to his eye. More recently, 100-year-old Strom Thurmond completed his last term as a South Carolina senator while living at Walter Reed Army Hospital.

There is no legal provision for declaring a member of Congress too infirm to serve, Brady said.

"The Constitution also does not provide an effective way for filling temporary vacancies that occur when members are incapacitated," said a May 2003 report by a government panel convened to determine how Congress would continue in the wake of a terrorist attack.

Johnson, who survived a bout of prostate cancer, won a second term in the Senate in 2002 over Republican John Thune by 524 votes. Two years later, Thune became Johnson's junior colleague by beating then-Senate Democratic leader Tom Daschle.

Thune issued a statement saying his prayers are with Johnson and his family.

Democratic Senator Suffers Stroke (FT)

By Edward Luce In Washington

Financial Times, December 14, 2006

The Democratic party's newly won majority in the Senate looked to be potentially vulnerable on Wednesday night following the admission into hospital of Tim Johnson, the Democratic Senator for South Dakota, after suffering a "possible stroke".

As the FT went to press, Mr Johnson, who is 59, was undergoing a "comprehensive evaluation by the stroke team" at the George Washington University Hospital in the capital, said his office in a statement. They added that it was not life-threatening. But it was too early to tell the extent of Mr Johnson's impairment.

Under the US constitution, the governor of the senator's state appoints a replacement if the incumbent is incapacitated or dies. Mike Rounds, the governor of South Dakota, who is a Republican would be likely to appoint a Republican were Mr Johnson's stroke to prove serious or fatal, who would hold the post until the next election in November 2008.

This would undo the 51-49 majority that the Democrats won last month after George Allen, the Republican senator for Virginia, conceded defeat to Jim Webb in the state's razor tight election. Since the Senate would then be split evenly at 50-50, Dick Cheney, the vice-president would cast the deciding vote for the Republicans.

The last time the Senate changed hands under unusual circumstances was in 2001 when Jim Jeffords, the liberal Republican senator for Vermont, switched his support to the Democratic Party thus depriving the Republicans of their 51-49 majority. It was reversed the following year in the 2002 mid-term congressional elections, when Republicans regained control.

On Wednesday night Harry Reid, who is set to become the Senate Democratic majority leader in January, and who suffered a mild stroke last year, said: "Every member of the United States Senate sends our best to him and to his family at this difficult time, and we wish him a full recovery."

Any loss of Democratic control of the Senate would be less serious to the opposition party's agenda than loss of control of the House of Representatives, which operates under stricter conditions of party discipline and where the Democrats last month won a comfortable majority.

Political analysts say the real majority number in the Senate is now sixty since that is the minimum vote required to impose cloture on a filibustered debate and move to a vote. The Democrats in both houses have promised to usher in an era of greater bipartisan cooperation after several years of bitter partisanship.

Sen. Johnson Suffers Possible Stroke (AP)

By Mary Clare Jalonick

AP, December 14, 2006

Democratic Sen. Tim Johnson of South Dakota suffered a possible stroke Wednesday and was taken to a Washington hospital, weeks before his party was to take control of the Senate by a one-vote margin.

DOJ_NMG_0106298

Democrats won a 51-49 majority in the November election. South Dakota's governor, who would appoint any temporary replacement, is a Republican.

Johnson, who will 60 on Dec. 28, became disoriented during a conference call with reporters at midday Wednesday, stuttering in response to a question. He appeared to recover and asked if there were any additional questions, then ended the call.

Spokeswoman Julianne Fisher said he walked back to his Capitol office after the call but appeared to not be feeling well. The Capitol physician came to his office and examined him, and it was decided he should go to the hospital.

He was taken by ambulance to George Washington University Hospital around noon, Fisher said.

"It was caught very early," she said.

Johnson's office released a statement saying he had suffered a possible stroke.

"At this stage, he is undergoing a comprehensive evaluation by the stroke team," the statement read.

The White House issued a statement wishing him a speedy recovery.

"Our thoughts and prayers are with Senator Johnson and his family," said spokesman Alex Conant.

If the two-term senator must be replaced, South Dakota Gov. Mike Rounds would make the appointment. If the Senate is split 50-50, the vice president breaks ties. That is Republican Dick Cheney at present.

Johnson is up for re-election in 2008.

South Dakota Secretary of State Chris Nelson said there are no special restrictions on such an appointment by the governor and a replacement would not have to be from the same political party.

Johnson, a centrist Democrat, was first elected to the Senate in 1996 and has been one of the more reserved members of the chamber, rarely taking center stage at news conferences.

He served in the House for 10 years from 1987 to 1997. His focus has been on committee assignments important to his state's interests — Indian Affairs and Energy and Natural Resources — as well as a spot on Appropriations. The latter allows him to direct funds to South Dakota.

Johnson narrowly defeated Republican John Thune in his 2002 re-election bid. Thune defeated Democratic Sen. Tom Daschle two years later.

Thune issued a statement saying his prayers were with Johnson and his family. Rounds also issued a statement, saying he was hoping for good news.

Johnson has worked as a lawyer and county prosecutor and served several years in the 1970s and 1980s in the South Dakota state Legislature.

Both Johnson and his wife have battled cancer.

The senator underwent prostate cancer treatment in 2004, and subsequent tests have shown him to be clear of the disease. Barb Johnson is a breast cancer survivor.

The couple have two sons and a daughter: Brooks, who served in the U.S. Army in Bosnia, Kosovo, South Korea, Afghanistan and Iraq; Brendan, a Sioux Falls lawyer, and Kelsey, who works in Washington.

In response to one reporter's question on the Wednesday conference call, Johnson said he was most looking forward to spending the holidays with his family and grandchildren.

Johnson is the second senator to become ill after the Nov. 7 election. Wyoming Sen. Craig Thomas, a Republican, was diagnosed with leukemia on Election Day. He is back at work.

Senator Is Hospitalized, Prompting Talk Of Stroke (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 13 — Senator Tim Johnson, a Democrat from South Dakota, was hospitalized on Wednesday after what his office at first called a “possible stroke,” leading to concern among Democrats that their new one-vote majority in the Senate could be in danger.

DOJ_NMG_0106299

By the end of the day, after what his office called "a comprehensive evaluation by the stroke team" at George Washington University Hospital here, a spokeswoman for Mr. Johnson said he had not suffered a stroke or a heart attack. The spokeswoman, Julianne Fisher, gave no further details about Mr. Johnson's condition.

His office said Mr. Johnson, who will turn 60 on Dec. 28, became disoriented during a conference call with reporters. He stuttered, then seemed to recover before asking if there were more questions and ending the call.

He walked back to his office, where he was examined by the Capitol physician, who decided Mr. Johnson should go to the hospital. He was taken to the hospital by ambulance around noon.

On Capitol Hill, the news highlighted the fragility of the Democrats' new majority in the Senate. If Mr. Johnson's health problems prevent him from serving, his replacement would be named by Gov. Mike Rounds of South Dakota, a Republican. Assuming that Mr. Rounds named a Republican, the 51-49 Democratic majority in the new Senate would become a 50-50 split. Vice President Dick Cheney would break the tie, effectively giving Republicans control of the chamber.

Senator Harry Reid, the Democratic leader, rushed to the hospital Wednesday afternoon, his spokesman said, but it was not clear whether Mr. Reid had been able to visit Mr. Johnson. Mr. Reid's office issued a statement calling Mr. Johnson "a dear friend to me and to all of us here in the Senate" and saying, "Every member of the United States Senate sends our best to him and to his family at this difficult time, and we wish him a full recovery."

In Pierre, South Dakota's capital, Mr. Rounds issued a statement, saying: "Our prayers are with Tim, Barbara and their family. We are hopeful of good news for our friend and colleague."

Prostate cancer was diagnosed in Mr. Johnson in 2004, but his official Web site says that "all tests now show him clear of the disease."

An unassuming fourth-generation South Dakotan, Mr. Johnson was first elected to the Senate in 1996, after serving 10 years in the House, where he had replaced Tom Daschle, a fellow Democrat who ran for the Senate and ultimately became the majority leader.

Mr. Johnson faced a tough race in 2002 against John Thune, a Republican. With the state suffering billions of dollars in losses from a severe drought, Mr. Johnson and Mr. Daschle promised $5 billion in drought relief, and Mr. Johnson won narrowly after President Bush visited the state for Mr. Thune and declined to announce that he would support that relief. (Mr. Thune went on to beat Mr. Daschle in 2004.)

Mr. Johnson is up for re-election in 2008. His oldest son, Brooks, served in Afghanistan and is serving in Iraq.

He is the second senator known to become ill since the November elections. Senator Craig Thomas of Wyoming, a Republican, is being treated for leukemia, but has been at work.

According to information from the Senate historian cited on CQ.com, at least nine senators have taken extended absences from the Senate for health reasons since 1942. Robert F. Wagner, Democrat of New York, was unable to attend any sessions of the 80th or 81st Congress from 1947 to 1949 because of a heart ailment. Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., Democrat of Delaware, missed about seven months in 1988 after surgery for a brain aneurysm. And David Pryor, Democrat of Arkansas, suffered a heart attack in April 1991 and returned to the Senate in September that year.

S.D. Senator's Illness Sets Off Speculation On Capitol Hill (CHIT)

By Christi Parsons

Chicago Tribune, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Sen. Tim Johnson was taken by ambulance to a local hospital Wednesday after becoming disoriented during a news conference, his staff said.

He underwent surgery several hours later, The Associated Press reported. There was no word on the nature of his surgery, which lasted past midnight, or on his condition.

The 59-year-old Johnson (D-S.D.) was doing a telephone conference with reporters around midday when he began to stammer. He recovered, ended the news conference and walked back to his Senate office, where the Capitol physician examined him, his staff said.

DOJ_NMG_0106300

He was taken to George Washington University Hospital about noon and was examined late in the afternoon by what aides called a "stroke team." But in the evening, the senator's spokeswoman said Johnson, in his second term, had not suffered a stroke or heart attack.

The first reports of Johnson's possible stroke, and the possible vacancy his illness could create, sent attorneys all over Capitol Hill to their law books to figure out what rules for filling the seat would apply. A vacancy could affect the expected change of control of the Senate to Democratic leadership in January.

South Dakota law dictates that the governor—Republican Mike Rounds—would appoint a replacement if either of the state's senators left office, and the governor would not have to appoint a Democrat if Johnson could not serve. The appointed senator would serve until the 2008 election.

Rounds said in a statement, "We are hopeful of good news for our friend and colleague."

The White House issued a statement wishing Johnson a speedy recovery.

Democrats and their independent ally are set to hold the slimmest of majorities, 51-49, in the new Senate. Vice President Dick Cheney would have the tie-breaking vote in the event the Senate were split evenly.

Many members of Congress have stayed in office in spite of fragile health, including the late Sen. Strom Thurmond, a South Carolina Republican who held office beyond his 100th birthday. Rep. Lane Evans (D-Ill.) has suffered from Parkinson's disease for years and went for several months this year without casting a vote. He is set to retire when the new Congress is sworn in.

Government Seeks New Ruling In Cheney Case (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press

AP, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration asked an appeals court Wednesday to overrule a federal judge and allow the White House to keep secret any records of visitors to Vice President Cheney's residence and office.

To make the visitor records public would be an "unprecedented intrusion into the daily operations of the vice presidency," the Justice Department argued in a 57-page brief to the U.S. Court of Appeals in the District of Columbia.

The government was responding to an October order, by U.S. District Judge Ricardo M. Urbina, to release two years of White House visitor logs to The Washington Post. The newspaper, researching the access lobbyists and others had on the White House, sought Secret Service records for anyone visiting Cheney, his legal counsel, chief spokesman and other top aides and advisers.

In his ruling, Urbina questioned the government's primary argument against releasing the records — that the logs are protected by Cheney's right to executive privilege.

The government's response Wednesday was twofold, focusing largely on the ownership of the records.

Attorneys for the Justice Department called Urbina's decision "flatly inconsistent" with his ruling's acknowledgment that the Secret Service had only limited and temporary control over the visitor logs. Since the records are ultimately controlled by the vice president's office, the Secret Service is not authorized to release them, the government said.

Moreover, Congress has excluded presidential and vice presidential records from the public's reach — making the visitor logs untouchable, the government said.

"There is thus no dispute that, for example, appointment calendars maintained by the office of the vice president, revealing the identities of visitors and the time of their visits, would not be subject to disclosure," the Justice Department said in its response.

An attorney for The Washington Post said he had not seen the government's response and declined to comment.

A lawsuit over similar records revealed in September that Republican activists Grover Norquist and Ralph Reed — key figures in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal — landed more than 100 meetings inside the Bush White House.

Bond Will Be Top Republican On Senate Intelligence Committee (MCT)

By Matt Stearns

McClatchy Newspapers, December 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0106301

WASHINGTON - Missouri Sen. Christopher "Kit" Bond will become the top Republican on the Senate Intelligence Committee.

Incoming Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., announced Wednesday evening that Bond, who has served on the intelligence committee since 2003, will be vice chairman. West Virginia Sen. John Rockefeller will become chairman when Democrats take over Congress in January.

Elected in 1986, Bond made his reputation in the Senate as an ardent watchdog for Missouri's interests. But in the last few years he's gained an increasingly high profile on intelligence issues.

Earlier this year, outgoing Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist assigned Bond to lead Senate Republican communications efforts in the war on terror.

As bipartisan comity on the intelligence committee deteriorated over the war in Iraq, Bond frequently became the GOP's sound-bite bad cop, accusing Democrats of excessive partisanship, while outgoing chairman Pat Roberts of Kansas took a more reserved approach.

Despite that partisan edge, Bond pledged bipartisan cooperation no less than three times in a written statement issued late Wednesday.

"I look forward to working with Chairman Rockefeller to advance our national security interests by strengthening the intelligence community," Bond said in the statement.

The selection of Bond as vice chair indicates that Republican leaders want a tough voice to counter Democrats. The intelligence committee must complete three reports on intelligence leading up to the war in Iraq, including a potentially explosive one comparing prewar statements of government officials to the intelligence available at the time.

Bond, 67, also is writing a book, due out next year, on the threat of Islamic terrorism in Indonesia.

He has defended the Bush administration's warrantless surveillance program and was one of only nine senators - including Roberts - to vote against a Senate measure banning the use of torture in interrogations of terrorism suspects and establishing rules for their interrogation.

"We cannot outline in advance what the terrorists are going to be subjected to because that becomes the first chapter in the al-Qaida operations manual," Bond said on "Newshour" on PBS.

Bond also led GOP efforts to discredit Joseph Wilson, a critic of the war in Iraq. Wilson accused the Bush administration of exposing his wife, Valerie Plame, as a CIA officer in retaliation for Wilson's criticism. A lengthy investigation led to the indictment of Scooter Libby, Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff. Libby is awaiting trial.

Bond accused Wilson of "perpetrating a hoax on the American people," saying Wilson overstated his findings on a mission to Africa to figure out whether Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein was trying to obtain weapons of mass destruction.

Bond's son, U.S. Marine Corps Lt. Sam Bond, like his father a Princeton graduate, served as an intelligence officer in Iraq and may be redeployed.

House Chair-To-Be Reyes Fails Pop Quiz

A pop quiz about national and international intelligence was given by a reporter with Congressional Quarterly to Rep. Silvestre Reyes, and that reporter said the soon-to-be chair of the House Intelligence Committee quite simply flunked.

Tuesday KFOX had a chance to catch up with Reyes, and asked him about the pop quiz.

"It's unfortunate that there has been so much attention that has been paid to it," said Reyes, a Democrat representing El Paso.

Reyes said he actually does know the answers to the questions.

"I certainly know Hezbollah because I am one of the few members of Congress that has actually been through a Hezbollah checkpoint, on the road from Damascus to Beirut," said Reyes.

The reporter who quizzed Reyes is concerned with the chairman-to-be.

DOJ_NMG_0106302

"How is the chairman of the House Intelligence Committee going to ask intelligent questions of the CIA and the Pentagon spy agencies if he doesn't know what to ask?"

But local experts have taken to the congressman's defense.

"It would be ridiculous to believe that our Congressman Silvestre Reyes is not qualified for this position," said Dr. John Bretting, an associate professor at UTEP.

Bretting said Reyes is not the only one who has been taken by a reporter's pop quiz, even U.S. presidents have.

"Ketchup is a vegetable, facts are a dumb thing, and trees pollute. These are all things that he said, that are on the public record. Does that mean that President Reagan wasn't playing with a full deck? No shape, manner, or form," said Bretting.

While this quiz may look bad for Reyes, Bretting said that doesn't take away from his abilities.

"In the United States Congress, Congressman Reyes is one of the five or six most knowledgeable congresspersons when it comes to national security," said Bretting.

Pelosi's Intelligence Man (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 14, 2006

As Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi's choice to be the next Chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, Texas Democrat Silvestre Reyes will share responsibility for the budgets and oversight of U.S. spy agencies, as well as receive regular briefings on classified intelligence. But it appears he first needs a remedial course on America's terrorist enemies.

In an interview with Congressional Quarterly, Mr. Reyes was unable to answer basic questions about the sectarian nature of both al Qaeda and Hezbollah. "Predominantly -- probably Shiite," he responded when asked about the strain of Islam that animates al Qaeda. The truth is that al Qaeda is composed of Sunni extremists who slaughter Iraqi Shiites on a daily basis. And when CQ's reporter turned to Hezbollah, Mr. Reyes said, "Why do you ask me these questions at five o'clock?" Perhaps because he's only had 23 years since the Iranian-backed Shiite terror group blew up the Beirut Marine barracks to figure that one out.

It's not as if House Democrats didn't have a qualified candidate for the Intelligence Committee chair. That would be California's Jane Harman, who served with distinction as ranking Member in the current Congress. But Ms. Pelosi thought Ms. Harman was too hawkish and not partisan enough in opposing Bush Administration policy.

So she floated the name of Florida's Alcee Hastings for the chairmanship, though a Democratic Congress had voted to impeach him as a federal judge. When that choice came under post-election criticism, Ms. Pelosi tried to mollify the Black Caucus for dumping Mr. Hastings by picking someone from the Hispanic Caucus, the untutored Mr. Reyes.

So it appears America will fight the next two years of the war on terror with an important Congressional post occupied by a man who has no grasp at all of the dynamics of the conflicts in Iraq, Lebanon and the broader Middle East. This isn't an auspicious start by Democrats who hoped to campaign in 2008 having established some credibility on national security.

Judge Chastises FEMA As Botching Katrina Housing Program (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 13 (AP) — A federal judge on Wednesday called the Bush administration's handling of a Hurricane Katrina housing program "a legal disaster" and ordered officials to explain a computer system that cannot count evacuees with precision or explain why they were denied aid.

The judge, Richard J. Leon of Federal District Court, ruled last month that the Federal Emergency Management Agency had violated evacuees' constitutional rights by eliminating their housing payments without notice. On Wednesday, he admonished the government for not moving fast enough to restart the program for 3,600 to 5,500 storm victims.

"Let me make this clear," Judge Leon told Michael Sitcov, a lawyer for the government. "Tell FEMA that I'm expecting them to get going on this. Like, immediately."

Judge Leon ruled that the agency last spring and summer had mishandled the transition from a short-term housing program to a longer-term program. Instead of explaining why financing was being cut, the agency provided only computer-generated and sometimes conflicting program codes, Judge Leon said.

DOJ_NMG_0106303

He ordered agency officials to explain those decisions so that thousands of evacuees could understand the reasoning and decide whether to appeal.

"I'm not looking for a doctoral dissertation," Judge Leon said. "I'm looking for a couple of paragraphs in plain English."

Mr. Sitcov said that FEMA's computer system could not do what the judge wanted. The eight-year-old system is set up only to produce program codes, he said. Mr. Sitcov also said the program was unable to determine for certain how many evacuees in Texas were covered by Judge Leon's order or how many people had appealed the denial of their aid.

"It's not as adept at doing these kinds of machinations," said Mr. Sitcov, who said the best estimate of evacuees covered by the order was 5,479.

Judge Leon appeared bewildered, and ordered agency officials to testify Monday about the program. He said 10 employees, working overtime and on weekends, could translate program codes into 5,000 understandable letters in two weeks, nearly the amount of time that has passed since his initial ruling.

"This is a legal disaster," Judge Leon said. "People's rights are being denied. I don't want us to get so mired in the minutiae and the law while, in the meantime, people who need help are not getting help."

The agency has appealed Judge Leon's initial order and is hoping a higher court will block its enforcement until the appeal plays out. That ruling will probably not come before next week, and Judge Leon said he wanted the agency to start working on the problem immediately.

"Two weeks have been lost, and I don't want another day to be lost," he said. "We've got to get moving."

Mr. Sitcov said the agency could not comply with the order to restart the housing program because the agreements to reimburse Texas cities for rental payments had expired. Judge Leon said he was sure local governments would be willing to make those same agreements again and said he might order Texas officials to testify Monday.

Judge Leon also scheduled a telephone conference for Friday between FEMA and the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now, which brought the lawsuit on behalf of hurricane victims.

Judge Tells FEMA To 'Get Going' On Aid (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, December 13, 2006

A federal judge yesterday called the Bush administration's handling of a Hurricane Katrina housing program "a legal disaster" and ordered officials to explain a computer system that can neither precisely count evacuees nor provide reasons they were denied aid.

U.S. District Judge Richard J. Leon, who ruled last month that the Federal Emergency Management Agency had violated evacuees' constitutional rights by eliminating their housing payments without sufficient notice, admonished the government for not moving fast enough to restart the program for between 3,600 and 5,500 storm victims.

"Let me make this clear," Leon told government attorney Michael Sitcov. "Tell FEMA that I'm expecting them to get going on this. Like, immediately."

Leon ruled that FEMA mishandled the transition from a short-term housing program to a longer-term program this spring and summer. Instead of explaining why funding was being cut, FEMA provided only computer-generated and sometimes conflicting program codes, Leon said.

The judge ordered FEMA to explain those decisions so thousands of evacuees can understand the reasoning and decide whether to appeal.

"I'm not looking for a doctoral dissertation," Leon said. "I'm looking for a couple of paragraphs in plain English."

Sitcov said FEMA's eight-year-old computer system is set up only to produce program codes. The program also cannot say how many evacuees in Texas were covered by Leon's order or how many people appealed the denial of aid, Sitcov said.

"It's not as adept at doing these kinds of machinations," said Sitcov, who said the best estimate of evacuees covered by the order was 5,479.

DOJ_NMG_0106304

Leon appeared bewildered and ordered FEMA officials to testify Monday. He said he did not understand why the letters could not be written by hand. He said 10 employees, working overtime and on weekends, could translate program codes into 5,000 understandable letters in two weeks -- the amount of time since his ruling.

"This is a legal disaster. People's rights are being denied," Leon said. "I don't want us to get so mired in the minutiae and the law while, in the meantime, people who need help are not getting help."

FEMA has appealed Leon's order and is hoping a higher court will block its enforcement until the appeal plays out. That ruling is unlikely before next week. Leon said he wants the agency to start working on the problem immediately.

"Two weeks have been lost, and I don't want another day to be lost," Leon said. "We've got to get moving."

Sitcov said FEMA could not restart the housing program because the agreements to reimburse Texas cities for rental payments have expired. Leon said he was sure local governments would be willing to make those same agreements again and said he might order Texas officials to testify Monday.

Leon also scheduled a telephone conference tomorrow between FEMA and the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now, which brought the lawsuit on behalf of hurricane victims.

The New York Times, December 14, 2006

Baton Rouge, La.

They look for all the world like internment camps. The long rows of identical white trailers sit on flat, grim, barren expanses of land that are enclosed by metal fences. Armed guards are stationed at the entrances around the clock.

More than a year after the catastrophe of Hurricane Katrina, thousands of the poorest victims from New Orleans are still living in these trailer parks run by the Federal Emergency Management Agency. They have ironic names, like Mount Olive Gardens and Renaissance Village. A more accurate name would be Camp Depression, after the state of mind of most of the residents.

The “parks” are nothing more than vast, dusty, gravel-strewn lots filled with trailers that were designed to be hitched to cars for brief vacations or weekend getaways. The trailers, about 200 square feet each, were never meant to serve as homes for entire families. But in these FEMA parks, it’s common for families of five or six, or even more, to be jammed into one trailer.

I stood outside a trailer at the Mount Olive encampment on Monday afternoon, talking with Geraldine Craig and her 21-year-old daughter, Danielle Craig. The women, who have been unable to find jobs, seemed baffled and depleted by their long ordeal. As we talked, Danielle’s 2-year-old son, Javonta, scampered around in the dust and gravel.

Danielle’s daughter, Miracle, was 5 months old when Katrina struck. The baby was ill and receiving oxygen when it became clear that the family had to evacuate. “The doctors were taking care of her and she couldn’t hardly breathe,” Danielle said. “After we left we ended up in a shelter, and I said that my baby needed oxygen but they told us we had to wait.

“They finally sent us to a medical building and they put her on oxygen for about two hours, but the doctor said there was nothing wrong with her.”

Like so many thousands of others left destitute and all but despondent by Katrina, the family moved on — to Texas, back to Louisiana, eventually to Baton Rouge. It was too much for Miracle, who never got the proper medical treatment. She died last March. Her heart disease wasn’t accurately diagnosed until an autopsy was performed.

“I felt like it was my fault,” said Danielle. “I’m still depressed.”

When I asked if she’d been treated for depression, she shook her head.

“That baby was one of the many victims of the storm who were never officially counted as such,” said Dr. Irwin Redlener, president of the Children’s Health Fund, which has been providing medical and mental health services to children in the FEMA parks.

Dr. Redlener, a professor at Columbia University and the author of “Americans at Risk: Why We Are Not Prepared for Megadisasters and What We Can Do,” said he was outraged that so many thousands of the poorest victims of Hurricane Katrina are still stuck in limbo — unable to find jobs or permanent housing, denied adequate medical and educational services and with no idea when, or if, they will be able to return to New Orleans.

"The recovery of this catastrophe in the gulf has been as badly mangled by the government as the initial response," he said. "Fifteen months have gone by and you still have these thousands of people who in essence are either American refugees living in other states who have no idea what's going to happen to them, or they are living in these trailer camps, or in isolated trailers on their old property, which has been destroyed. They're just waiting for something to happen. And the wait is interminable."

Geraldine Craig said: "We just recently went down to New Orleans and they got nothing going yet, not in our neighborhood. So we're going to be here for a while."

The residents of Mount Olive Gardens and the even larger trailer camp at Renaissance Village in nearby Baker, La., face challenges that seem almost insurmountable. Even minimum-wage jobs are very difficult to find and difficult to get to because there is little public transportation. Many of the residents are elderly, or disabled, or illiterate. Some are mentally handicapped.

These are encampments of profound stress and sadness.

As I was telling Geraldine and Danielle Craig goodbye, and wishing them the best for the coming holidays, Danielle shyly handed me a photograph of her daughter. At the top was written, "Miracle Breyonne Craig." At the bottom: "Sunrise: 3-19-05. Sunset: 3-10-06."

USGS Scientists Object To Stricter Review Rules (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, December 14, 2006

A new Bush administration policy for reviewing scientific documents before publication has angered some U.S. Geological Survey scientists, who say the elaborate internal review of their work may impede them from conveying information to the public.

The new requirements, which were unveiled in July but are still being put into practice, call for staff scientists to submit all reports and prepared talks to managers to determine whether they meet the agency's scientific standards. They also require researchers to alert the agency press office of any work involving "potential high visibility products or policy-sensitive issues."

P. Patrick Leahy, USGS associate director for geology, said the agency spent more than two years drafting the rules to ensure all of it scientists are subject to the same sort of rigorous scientific review before they send their work to be published.

"What we're doing is ensuring the scientific excellence of USGS products," Leahy said in an interview. "Peer review has been the stock and trade of this organization for years and years. How we do that has been different depending on what part of the organization you were in. . . . What we want to do is [have] our scientists working together in concert with one another."

But James Estes, a marine biologist who has worked for more than 30 years at the USGS's Western Ecological Research Center in Santa Cruz, Calif., said that although he has not encountered problems in the past, he and his colleagues fear their work may be stifled.

"I feel as though we've got someone looking over our shoulder at every damn thing we do. And to me that's a very scary thing," Estes said, adding that it will be a cumbersome procedure. "There's been no effort yet other than to intimidate everybody, but to me it's censorship. . . . I think they're afraid of science. Our findings on ecology could be embarrassing to the administration."

Leahy acknowledged that some agency scientists are resistant to the idea, though USGS officials see it as a helpful reform.

"It's the old thing, in concept it makes a great deal of sense," he said. "In practice, if you have a change to what you've been doing for a long time, you're not happy with it."

Under the policy, a USGS employee must submit any scientific document for a peer review that may involve scientists either inside or outside the agency. A supervisor oversees the process, making sure the reviewers are qualified and looking at how the scientist in question responded to any criticism raised by the reviewers.

Rama Kotra, a senior scientist in Leahy's office, said the review might take just one week for a simple document, but in the case of a complex scientific study "it would take much longer than that," possibly six months.

USGS spokeswoman Barbara Wainman said that the press office would not be conducting the peer reviews and that political appointees would not be involved, because the agency director is the only USGS person appointed by the president.

DOJ_NMG_0106306

USGS researchers have tangled with Bush officials over administration policies. In 2002, the agency published a study suggesting that energy exploration on Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Refuge could hurt a Porcupine caribou herd; a week later the agency issued a report saying drilling would not damage the herd.

The controversy over the peer review process surfaced a day after the Union of Concerned Scientists announced that 10,600 scientists have signed a statement complaining that the Bush administration has undermined the "scientific integrity" of federal policymaking. Michael Halpern, the group's outreach coordinator for scientific integrity, said USGS scientists at this week's annual meeting of the American Geophysical Union in San Francisco had approached him to complain about the new peer-review rules.

"They perceive it as another hoop to jump through in order to get scientific documents approved," Halpern said, adding that the policy may not be a problem if officials make sure it's a "valid review process."

"USGS always puts together policy-neutral scientific documents. That's why their reputation is impeccable."

Lawmakers Say Coast Guard Withheld Warning Of Flaws In Cutter Design (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 13 — The Coast Guard withheld from Congress warnings raised more than two years ago by its chief engineer about structural design flaws in its new National Security Cutter, a $564 million ship now near completion in Mississippi, Democrats and Republicans said in interviews this week.

The lack of full disclosure about that and other problems in the Coast Guard's $24 billion modernization effort, known as Deepwater, has created a credibility gap that some members of Congress say now jeopardizes the endeavor.

"The Coast Guard clearly does not understand that transparency and accountability are essential to a program of this magnitude," said Senator Olympia J. Snowe, Republican of Maine, the chairwoman of the Senate panel that oversees the service's operations.

Ms. Snowe and other Congressional leaders said they were unaware until this past week that the Coast Guard's chief engineer, Rear Adm. Erroll Brown, had written in March 2004 to the Coast Guard official in charge of the Deepwater program, Rear Adm. Patrick M. Stillman, to warn him that the design for the National Security Cutter had "significant flaws" and that construction should not begin until they were addressed.

"Importantly, several of these problems compromise the safety and viability of the hull, possibly resulting in structural failure," said the letter, a copy of which was posted on The New York Times Web site last Saturday as part of reporting on the Deepwater project.

Admiral Stillman, who has since resigned, declined to comment.

Representative Harold Rogers, Republican of Kentucky, who heads the House panel that oversees the Coast Guard budget, said the lack of full disclosure was distressing.

"Withholding information leads to poor decisions for the nation, as we are witnessing now with this cutter modernization initiative," Mr. Rogers said. Coast Guard officials said Wednesday that they have tried to keep Congress fully informed about progress on the Deepwater project, which is replacing or rebuilding almost all of the service's ships, planes and helicopters. "The Coast Guard takes very seriously its obligation to keep its authorizers and appropriators informed," a spokesman, Cmdr. Jeffrey Carter, said.

Representative Bob Filner, Democrat of California, said the shortcomings in the Deepwater program are so severe that the contract should be terminated. Two military contractors, Lockheed Martin and Northrop Grumman, were hired in 2002 to design the ships, build them and oversee most of the other project details.

"This has now threatened our national security," said Mr. Filner, the ranking Democrat on the House panel that oversees the Coast Guard. "After four years and billions of dollars, we have nothing to show for it."

A spokeswoman for Lockheed and Northrop declined to comment.

DOJ_NMG_0106307

The uproar over the National Security Cutter follows the suspension of two earlier projects under the Deepwater modernization: a plan to renovate 49 of the Coast Guard's 110-foot patrol boats, and construction of a new class of ship called the Fast Response Cutter.

Details about the problems with the two earlier programs had been provided to Congress, but the leaders of the subcommittees that oversee the Coast Guard budget and operations said they should have also been informed, more than a year ago, that the design questions extended to the National Security Cutter.

Construction of the first new National Security Cutter, a 425-foot vessel slated to be the flagship of the Coast Guard fleet, started in September 2004, before most of the issues identified by Admiral Brown were addressed, Coast Guard engineers said in interviews this month. The admiral has since retired.

Unless structural modifications are made, the ship will be susceptible to buckling of its superstructure, premature cracks in its hull and decks, and, in an extreme case, the possible failure of the hull girder, which is a ship's backbone, said Chris Cleary, a senior naval architect at the Coast Guard.

An independent analysis by Navy engineers early this year has confirmed that the ship, as designed, may be susceptible to premature fatigue cracking, although top Coast Guard officials said they had been assured that the problems would not present a safety hazard for the ship, which is to start sailing next year.

Coast Guard officials in the last year did tell some Congressional committees that the service was addressing contractual issues with Northrop that might require additional work to the first ship, staff members on the House and Senate committees said.

During a June 2006 hearing on the Deepwater program, the Coast Guard commandant, Adm. Thad Allen, briefly mentioned the difficulties, telling a House panel that "there are some technical issues associated with the construction that we will address in subsequent hulls."

The Coast Guard intends to reinforce the first two versions of the National Security Cutter and to change the design of the remaining six versions, a plan it notified Congress of last week. The service has not disclosed how much the repairs to the first two ships will cost or who will be responsible for the bill.

Coast Guard leaders said in interviews that any new class of ship has design challenges that must be resolved. Given that the start of the National Security Cutter construction had already been planned in 2004 — and that any delays would add to the ship's cost — they decided to allow the first ship to be built, while continuing to investigate their engineers' reports of design flaws.

Ships That Don't Dare To Sail (NYT)

The New York Times, December 14, 2006

The Coast Guard, supposedly our first line of defense against water-borne terrorists and drug smugglers, has been staggered by a shipbuilding scandal of enormous proportions. A long-term modernization program to replace nearly all of the Coast Guard's ships, planes and helicopters — begun four years ago in the wake of 9/11 — is foundering while its projected costs are skyrocketing. In Iraq, lax government oversight and incompetence or profiteering by contractors have disabled reconstruction efforts. Now the same disease is undermining our coastal defenses.

The Coast Guard fiasco was laid out in depressing detail by Eric Lipton in The Times last Saturday, and in a similar article in The Washington Post. The misjudgments and slipshod work would be grist for slapstick comedy if the consequences, in cost and weakened defenses, were not so serious.

As described by Mr. Lipton, the estimated costs of the project, known as Deepwater, have ballooned from $17 billion when it started in 2002 to $24 billion today. The plans call for 91 new ships, 124 small boats, 195 new or rebuilt helicopters and 49 unmanned aerial vehicles. But don't count on any of the new vehicles working.

The initial venture — converting the Coast Guard's rusting patrol boats into bigger, more versatile cutters — has been canceled because hull cracks and engine failures made the first eight ships unseaworthy. Plans for a new class of ships with an innovative hull design were halted after the design was found to be flawed. And even the radios placed in small open boats proved faulty; they shorted out because they had not been made waterproof.

In the latest chapter in this disgraceful performance, Mr. Lipton reports in today's paper that the Coast Guard did not inform Congress that it was warned two years ago by its chief engineer that a proposed National Security Cutter, meant to be the flagship of its fleet, had “significant flaws” in its structural design and should not be started until the problems were addressed. The Coast Guard began construction anyway. It plans to reinforce the first two versions that are being built and change the design on the remaining six.

How could this happen? Mostly because the Coast Guard, in an astonishing abdication of responsibility, gave two large military contractors, Lockheed Martin and Northrop Grumman, near total freedom to plan, supervise and deliver the new ships and helicopters. In some cases, the contractors made boneheaded decisions, as when their shipyard partner ignored warnings by Coast Guard engineers that the converted patrol boats might buckle under the extra weight. In other cases, they might have put their own interests ahead of the nation’s, as when they adopted a risky hull material that had never been tried on a large American military ship but was pushed by Northrop, which had just opened a new plant to manufacture the hulls.

No wonder the contractors are ducking for cover as the scandal reverberates, and are leaving all comment to the hapless Coast Guard. The Coast Guard seems, belatedly, to be moving in the right direction by giving its own engineers more supervisory power over the work and creating a division to oversee procurement and maintenance of ships and planes. Even so, the new Congress and the Department of Homeland Security, which is responsible for the Coast Guard, will need to keep a sharp eye on the Coast Guard’s performance. The industrial contractors have proved they were not up to the job.

Fannie Correction: 'What If?' (WP)

By David S. Hilzenrath

The Washington Post, December 14, 2006

Three years ago, Fannie Mae assured lawmakers that it had the required capital to cope with a broad variety of business setbacks.

Since 1992, "Fannie Mae has met or exceeded our capital requirements in every year," Franklin D. Raines, then its chief executive, testified in September 2003. "Indeed, we are one of the best-capitalized financial institutions in the world, when compared to the risk of our business."

As it turns out, the assurance was false.

Last week, when the giant mortgage funding company corrected years of flawed financial reports, the new numbers showed that it fell short of a key capital requirement by billions of dollars in 2002 and 2003.

Had it been apparent at the time, the $7.3 billion shortfall at the end of 2002 could have put Fannie Mae on a different trajectory. Regulators might have intervened -- as they did later, when accounting problems came to light. Wall Street might have reevaluated Fannie Mae's vaunted management, not to mention the value of its stock. And Fannie Mae might have been forced to raise additional capital or liquidate investments, sacrificing profits.

Instead, based on Fannie Mae's financial reports, the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, which monitors Fannie Mae's financial safety and soundness, gave the company a passing grade.

"Fannie Mae's core capital of $28.079 billion exceeded the minimum capital requirement by $877 million," the agency said in early 2003.

The accounting correction Fannie Mae filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission last week offers an alternative version of history, inviting investors to roll back the tape and play it forward again without the illusions. Like all adventures in time travel, it's a matter of conjecture. The very act of traveling back in time equipped with better information might have altered the reality.

Ed Groshans, a stock analyst at Fox-Pitt, Kelton, speculated that Fannie Mae would not have allowed itself to be declared undercapitalized. If Fannie Mae executives had been forced to keep their books properly, they would have taken steps to avert a shortfall, Groshans said.

One option would have been to reduce Fannie Mae's investment portfolio, a major source of profit. In that case, investors could have seen Fannie Mae's earnings "come down fairly significantly," Groshans said. "People would have been a little bit concerned as to what was going on internally," he said.

A Fannie Mae spokesman declined to comment.

DOJ_NMG_0106309

Chartered by the federal government, Fannie Mae plays a major role in the nation's housing finance system. It buys mortgages from lenders and helps lenders replenish their funds by packaging mortgages into securities for sale to investors.

Unlike some other companies caught up in accounting scandals, Fannie Mae never defaulted on its obligations. What's more, the government uses two standards to determine whether the company is adequately capitalized. Fannie Mae is required to meet both tests, and while it failed one of them, the restatement shows that it passed the other.

The test Fannie Mae failed is meant to protect "against broad categories of business risk," according to the OFHEO.

Although the company fell short, the restatement showed that Fannie Mae's financial condition improved significantly based on another measure. Total stockholders' equity rose by $15.6 billion, to $31.9 billion, as of the end of 2002 and by $9.9 billion, to $32.3 billion, as of the end of 2003. There were two main reasons. First, when it corrected its accounting, Fannie Mae showed increases in the value of financial instruments known as derivatives that were previously obscured. Second, in the restatement, Fannie Mae recorded gains on mortgage-related investments that would not have shown up unless it sold the assets.

The SEC earlier this year accused Fannie Mae of fraud. Without admitting or denying wrongdoing, the company paid a $400 million settlement. Raines and other executives who presided over the problems were replaced.

Fannie Mae still faces litigation from shareholders, and the OFHEO has threatened to sue former executives to recoup some of their compensation.

Fannie Mae's accounting corrections, which involved a multitude of additions to and subtractions from profits it had previously claimed, had the net effect of reducing the company's past earnings by $6.3 billion.

Of all the numbers Fannie Mae corrected, the capital cushion is one of the most consequential. It is meant to assure that the company can withstand a sharp financial reversal. Some policymakers fear that if Fannie Mae became insolvent, it could send shock waves through the financial system and trigger a taxpayer bailout. Raines's 2003 testimony about the company's capital position served as a counterpoint to such warnings. It came as lawmakers were considering stepping up regulation of Fannie Mae and its rival Freddie Mac.

That debate will continue when the new Congress convenes next year, lawmakers say.

520 Breaks For Select Companies Added To Tax Bill (WP)

By Joe Stephens

The Washington Post, December 14, 2006

A huge tax bill that Congress passed last week contained a little-noticed gift for select corporations -- tens of millions of dollars in breaks on import tariffs.

Early Saturday morning, in the frantic final hours of the 109th Congress, lawmakers rolled 520 tariff suspensions into the must-pass bill. The provisions will reduce or eliminate taxes on imported products as varied as shoes, camcorders and boiled oysters.

While such suspensions have been around for decades, the flurry of provisions pushed this Congress to a record of nearly 800 for the year. Corporate lobbyists often craft such suspensions to apply to just one product imported by just one company. Many of those companies and their executives have given millions of dollars to political campaigns.

This week, leaders from both parties called for changes in the system.

"This is just good old-fashioned pork," said Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.), vice chairman of the House Republican Conference for the 109th Congress. Kingston described the suspensions as a stealthy version of the congressional earmark -- a term for a measure that directs the government to spend public money on behalf of a particular special interest.

"A lot of members of Congress are just clueless as to what is going on," Kingston said. "You can spend money away or you can tax-credit it away. Either way, somebody else is going to pick up the difference."

Congressional sponsors of the suspensions say they are trying to lower consumer prices and create jobs by cutting costs for retailers and U.S. manufacturers. They say that they generally drop the legislation if trade officials find a U.S. competitor that objects.

DOJ_NMG_0106310

Few, if any, of the arcanely worded tariff provisions identify the company that initiated the measure. Some provisions do not identify the product as well, referring instead to strings of numbers keyed to tariff tables as big as telephone directories.

Under informal congressional guidelines, individual tariff suspensions are supposed to cost no more than $500,000 a year in lost taxes. But a Washington Post investigation, published in September, found that the authors of a number of the provisions managed to quietly file multiple measures aimed at a single product. That strategy can allow individual importers to pocket millions of dollars in tax savings.

Rep. Sander M. Levin (D-Mich.), who is expected to chair the House Ways and Means subcommittee on trade next year, said yesterday that he favors including in the suspension measures the names of the companies that would benefit. He also wants to close loopholes that allow companies to evade the $500,000 cap.

"The old days of lack of transparency, I think those days have to end," Levin said. "These are supposed to be small items. . . . I am in favor of keeping it small and making it totally open."

Altogether, the suspensions passed this year could cost the Treasury hundreds of millions of dollars in lost revenue. The previous Congress approved about 440 new and extended suspensions, at an estimated cost of $172 million.

Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), outgoing chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, described the suspensions as good for American businesses. In a statement, Grassley stressed that the provisions had been reviewed by the Commerce Department, customs officials and the U.S. International Trade Commission. His panel had sought industry comment on the proposed suspensions, had posted them on its Web site, and ultimately rejected almost a third, he said.

Nonetheless, Grassley added: "Further reforms are necessary to make the process even more transparent and streamlined. If the new leadership decides to undertake a miscellaneous tariff bill, I'll push for further reforms."

Kingston said Congress should have a chance to vote on individual tariff suspensions. Under the current system, lawmakers must vote for or against hundreds of unrelated suspensions at a time. Kingston said that he ultimately voted for last week's huge tax-and-trade package because it contained many legitimate provisions important to the country.

"Members don't read these bills because they become so voluminous at the last minute," Kingston said. "They are always attached to something we all want."

Steve Ellis of Taxpayers for Common Sense complained that while the 109th Congress failed to take up many important issues, it still managed to pass hundreds of special-interest tariff suspensions. "If you are the right person, you can get something done," Ellis said. "It's one of those really insidious types of problems that will take a lot of work, and a lot of embarrassment for Congress, to try to change. And trust me, members of Congress don't embarrass easily."

In the recent election season, Dennis Spivack tried. A Democratic challenger to Rep. Michael N. Castle (R-Del.), Spivack attacked Castle for sponsoring 29 suspensions in the past two years. Spivack charged that the suspensions would harm small businesses and working families.

"Why did Mike Castle ask the United States Congress to selectively drop import taxes on [a] particular item? Who does this benefit?" Spivack asked in one campaign news release.

Castle's campaign responded that the suspensions helped keep manufacturing jobs in the United States. Spivack lost the election.

Rural Schools' Budgets Face The Chopping Block (USAT)

By Greg Toppo

USA Today, December 14, 2006

Rural school districts in 42 states could be forced to cut their budgets or close down altogether in coming months, advocates say, because Congress left Washington last week without renewing a little-known authorization for districts with large tracts of national forest land.

The Secure Rural Schools and Community Act subsidizes about 4,400 small school districts. Congress first approved it in 2000 to make up for declining revenue in timber-producing areas and to guarantee districts a steady income. The law was up for renewal this year, but lawmakers left Washington on Saturday without approving it, leaving many districts scrambling to replace funding that, in a few cases, amounts to more than half of their budgets.

School advocates say it would cost about $430 million to extend the law for one year. Unlike many funding bills, the forest schools act is not part of a continuing resolution and would likely have to be approved on its own.

Dan Whiting, spokesman for Sen. Larry Craig, R-Idaho, says Craig supports the legislation but is not sure where he'd find the money to fund it. "The bottom line is, budgets are a lot tighter than they were in 2000, and trying to find a half a billion dollars is no easy task," he says.

Bob Douglas, president of the National Forest Counties and Schools Coalition, says as many as 100 school districts in California face budget cuts. A few could face bankruptcy or state receivership.

"Their budgets will be essentially upside down," says Douglas, superintendent in Tehama County, Calif.

Mary Genasci, superintendent of Sierra County, Calif., schools, agrees. "We will basically be laying off half of our staff — we stand a very good chance of totally closing our doors."

Genasci's district of 540 students lies north of Lake Tahoe. About 75% of it sits on federal land, most of it national forest. She stands to lose about $1.2 million of a $6 million budget and says she may have to send out layoff notices as early as mid-March.

"The magnitude of this is incomprehensible to me," she says. "I cannot get my head around this."

Rural superintendents this month are planning a lobbying blitz as members of Congress head home to their districts. It's expected to extend into January and February, when lawmakers return to Washington for the start of the 110th Congress.

Whiting says Craig will keep trying to find ways to fund the law, but adds, "Oftentimes it takes a crisis to spur Congress into action."

Democrats Plan To Tighten Reins On Iraq Spending (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 13 — Frustrated by the Bush administration's piecemeal financing of the Iraq war, Democrats are planning to assert more control over the billions of dollars a month being spent on the conflict when they take charge of Congress in January.

In interviews, the incoming Democratic chairmen of the House and Senate Budget Committees said they would demand a better accounting of the war's cost and move toward integrating the spending into the regular federal budget, a signal of their intention to use the Congressional power of the purse more assertively to influence the White House's management of the war.

The lawmakers, Senator Kent Conrad of North Dakota and Representative John M. Spratt Jr. of South Carolina, said the administration's approach of paying for extended military operations and related activities through a series of emergency requests had inhibited Congressional scrutiny of the spending and obscured the true price of the war.

"They have been playing hide-the-ball," Mr. Conrad said, "and that does not serve the Congress well nor the country well, and we are not going to continue that practice."

Mr. Spratt, who along with Mr. Conrad is examining how the Democratic Congress should funnel the war spending requests through the House and Senate, said, "We need to have a better breakout of the costs — period." He is planning hearings for early next year on the subject even as the White House readies a new request for $120 billion or more to pay for the war through Sept. 30, in addition to the more than $70 billion in emergency appropriations already spent this year.

Since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, spending on the military outside of the regular budget process, primarily for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, has totaled more than $400 billion. For the 12 months ended Sept. 30, spending on the Iraq war alone ran at an average rate of $8 billion a month, according to a study by the Congressional Research Service.

Congressional control over the money for the war is one of the most powerful weapons Democrats will have in trying to influence administration policy toward Iraq. They can use both the budget and subsequent spending bills to impose restrictions on how the money is spent and demand more information from the White House.

While the leadership has repeatedly said it will not cut off money for military operations, senior Democratic officials said lawmakers were considering whether to add conditions to spending bills to force the administration to meet certain standards for progress or change in Iraq. Democrats have also said they intend to investigate spending and suspicions of corruption, waste and abuse in Iraq contracting.

Since the beginning of the war, the White House has said that costs should be considered outside the routine federal budget because they are unpredictable and military demands can change quickly. Republicans have also said that wars have traditionally been treated as emergency spending, but the costs of the extended Vietnam War, for instance, were eventually absorbed into the normal budget.

But Mr. Bush has decided not to include the costs of the war in the budget request he sends to Congress each February. The Republican Congress has acceded to his request that money be appropriated for the conflict on an expedited, as-needed basis that sidesteps much of the process by which the House and Senate normally debate spending priorities.

But the newly completed report of the Iraq Study Group stated that the "costs for the war in Iraq should be included in the president's annual budget request," beginning with the budget to be submitted early next year.

In addition, a little noticed provision added to a defense policy measure signed into law by Mr. Bush in October directed him to include in his budget a request for appropriations for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, an estimate of all money expected to be required for the year, and a detailed justification of the request.

"The law requires that it be done," Mr. Conrad said, adding that he had told the incoming defense secretary, Robert M. Gates, that the administration must change its budgeting strategy.

But Sean Kevelighan, a spokesman for the Office of Management and Budget, said the administration's view was that Congress could not "bind how the president wants to put together the budget," though he said the administration was trying to provide more information for Congress and moving toward a more regular budget plan.

"It is obviously difficult to predict the cost of the war 12 to 18 months out," Mr. Kevelighan said. "But our goal is to provide more information to the American people as to how much, for what and when."

Both Republicans and Democrats have objected to the administration's refusal to add the war costs to the budget, particularly when the conflict has lasted almost four years. "It is hard to comprehend with an ongoing event like the war that there wouldn't be something on it in the budget," said Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader.

In June, the Senate overwhelmingly approved a proposal by Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, to require the president to spell out the expected war costs in his annual spending plan. At the time, some lawmakers expected that the provision would be eliminated from the final measure, but it survived and could be held up by Democrats as evidence that the administration was ignoring the law if it failed to comply.

Lawmakers have several objections to treating the war spending as a continuous emergency, which typically sends the request straight to the Appropriations Committee and bypasses the more policy-oriented Armed Services Committees. Mr. Spratt said he believed that the policy panels tended to give such requests a "closer scrub" than the appropriations panels.

Others say the emergency measures, known as supplemental appropriation requests, can become vehicles for lawmakers to win speedy approval of their own, unrelated pet projects. Members of Congress say the Pentagon has also increasingly seen the war measures as a route to winning financing for projects that should be subject to normal review. And there are complaints that the administration's approach masks the true cost of the war by not providing a clear bottom line number and by not calculating such related expenses as increased veterans care and military equipment.

"We are now going on four years into this war and they are still funding it with these patchwork supplementals without oversight and without accountability," Mr. Conrad said, "and that just has to stop."

But adding the war costs to the annual budget could carry risks for Democrats who want to write a spending plan that meets their priorities but eliminates the deficit in five years or so. Adding the war spending at the same time Democrats want to enforce "pay as you go" budget rules would require some of that spending to be made up by reductions elsewhere.

And if Mr. Bush's budget does not contain the spending and the Congressional plan does, the president's blueprint could look better by comparison when it comes to deficit reduction. In addition, budget writers do not want Pentagon spending inflated by the war to become a permanent new floor for the military budget.

Democrats, The Deficit, And All They Want To Achieve (CSM)

The Christian Science Monitor, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON

Lower interest rates on student loans. More special forces for the military. Expanded prescription drug benefits for senior citizens. Greater federal support for renewable energy and alternative fuels.

Congressional Democrats have a long list of priorities they'd like to enact when they assume the power of the majority in January. After all, they've been wandering in the political wilderness for 12 years. They've had lots of time to scribble down stuff under the heading "to do."

But faced with record federal deficits and the expense of the war in Iraq, Democrats have also vowed to be more fiscally responsible than their Republican predecessors. Handling this impending collision could be one of the first big tests for the party's House and Senate leadership teams.

"Maybe [incoming Speaker of the House Nancy] Pelosi can really curb the tendency of Democrats to spend money, but there is a lot of pent-up desire," said Ron Haskins, codirector of the Brookings Institution's Center on Children and Families, at a recent seminar.

As yet, Democrats have hung no price tag on their forthcoming agenda. Many of the high-priority items they have pledged to enact in the first 100 hours of the new Congress, such as an increase in the minimum wage, wouldn't cost Washington lots of money.

In addition, incoming Speaker Pelosi said in a statement last month that the party is committed to "no new deficit spending." She said Democrats intend to restore pay-as-you-go rules, which require increases in the federal budget to be offset by either tax hikes or cuts in spending elsewhere.

It is true that the expansive list of party action items, as contained in the House Democrats' 31-page document, "A New Direction for America," is something of a catchall. For instance, will Congress really get around to voting to make college tuition tax-deductible for students studying math, science, technology, and engineering, as the document vows?

But some of the prospective legislative changes at the very top of the Democratic list would be undeniably expensive. Depending on how eligibility is structured, reductions in student loan interest rates could cost $10 to $50 billion over the next five years. Doubling special forces could cost $25 billion over five years.

Then there is the Alternative Minimum Tax (AMT), which has long been criticized by Democrats and Republicans alike. Designed to apply only to the wealthy, the tax now affects many who would call themselves middle class. Raising the income level at which a taxpayer is subject to the AMT could cost at least $40 billion a year.

And Democrats may want to expand federal health spending. The most common suggestion in this area is closing the "doughnut hole" in Medicare's prescription drug benefit, under which beneficiaries receive help for their first $2,250 of purchases in a year, then must buy prescriptions entirely on their own until their annual spending total hits $5,100.

The reason the doughnut hole exists in the first place was to pare the program's predicted cost. Its elimination would probably cost an estimated $5 billion annually.

"If you do make the prescription drug benefit more generous that could get very, very expensive, and there's no obvious way to pay for that," says Bob Bixby, director of The Concord Coalition, a budget watchdog group.

However, Mr. Bixby says he is encouraged by some budget actions Democrats have vowed to take. This week party leaders vowed to enforce a moratorium on the special-interest spending provisions known as "earmarks" until lobbying reforms can be enacted. And the incoming chairmen of the House and Senate Appropriations Committees have jointly said they will extend current funding levels for much federal spending until the 2008 fiscal year begins next Oct. 1.

The just-adjourned Congress only completed work on two of the 11 spending bills for fiscal 2007. As a short-term fix they extended current funding levels until Feb. 15, 2007.

Prolonging the life of this continuing resolution is the moral equivalent of a budget freeze, notes Bixby. "That was an encouraging sign," he says, "because they are doing a long-term continuing resolution at a lower level than many rank-and-file Democrats would like."

DOJ_NMG_0106314

Of course, a year is a long time in terms of a Congressional budget. And after Democrats assume power, pressure may build from members used to minority status to reinsert treasured earmarks into spending bills.

Emergency spending legislation, such as that which has been used so far to fund much of the Iraq war, can be particularly attractive to lawmakers who want to get earmarks through as quickly as possible.

"The job of a budget watchdog is never done," sighs Bixby.

Senator Wants Universal Health Care Plan (AP)

By Matthew Daly

AP, December 14, 2006

Several business and labor leaders on Wednesday hailed a proposal to provide health care coverage to all Americans through a pool of private insurance plans.

A dozen years after Congress rejected a Clinton administration plan for universal health care, Oregon Sen. Ron Wyden offered a plan he said would provide affordable, private health care coverage for all Americans, except those covered through Medicare or the military.

"Employer-based coverage is melting away like a Popsicle on the sidewalk in August," Wyden said.

Wyden, a Democrat and a member of the Senate Finance health care subcommittee, said his plan would "guarantee health coverage for every American that is at least as good as members of Congress receive and can never be taken away."

The plan, dubbed the "Healthy Americans Act," would provide universal coverage for no more money than the country spends on health insurance today, Wyden said.

Wyden, a veteran of the 1990s health care battle, drew support from groups that have frequently opposed each other, including Andy Stern, international president of the Service Employees International Union, and Safeway Inc. CEO Steve Burd.

Stern called employer-based health coverage a relic of an industrial economy that is long gone, and said U.S. companies "cannot compete in a global economy when we put the price of health care on the cost of our products, and our competitor nations do not."

Stern said the health care system had failed to create jobs while adding to trade deficits and holding wages stagnant. For the nation's 46 million uninsured, "it is a failed moral policy as well," Stern said.

Burd said his California-based grocery chain had saved millions in health care costs by emphasizing preventative care and offering discounts for nonsmokers and others with lower health risks.

Left unchecked, health care costs will soon surpass net income for many companies, Burd said, calling Wyden's proposal a bold plan to restart a national dialogue on health care.

"Working together, business, labor, government, consumer groups and health care providers can collectively solve this problem," he said.

Wyden's plan is an outgrowth of work by the Citizens' Health Care Working Group, a 14-member panel that held meetings in 36 states and heard from 28,000 people about how to overhaul the nation's health care system.

The group, created in 2003 by legislation sponsored by Wyden and Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, recommended that the government take steps to guarantee that all Americans have basic health insurance coverage by 2012.

Wyden said his new plan would allow workers to carry their health insurance from job to job without penalty. More efficient administration and more promotion of competition for health care plans, he said, would allow greater coverage while costing no more than the government is paying today for health insurance coverage.

The plan would require that employers "cash out" their existing health plans by terminating coverage and paying the amount saved directly to workers as increased wages. Workers then would be required to buy health insurance from a large pool of private plans.

After two years, companies would no longer have to pay the higher wages. Instead, Wyden said, they would pay into an insurance pool, based on annual revenues and the number of full-time workers.

DOJ_NMG_0106315

At Wyden's request, the Lewin Group, a Virginia-based health care consulting firm, reviewed the plan. The consultant said the plan would reduce health spending by private employers by nearly three-quarters and save $1.4 trillion in total national health care spending over the next decade.

Increases in premium payments for individuals and families would be offset by higher wages and subsidies provided under the plan, the report said. As an example, Wyden cited a worker who earned $60,000 last year, and received about $12,000 worth of health care coverage.

The worker's health insurance would be terminated but his salary would increase to $72,000, which would cover his health care coverage. The plan would bar workers from buying a "bare-bones" health package and pocketing the savings, Wyden said.

Health Care For All Proposed (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-zaldivar

The Los Angeles Times, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — A prominent Democratic senator unveiled an ambitious proposal today to provide health insurance for all Americans, while reining in rapid healthcare inflation that threatens benefits for millions of workers and their families.

The plan by Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.) comes a month after the health insurance industry offered its own comprehensive proposal and signals a growing willingness by politicians to tackle a subject that has been off limits since the mid-1990s collapse of then-President Bill Clinton's sweeping health reform package.

Considered liberal on social issues and moderate on economic policy, Wyden combined elements of reforms that have been proposed by Democrats and Republicans.

His plan would guarantee coverage for all, including nearly 47 million uninsured, a Democratic objective. But it would also limit employers' exposure to relentless cost increases and encourage workers to shop for cost-effective insurance plans — ideas that have Republican support.

"I think the country wants healthcare fixed," Wyden said at a briefing for reporters earlier this week. "It's possible to get good quality, affordable, universal private health coverage that can never be taken away for the amount of money that is spent today."

Wyden is a member of two Senate panels that are heavily involved in healthcare, the Finance and Budget committees.

Americans spend more than $2 trillion a year on healthcare, more on a per-person basis than any other country. But the returns on that investment are uneven, with many insured patients getting less than optimal care and millions of workers unable to afford health coverage, which costs about $12,000 to $13,000 a year for a family plan.

Employers have traditionally provided coverage for workers and their families. Although most workers are still insured through their jobs, corporate leaders are increasingly questioning whether the system can be sustained in an era of global competition.

Wyden's plan would require employers to continue contributing toward the cost of health coverage, but it would get them out of the business of directly providing insurance and limit their exposure to double-digit annual inflation.

In the first two years of the plan, employers who now provide coverage would be required to directly pay workers what they were spending on insurance. Thereafter, most companies would pay the government a healthcare contribution that resembles a payroll tax.

Using the money from their employer, individuals would be required to purchase a private insurance policy through a purchasing pool in their state. Benefits would be keyed to the Blue Cross Blue Shield Standard Plan available to federal workers. Workers would not have to pay higher income taxes because of the employer contribution.

The uninsured would also have to buy coverage, but premiums for the poor would be fully subsidized by the government. Middle-class families with incomes up to $80,000 for a family of four would be eligible for help on a sliding scale.

Premiums from individuals and contributions from employers would be collected by the government through the tax system and distributed to insurers. Once enrolled, individuals would be covered until retirement. Seniors in the Medicare program would not have to make any changes.

An economic analysis of the plan by the Lewin Group consulting firm found it could be paid for with a little less than what the nation now spends on healthcare. In theory, the plan would hold down healthcare inflation because individuals would have to pay more out of their own pockets for plans with lavish benefits.

Wyden's proposal — spelled out in a 166-page bill that he plans to introduce soon — is complex and such changes are not likely to be easily enacted. Most experts believe major healthcare reform will only be possible if a presidential candidate is elected with a mandate to tackle the problem. Nonetheless, Wyden won compliments for taking on a tough issue.

"We are very supportive of the goals Sen. Wyden has established," said Ron Pollack, executive director of Families USA, a liberal advocacy group that will play a key role on health policy in the Democratic-led Congress. But he called the plan "a first step" and "a work in progress."

At the Committee for Economic Development, an organization of CEOs from major companies, senior economist Joseph Minarik said Wyden's plan sounds like "a first or second cousin" to ideas the organization is considering in formulating its own proposal that will be announced next year.

"The story overall is that people are beginning to come to the conclusion that the employer-based health insurance system is very vulnerable," Minarik said.

Political Groups To Pay Campaign Fines (AP)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, December 14, 2006

Swift Boat Veterans for Truth and MoveOn.org Voter Fund, two outside groups that played key roles in the 2004 presidential election, reached an agreement with the Federal Election Commission to pay nearly $450,000 for various violations.

The groups, along with the League of Conservation Voters, settled charges that they failed "to register and file disclosure reports as federal political committees and accepted contributions in violation of federal limits and source prohibitions," the FEC said in a statement Wednesday.

The commission approved the three settlements on a vote of 6-0.

The FEC's unanimous decision to approve the agreements goes to the heart of campaign tactics that reached full bloom in the 2004 campaign. At issue was the emergence of nonprofit political groups, called 527s based on the section of the Internal Revenue Service code that governs their activities, operating as independent campaigns attacking Democratic nominee Sen. John Kerry or President Bush.

The group listed as Swift Boat Veterans and POWs for Truth will pay $299,500. In the 2004 campaign, the group spent $20.4 million criticizing Kerry's military record in Vietnam. Much of the group's claims about Kerry's service were never substantiated.

MoveOn.org Voter Fund will pay $150,000. The liberal organization challenged President Bush on various issues in the campaign. The group spent $14.6 million on television ads attacking Bush's record.

The League of Conservation Voters will pay $180,000. The group ran ads against Bush and other federal candidates, criticizing their stands on environmental issues.

The civil penalties were the first of this magnitude since the Supreme Court upheld most of the campaign finance law passed by Congress in 2002 that barred political parties from raising unlimited amounts of money from corporations, unions and wealthy individuals.

The FEC concluded that the three 527 organizations violated campaign finance laws because they expressly stated their desire to influence the presidential election in their fundraising, their public statements or their advertisements. Such activity, the FEC said, could only be conducted by political committee registered with the FEC that abide by contribution limits and public disclosure requirements.

Commission Chairman Michael Toner said the penalties send a "strong message" and set "important touchstones for the future."

"This will have significant implications for the 2008 presidential race," he said. "527 organizations are on clear notice about what their legal obligations are."

DOJ_NMG_0106317

But campaign finance watchdog groups said the FEC's actions were "too little, too late," in the words of Paul Ryan of the Campaign Legal Center.

The center and other organizations like it have been calling on the FEC to adopt specific regulations governing 527 groups. The FEC in 2004 refused to enact such rules, arguing that it would deal with the groups on a case-by-case basis. Several other complaints involving 527 groups are pending before FEC.

MoveOn.org shut down its Voter Fund organization in 2004, and drove its campaign activity through its political action committee, which raised more than $27 million in the 2006 election cycle.

"We welcome the FEC clamping down on pop-up 527s, set up just to influence elections and funded only by big money, since that would almost certainly put Swift Boat Veterans and similar groups out of business," said Wes Boyd, a co-founder of MoveOn.org.

Lawyers for the Swift Boat Veterans told the FEC that they acted with "good-faith belief" that their communications were not affected by the campaign finance law. They argued that by not adopting specific rules in 2004, the FEC had left the law murky.

"It is far better to end this legal confrontation now rather than continue a costly battle against government bureaucrats in an area where the law is unconscionably vague," retired Rear Adm. Roy Hoffmann, founder of the Swift Boat Veterans, said in a statement.

Groups Penalized For Breaking Campaign Finance Laws In 2004 Election (USAT)

By Fredreka Schouten

USA Today, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — Three independent political groups paid six-figure settlements to resolve charges that they broke campaign-finance laws in the 2004 presidential election, the Federal Election Commission said Wednesday.

The action is the first clampdown on outside political groups, FEC Chairman Michael Toner said, and could diminish the role of such organizations.

Swift Boat Veterans and POWs for Truth paid $299,500 in penalties; the MoveOn.org Voter Fund paid $150,000; and the League of Conservation Voters 527 and 527 II paid $180,000.

The groups stepped over the line by either raising funds or by paying for activities that called for the election or defeat of the presidential contenders, Toner said.

These so-called 527 groups, named for the section of the tax code that governs their activity, emerged as players in the 2004 race between President Bush and Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass. The veterans group, for instance, ran ads attacking Kerry's Vietnam record.

"We would not see independent spending on the same scale in 2008 as we did in 2004" if the FEC action survives legal challenges, said Richard Hasen of Loyola Law School in Los Angeles.

Altogether, "527" groups spent $426 million in 2004 on federal elections, and nearly four times as much cash aided Democrats, according to the non-partisan Campaign Finance Institute.

Under federal law, the organizations are allowed to raise and spend nearly unlimited amounts of money as long as they do not advocate for candidates or coordinate activities with them.

The 527 groups' activity bloomed after new campaign-finance laws in 2002 that prohibited large, unregulated donations.

The groups say they acted in good faith. "The law is unconscionably vague," Swift Boat Veterans' founder Roy Hoffmann said.

Watchdog groups said rules or new laws are needed. The settlements are "too little, too late," said Democracy 21's Fred Wertheimer and Campaign Legal Center's Gerry Hebert.

FEC Fines 3 '527' Groups For Use Of Large Donations In '04 (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0106318

The Federal Election Commission yesterday slapped heavy fines on three independent fundraising groups it said had illegally injected tens of millions of dollars into the 2004 presidential campaign, concluding unanimously that the funds were drawn from large donors and corporations in violation of election laws.

The fines, which totaled $629,500, targeted two Democrat-leaning groups and one Republican-leaning group. They raised new questions about the viability of using such "527" organizations as an indirect conduit for big-money donations meant to promote or undermine federal candidates.

The use of 527 groups by big donors exploded in 2004, two years after a new campaign finance law shut off other venues. More than $950 million was funneled through the groups in the 2004 and 2006 elections, much of it from wealthy donors and corporations otherwise barred from having such a large financial impact.

FEC Vice Chairman Robert D. Lenhard said in a statement that the fines -- levied against Swiftboat Veterans and POWs for Truth, MoveOn.org's Voter Fund, and a League of Conservation Voters fund -- demonstrated that the commission is prepared "to regulate election activity more aggressively than it has in the past."

But prominent election lawyers said the FEC's decision to fine the three groups was unlikely to slow such funding in the 2008 election. Although the fines imposed yesterday add new uncertainty for large donors, the underlying FEC rules remain so murky that the strength of the precedent is unclear, the lawyers said.

"There is no clear standard," said Jan Baran, a former general counsel of the Republican National Committee, whose law firm represents a 527 group still being investigated by the agency.

"The law is clearly not settled," agreed League of Conservation Voters President Gene Karpinski in a statement.

Other campaign finance lawyers said even the risk of fines may not deter the wealthiest donors, who would be dunned long after the donations had been spent and elections decided. They said the ruling may encourage large donors to use other sorts of tax-exempt advocacy groups notsubject to FEC regulation in the past.

The FEC is under pressure from a federal judge to prove that it is effectively regulating 527 groups -- named for the chapter in the IRS code governing them -- and the big-money donors they represent. The agency announced this summer that it would intervene against them on an ad hoc basis rather than prescribe clear new rules of conduct. But a federal court, acting in a lawsuit brought by two congressmen, told the FEC to show by the end of January that it is taking meaningful action.

These fines do not meet the test, said Fred Wertheimer, the head of Democracy 21, a nonprofit group that has complaints pending at the FEC over spending by eight 527 groups in the past two federal election cycles. "We feel it is too little, too late," Wertheimer said, noting that by not making the rules clearer before the 2004 election, the FEC left the door open to huge spending that his group contends was illegal.

He said the fines were not so large in comparison with the groups' total fundraising efforts, raising the possibility that they would see it simply as a "cost of doing business."

Officials at each of the groups denied acting in bad faith and initially contended they were not under the FEC's jurisdiction. That would have meant they were exempt from federal campaign laws limiting donations from a single individual to $5,000 annually, and from a ban on corporate political donations.

The FEC disagreed, citing public statements and fundraising solicitations that openly described the groups' desire to defeat or oppose one of the presidential nominees. It also said the groups spent their money on ads that expressly advocated an election outcome.

The case against the Swiftboat group -- which financed attention-getting ads accusing Democratic presidential nominee John F. Kerry of lying about his Vietnam War record, without substantiating its claims -- involved what the FEC termed the group's illegal collection of more than $12.5 million in personal contributions above the $5,000 annual limit, and $715,050 in prohibited corporate contributions.

The group raised a total of $25 million for the 2004 campaign, and the FEC fine of $299,500 amounted to 1 percent of its revenue.

Retired Rear Adm. Roy Hoffmann, the group's founder, said, "It is far better to end this legal confrontation now rather than continue a costly battle against government bureaucrats in an area where the law is unconscionably vague." He said the group has ceased political activity for now but may register with the FEC in the future to "re-engage in voter education."

DOJ_NMG_0106319

The MoveOn.org Voter Fund raised $21 million to spend against President Bush in 2004, including more than $2.5 million from investor George Soros. It was fined $150,000. MoveOn official Wes Boyd welcomed the decision, saying that "if this means that the FEC is really pushing big money out of elections, it's good for democracy." The group said it halted its collection of funds from large donors after the 2004 election.

Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.), a co-sponsor of the 2002 campaign reform law, said the FEC fine levied against the Swiftboat group "means little" because it was so late. He added that if the FEC does not write new regulations, "then Congress or the courts will have to force the FEC to act."

Mutual-Fund Group Balances Its Political Books (WP)

By Judy Sarasohn

The Washington Post, December 14, 2006

What a difference a midterm election makes -- or so it seems at some firms and trade groups scurrying to bolster their bipartisan credentials. But the folks at the Investment Company Institute, the trade association for the mutual fund industry, say their recent Democratic hire just maintains the status quo.

ICI snagged James R. Hart, a 30-year veteran of the Hill and most recently chief of staff to Rep. Carolyn McCarthy (D-N.Y.). He's the group's new political affairs officer and will also be involved in lobbying. He succeeds Democrat Vivian Lausevic, who moved over to the American Gas Association.

The hiring of Hart raised some eyebrows, because the ICI in 2003 was subject to some mighty political pressure from Rep. Michael G. Oxley (R-Ohio), chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, to replace Democrat Julie Domenick, then executive vice president, with a Republican.

ICI never ousted Domenick, though it did hire Daniel F. C. Crowley, earlier general counsel to House speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.), as chief government affairs officer. Domenick eventually left to join a Republican-led firm, but the ICI has been a client of hers since 2004 and remains so, now that she recently opened her own shop, Multiple Strategies.

Crowley said in an interview yesterday that the government affairs office is bipartisan: three Republicans and three Democrats. He said ICI had started talking to Hart before the election.

"My role is not to support the majority," Crowley said, "but to be able to put together a majority of support for our issues -- and bipartisanship is a requirement."Limits to Divine Intervention

Law firms and lobby shops like to sign up big names from the administration and Capitol Hill. The higher up, the more access and influence one at least appears to have. There is a problem: Such higher-ups are barred by ethics rules from lobbying or contacting former colleagues for a year.

Robert C. Divine has left his job as U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services chief counsel -- he also served as acting director and acting deputy director -- and rejoined Baker, Donelson, Bearman, Caldwell & Berkowitz law firm, but he foresees no problem with the ban. Divine said the one-year "cooling off period" doesn't apply to him because he voluntarily avoided the salary levels that triggers it. He is still covered by restrictions on matters he was directly involved in and confidential information.

"I am truly grateful for the unexpected opportunity to serve among the impressive men and women in USCIS and related agencies. But immigration law is what I did for 18 years before I entered government," he said in a statement. "I could not afford to leave government and then be unable to work for a year."

Divine, who is leading the firm's immigration group, said in an interview that his decision cost him $5,000 to $10,000 a year. The trigger amount for an administration official, he said, was $142,898, as of January 2006.

Forgoing the money and avoiding the trigger "really allows people like me who are technical experts to work for the government," he said.Steptoe Children

The merger of law firms Collier Shannon Scott and Kelley Drye & Warren earlier this year sent a group of lawyers and lobbyists from Collier Shannon looking for a new home because of a client conflict.

The Scott Group represents retailers concerned about the fees they have to pay banks on credit card transactions. Kelley Drye represents J.P. Morgan. (The merged firm in Washington is Kelley Drye Collier Shannon.)

DOJ_NMG_0106320

The Scott Group, which includes former representative Thomas J. Bliley Jr. (R-Va.), just landed at Steptoe & Johnson, a D.C. law firm that has a respectable regulatory practice but isn't known for a big legislative practice -- a point in its favor, said Douglas S. Kantor, a Scott Group member and a Department of Housing and Urban Development official in the Clinton administration.

But Steptoe folks "know and understand Washington and how the legislative function fits in," Kantor said.

Steptoe Chairman Roger Warin said members of the group are strong professionally and known for "substance and strategy, rather than just influence peddling."

Other members of the Scott Group include: Scott A. Sinder, former member of the executive committee of Collier Shannon; James D. Barnette, former general counsel of the House Energy and Commerce Committee; Leslie Belcher, former chief of staff to Rep. Tom Cole (R-Okla.); Suzie Brewster, a lobbyist for more than two decades whose husband is former representative Bill Brewster (D-Okla.); R. Timothy Columbus, chairman of the government relations practice at Collier Shannon; and John P. Fielding, former senior counsel at the National Association of Insurance Commissioners.Here and There

Also moving about town . . . Health-care specialist Stephen J. Northrup has joined Arent Fox in the law firm's government relations group. He most recently was health policy director for the Senate Committee on Health, Education, Labor and Pensions.

Democratic strategist and lobbyist Steve Elmendorf has set out on his own, forming Elmendorf Strategies, after a stint at law firm Bryan Cave. Like the Scott Group, Elmendorf ran into client-conflict issues. He would have been prevented from representing a coalition of companies with patent issues because of a conflict with a Bryan Cave client. Joining him from Bryan Cave: Kristi Kennedy and Jessica McEwen.

Gail MacKinnon, senior vice president for government relations at the National Cable and Telecommunications Association, is leaving for Time Warner Inc., where she will be senior vice president for global public policy. Succeeding her will be Steve Vest, a vice president there, who earlier worked for Bracewell & Giuliani and then-House member Bill Richardson (D-N.M.).

U.S. Aims To Move Beyond Rhetoric (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, December 14, 2006

Top U.S. negotiator Christopher Hill said yesterday that he will push for "measurable, concrete progress" to end North Korea's nuclear weapons programs when regional talks resume this weekend in Beijing after a break of more than a year.

Just over two months after Pyongyang stunned the world by conducting its first nuclear test, Mr. Hill said in a State Department briefing that China has offered the United States "unprecedented cooperation" in recent weeks in pressing the North to return to the stalled "six-party talks."

Both China and the United States have talked directly with North Korean diplomats about reviving the talks, and both Beijing and Washington reject the idea that North Korea's Oct. 9 nuclear test has given the isolated communist nation permanent status as a "nuclear power."

"The Chinese have also been in direct contact with the North Koreans on several occasions, and they also have reason to believe that we will see some specific ideas for moving ahead," said Mr. Hill, undersecretary of state of East Asian affairs.

Negotiators for the six countries -- the United States, China, North and South Korea, Japan and Russia -- are set to meet Sunday night in Beijing for the first time since Pyongyang's nuclear test. Mr. Hill said he anticipated this round of talks would last at least a week and he hoped to be home by Christmas.

But Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told reporters Tuesday that a deadline on the talks was not firm and that the goal remains the same: complete denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula.

DOJ_NMG_0106321

In a concession to Pyongyang, parallel U.S.-North Korea talks on U.S. financial sanctions against the North will begin at virtually the same time Sunday in Beijing. Pyongyang has harshly criticized the sanctions, which led to the freezing of millions of dollars in North Korean state accounts in a Chinese bank, and cited the sanctions as a reason to boycott the talks.

The financial talks will be kept separate from the six-party discussions, and a Treasury Department official will be the lead negotiator, Mr. Hill said.

He said his focus in Beijing will be to move beyond talking and to start implementing a joint accord reached in September 2005. That agreement committed the regime of North Korean leader Kim Jong-il to give up its military nuclear programs in exchange for economic aid and security guarantees.

Mr. Hill acknowledged that the North's nuclear test, which resulted in new U.N. sanctions against Pyongyang, had "done damage" to the six-party process, but said the United States and its allies were still insistent that the North honor the September 2005 statement in full.

"We need a sign that we have moved off the pages of the September agreement and on to the ground of the Korean Peninsula," he said.

Song Min-soon, South Korea's new foreign minister, also pressed the North to go beyond talking in the new round.

"I hope that the North will heed the importance of this opportunity and act in a way that will lead to visible steps," Mr. Song told reporters in Seoul.

Mr. Hill said he planned to stop in Japan and perhaps South Korea on his way to Beijing for the weekend talks.

Envoy Says U.S. Expects "concrete Progress" At Revived Nuclear Talks (AP)

AP, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON: The top U.S. envoy to next week's North Korean nuclear weapons negotiations said Wednesday that the United States wants "concrete progress" when diplomats from six nations convene in Beijing.

Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said "the purpose of the six-party talks is not to talk." The goal, he said, is to implement a September 2005 agreement in which the North pledged to scrap its pursuit of nuclear technology in exchange for energy and aid.

"We are indeed looking for measurable progress" in the talks, Hill told reporters. "We need concrete progress."

He said it had not been determined how long the round will last, but that talks would begin Sunday night and he would spend next week in Beijing. Hill said he would be meeting over the weekend with his negotiating counterparts, including the North Korean delegate. The other countries involved are South Korea, Japan, Russia and China.

Hill said cooperation with the Chinese in preparation for the meeting has been "unprecedented."

North Korea Appears Serious About Denuclearization Talks: US (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, December 14, 2006

North Korea has indicated it is ready to "deal in specifics" about giving up its newly proven nuclear arsenal when it returns to six-party disarmament negotiations next week in Beijing, the top US negotiator said.

But Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill predicted "very tough negotiations" when the talks resume at the weekend after a 13-month break and said there were no guarantees the process would achieve its goal of convincing North Korea to dismantle its nuclear weapons program.

"At this point I can't tell you if that strategic choice has been made or not," said Hill, who has held two rounds of preliminary talks with the North Koreans since they agreed to return to the negotiating table after carrying out their first test of a nuclear bomb on October 9.

Hill told reporters that during one round of meetings on November 27 and 28 in Beijing, "there were indications that the DPRK, the North Koreans, would be prepared to deal in specifics at the coming round."

"The Chinese have also been in direct contact with the North Koreans on several occasions, and they also have reason to believe that we will see some specific ideas for moving ahead," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0106322

Hill declined to provide any details of what specific steps the US and its allies would demand of North Korea or what incentives they would offer during the negotiations.

But he stressed that Washington would not allow the talks to drag on while North Korea pursues its nuclear program.

"It's our very strong view that in this first round, which starts over the weekend, we want to show some significant progress."

The six-party talks -- involving China, Japan, North Korea, South Korea, Russia and the United States -- started in 2003 to stop Pyongyang from acquiring nuclear weapons.

North Korea signed on to a vaguely worded joint statement in September 2005, pledging to give up its nuclear ambitions in return for security guarantees, energy assistance and improved relations with the West.

But North Korea pulled out two months later, apparently to protest US sanctions imposed on a Macau-based bank, Banco Delta Asia, for allegedly laundering money and circulating counterfeit US 100 dollar bills on behalf of the cash-strapped communist Pyongyang regime.

It then conducted its first nuclear test, triggering global condemnation -- including from closest ally China -- and unprecedented sanctions agreed by the United Nations.

Hill said China's pressure was a critical element in North Korea's decision to resume negotiations and that Washington's and Beijing's goals in the talks "are pretty close to identical -- complete denuclearization" of the Korean peninsula.

"We need concrete progress. We need a sign that we have moved off of the pages of the September agreement and on to the ground of the Korean peninsula," he said.

The US diplomat said it was not clear if North Korea's notoriously unpredictable leadership agreed to resume talks due of the bite of UN sanctions or "because they have exploded a nuclear device and they feel very strong as a result of that".

But Hill said he had made clear to the North Koreans already that "we do not consider them a nuclear power and we will not consider them a nuclear power."

The UN sanctions, which include a trade embargo on nuclear and weapons-related material and luxury goods, will remain in place during the negotiations, he said.

But in a concession to Pyongyang, the US has agreed to hold simultaneous discussions in Beijing on the Banco Delta Asia sanctions, he said.

A US Treasury official will lead those talks for Washington.

Hill said he would travel Friday to Tokyo for preparatory talks with the Japanese and could also visit Seoul before heading to Beijing, where informal talks will continue among all parties through the weekend prior to the formal start of negotiations on Monday.

"I'm not here to predict success or to express optimism, but I'll have a much better picture of that probably a week from now," he said.

Britain, Russia Report Progress In Bid To Agree UN Sanctions On Iran (AFP)

By Gerard Aziakou

AFP, December 14, 2006

Six major powers edged closer to agreeing UN sanctions against Iran over its refusal to halt sensitive nuclear fuel work, raising hopes that the Security Council could vote on a compromise package soon.

After a new round of informal talks on a sanctions draft resolution early Wednesday by envoys from the Security Council's five veto-wielding members -- Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States -- plus Germany, several participants emerged reasonably upbeat.

"We had a good meeting this morning. we made substantial progress," British Ambassador Emyr Jones Parry told reporters.

He expressed hope that a compromise text would be agreed on this week and that the full 15-member council "will vote as soon as possible after that."

Western diplomats say they expect passage of the resolution by Christmas.

France's UN envoy Jean-Marc de La Sabliere also spoke of "progress" following amendments presented by Russia and the United States to a revised European draft drawn up by France, Britain and Germany.

DOJ_NMG_0106323

"Important matters of principle have basically been agreed," Russian Ambassador Vitaly Churkin said.

While there were still differences on some issues, including a proposed travel ban on officials directly involved in Iran's nuclear and ballistic missile programs, the six powers now "have a basic understanding that we should be focusing on uranium enrichment, chemical reprocessing, heavy water projects and nuclear delivery systems," he added.

The European draft would mandate a ban on trade with Iran on goods related to its nuclear and ballistic missile programs and impose financial and travel restrictions on persons and entities involved.

Jones Parry said nuclear experts of the council would go over the text Thursday morning while envoys of the six major powers would take it up again later that day.

In the meantime, the amendments and the comments made during Wednesday's session would be forwarded to the envoys' respective capitals, he added.

Churkin for his part described the text as "very positive," "even tough there are certain restrictions on activities which we are concerned about."

In Washington, the State Department described amendments put forward by US deputy UN representative Alejandro Wolff as "tweaks."

Churkin hailed on Monday the European changes to the draft but objected to the proposed travel ban on officials linked to Tehran's nuclear and missile programs.

The text contains in its annex a list of 12 officials targeted for a travel ban, including some associated with the Natanz nuclear fuel processing facility and with the heavy-water reactor Iran is building in Arak, as well as Iran's Revolutionary Guards chief General Yahya Rahim Safavi.

It dropped, however, all references in the draft to Iran's first nuclear power station, a one-billion-dollar facility that Russia is helping to build in Bushehr.

Meanwhile Iran's Supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei vowed Wednesday that the Islamic Republic would make further progress in its nuclear program despite the objections of world powers, state television reported.

Tehran has consistently rejected UN demands that it halt uranium enrichment, a process which can provide fuel for nuclear reactors but also, in highly refined form, material for the core of a nuclear bomb.

In The Hague, former UN chief weapons inspector Hans Blix said Wednesday that giving security guarantees to Iran could help persuade Tehran to scale down its nuclear ambitions and freeze uranium enrichment.

"To avoid Iran going for enrichment, one must go into the concerns they have ... they might be concerned by an attack of the US," Blix told journalists.

Blix is now chairman of the Weapons of Mass Destruction Commission (WMDC), an independent body that works to limit the dangers posed by WMD.

The West claims Iran is running a secret nuclear military program parallel to its civilian one, an allegation strongly denied by Tehran which says its nuclear ambitions are entirely peaceful and aimed at producing electricity.

Iran Nukes Prompt Concerns Within Mideast (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

Christian Science Monitor, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON

Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad boasts that world powers are getting weak knees about stopping his country's nuclear program.

Is the fiery leader right?

The United Nations Security Council is considering a watered-down resolution of sanctions aimed at punishing Iran for pursuing its uranium- enrichment program - a process that could lead to development of a nuclear weapon. But with the United States seemingly occupied with Iraq, and with Russia and China still balking at any action that would suggest "humiliation" of a valued trade partner, doubts are rising over how much the Europe-sponsored resolution will be worth.

DOJ_NMG_0106324

"Nothing has changed for the better with respect to this resolution and what it says about determination to stop a very dangerous scenario before it gets out of control," says Gal Luft, codirector of the Institute for the Analysis of Global Security in Washington. "The Iranians are moving ahead. The world is acting in ways that reduce the chance of having a real impact on that - and countries in the region are taking note of both."

Indeed, as prospects wane for tough international action against Iran, some countries in the region are expressing alarm at the pace of Tehran's progress toward mastery of the nuclear cycle. And they seem to be saying, "If the international community is not going to do something about it, we will." Such an attitude is raising fears of a Middle East arms race.

Noting that Saudi Arabia and other Gulf countries announced over the weekend their interest in developing a cooperative nuclear-energy program, former Middle East negotiator Dennis Ross said, "Who is that message for? Let me tell you, it's not for Iran. It was for us."

Ambassador Ross, now at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, also said at an event Tuesday that the Saudis are telling the US, "Stop them - or that [nuclear power] is the way we go, too."

The regional warnings on Iran come amid reports that the Saudis have also warned the US that they might be compelled to enter on the side of the Sunnis in any Iraq that the US had abandoned to civil war.

The countries that make up the Gulf Cooperation Council are Sunni powers expressing concerns over the rise of Shiite Iran, Mr. Luft says, which adds one more worrisome ripple to the signs of growing Sunni-Shiite tensions in Iraq and Lebanon. "They are saying that if there is to be a Shiite bomb, then they will need a Sunni bomb to counterbalance it," he says. "They don't want that, but if their neighbor Iran goes nuclear in this climate of deepening Shiite-Sunni divisions, they don't see how they could sit aside and not match it."

The Security Council draft resolution circulated this week by France, Britain, and Germany forgoes the proposed blanket sanctions against Iran that drew a Russian rebuff. Instead, it outlines sanctions focused on the country's uranium-enrichment process - targeting Iran's atomic-energy agency, facilities involved in the uranium-enrichment program, and individuals and companies associated with the program.

The resolution removes any reference to Iran's first nuclear power plant at Bushehr, while focusing on a pilot enrichment facility at Natanz. That change satisfies one Russian demand, but Russian officials have held out for additional changes.

If the resolution is passed by the Security Council before the end of the year, as some diplomats expect, it would be nine months after the international community first demanded that Iran cease its uranium enrichment or face tough trade and financial sanctions. By early next year, it will have been two years since the Bush administration deferred to European diplomacy to try to halt a program that Mr. Ahmadinejad says is purely peaceful but that European officials have concluded is designed to deliver nuclear weapons.

Some analysts say the US is so preoccupied with Iraq - and tied up in debate over whether it should engage Iran in diplomatic efforts to stabilize Iraq - that it has weakened its determination to stop a nuclear-armed Iran from emerging. They note that the resignation of John Bolton, US ambassador to the UN, who is a fierce opponent of nuclear proliferation to dangerous "rogue states," has lowered the US profile in the struggle with Iran at a crucial moment.

Others note that while the US goes along with diplomatic efforts to curtail Iran's nuclear progress, President Bush continues to insist that "no options are off the table" in terms of guaranteeing that Iran never develops the bomb. They speculate that if Iran continues its nuclear march, the US could take military action to at least seriously damage its program before the end of Mr. Bush's term, claiming it had favored diplomatic action until the risk dictated another course.

In the meantime, Iran claims it has neared mastery of the nuclear cycle, from mining of uranium ore to its enrichment into fuel for nuclear facilities. Last weekend, Ahmadinejad announced his country had "begun" the installation of 3,000 centrifuges - which, if true, could be a major step toward large-scale uranium enrichment. He used the announcement to needle his international opponents, crowing that "resistance of the Iranian nation" has spurred the nuclear progress, even while forcing the world "to retreat tens of steps over Iran's nuclear issue," according to Iran's Fars news agency.

Nuclear experts say it is hard to say how much of this is "bluster" or to what degree it reflects real progress in the Iranian program. "A lot depends on what a phrase like 'beginning to install' really means," says David Kay, a security specialist at the Potomac Institute in Arlington, Va. "I don't think anyone would say they are 'mastering the fuel cycle,' which was another of [Ahmadinejad's] claims."

Mr. Kay notes, for example, that what is known about Iran's initial centrifuge "cascade," as the high-speed facility allowing uranium enrichment is called, suggests "they are still at a very, very preliminary stage" in their capabilities. "From what we hear the facility is down as much as it is up," he says. All this suggests Iran is still at least four years away from the ability to build a bomb, he says.

Yet as rudimentary as the program may still be, Luft says Iran is taking important but little-noticed steps to weather even weakened international sanctions. In a new report, his institute says Iran is acting to address its "Achilles' heel" - its lack of gasoline-refining capacity - by expediting construction of two new refineries, signing gasoline import contracts with "friendly countries" like Venezuela, and undertaking a crash conversion program to convert 1.2 million vehicles a year from gasoline to natural gas. Iran has the world's second-largest natural-gas reserve.

"They are taking all kinds of innovative measures, and showing by the high priority they are giving these measures that they do not intend to change course and capitulate on their nuclear program," Luft says. "It's become a matter of national pride."

In a similar way, he says that the Gulf countries are not talking about a nuclear program for energy reasons - but with national security in mind. "If you sit on top of the world's biggest pile of oil and gas, the last thing you need is nuclear energy," he says. "They would be doing this for security interests, not for energy."

Move To Charge Ahmadi-Nejad Over Israel Remarks (FT)

By Mark Turner

Financial Times, December 14, 2006

In one of his first acts since leaving his post as US ambassador to the United Nations, John Bolton will on Thursday call for legal proceedings against Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad for incitement to genocide.

Mr Bolton will join Dore Gold, a former Israeli ambassador to the UN, Irwin Cotler, a former Canadian attorney-general, and Nobel peace prize winner Elie Wiesel in claims that a series of public statements against Israel constitute a crime under the Genocide Convention.

The call comes amid growing pressure on the US to start talks with Iran about Iraq, but also amid international criticism of a conference in Tehran questioning the Holocaust. A 68-page study produced by the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs, and the International Association of Jewish Lawyers and Jurists, argues that Mr Ahmadi-Nejad's declaration that "Israel should be wiped off the map" is part of a hate campaign punishable under international law.

A series of remarks by Mr Ahmadi-Nejad, including one in which he reportedly questioned whether Zionists were human beings, "constitute direct and public incitement to genocide", the study alleges. While reminiscent of incitement before the Rwanda genocide, "the critical difference is that while the Hutus in Rwanda were equipped with machetes, Iran, should the international community do nothing to prevent it, will soon acquire nuclear weapons," it says.

Mr Gold told the FT that while "most people think of [legal proceedings against] genocide in terms of setting up tribunals after the crime has been committed", the challenge was to stop genocide before it begins.

"The question is, what specifically can be done? Let the Security Council meet and discuss the issue," he said.

The Iranian mission to the UN dismissed the call as "a propaganda move, and an act without any substance. The international court of justice should give every priority to the real genocide of Palestinian people by Israeli leaders". Earlier this year, visiting the UN, Mr Ahmadi-Nejad said his fight was not with Jews but with Zionists.

Juan Mendez, the UN's special adviser on the prevention of genocide, said he did not plan to take any official action over the remarks because his job was to help vulnerable populations that could not defend themselves.

"But that doesn't mean I don't consider them serious and grave," he said. "Expressions of hate speech, especially in the context of an ability to act on them, are certainly one of the warning signs we look for."

Deep Roots Of Denial For Iran's True Believer (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, December 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0106326

CAIRO, Dec. 13 — Iran's so-called Holocaust conference this week was billed as a chance to force the West to reconsider the historical record and, thereby, the legitimacy of Israel. But why would the Iranians invite speakers with so little credibility in the West, including a former Ku Klux Klan grand wizard and disgraced European scholars?

That question misses the point. Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, portrays participants like David Duke, the former Louisiana Klan leader, and Robert Faurisson of France, who has devoted his life to trying to prove that the Nazi gas chambers were a myth, as silenced truth-tellers whose stories expose Western leaders as the hypocrites he considers them to be.

Just as Soviet leaders used to invite Americans who suffered racial or political discrimination to Moscow to embarrass Washington, Mr. Ahmadinejad seems to enjoy pointing out that countries like Germany, France and Austria claim to champion free debate yet have made Holocaust denial illegal.

He has also repeatedly tried to draw a moral equivalency between questioning the Holocaust and the decision in Europe last year to publish cartoons lampooning the Prophet Muhammad. It wins him favor at home and across the Arab world for standing up to the West and allows him to present himself as morally superior to the West.

But there is another important point. Mr. Ahmadinejad actually seems to believe that the volumes of documentation, testimony and living memory of the Nazi genocide are at best exaggerated and part of a Zionist conspiracy to falsify history so as to create the case for Israel. As a former member of the Revolutionary Guards, he was indoctrinated with such thinking, a political analyst in Tehran said, and as a radical student leader, he championed such a view.

Now he has a platform to promote the theories — and to try to position himself regionally as the reasonable man who is asking hard questions.

The two-day meeting included no attempt to come to terms with the nature of the well-documented Nazi slaughter, offering only a platform to those pursuing the fantasy that it never happened. In addition, the organizers of the conference, a small circle around the president, have been building ties with neo-Nazi groups in Europe.

"He is connected to people in Iran who trust his way of doing things and who seriously believe the Holocaust did not take place," said Martin Ebbing, a German journalist in Tehran who has closely followed the president. "They seriously believe it."

Evidence of that came in a revealing interview last May with the German magazine Der Spiegel. The interviewer mostly wanted to discuss Iran's nuclear ambitions and the government's refusal to give up uranium enrichment, but the discussion kept returning to the Holocaust. At one point, the exasperated interviewer actually lectured the Iranian president on Germany's culpability.

"In our view, there is no doubt that the Germans — unfortunately — bear the guilt for the murder of six million," the interviewer said to Mr. Ahmadinejad.

The president gave little ground, saying Germans should rid themselves of such guilt. "I will only accept something as truth if I am actually convinced of it," he said.

Across the Middle East, contempt for Jews and Zionism is widespread and utterly mainstream. Many say the Holocaust has been wildly exaggerated and used to justify the creation of the Jewish state in 1948 at the expense of Palestinians, a move viewed as yet another example of Western imperialism.

Anti-Western rage fueled the 1979 Iranian revolution, and Mr. Ahmadinejad has tried to rekindle its energy by spreading Iran's influence beyond its borders. Battling Washington, chiding Arab leaders and claiming to promote the Palestinian cause have made him extremely popular on the streets from Cairo to Morocco.

Such actions have also helped turn attention away from his inability so far to deliver on promises of economic populism, including a redistribution of wealth and greater social justice for the bulk of the country that is struggling to make ends meet.

The president's ideas do not resonate in all corners of Iran, though, and some political scientists there say they have embarrassed officials who, even if they agree, do not want to see a focus on Holocaust denial further isolate Iran from Europe.

"I raise two questions about this conference," said Ahmad Shirzad, a reformist politician and former legislator. "First, how much does this solve the problems our people are faced with? And secondly, which one of our goals were realized? It looks like he wants to make news and do provocative things."

Others see an even more ambitious post-Iraq agenda reflected in Mr. Ahmadinejad's high profile on the issues of Jews, the Holocaust and Israel.

DOJ_NMG_0106327

"It is for public consumption in Arab countries," said Mustafa El-Labbad, editor of Sharqnameh, a magazine specializing in Iranian affairs and published in Cairo. "It is specifically directed toward deepening the gap between the people and their regimes and toward embarrassing the rulers so that the regional power vacuum, especially after Iraq, can be filled by Iran."

Iran's President Faces Test Of His Support In Elections (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, December 14, 2006

TEHRAN, Dec. 13 — Iranians will go to the polls on Friday in elections that are expected to be a test of whether President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad still has the popular support that led to his victory 18 months ago.

The elections are for city councils around the country and for the 86-member Assembly of Experts. The Assembly has the power to replace the country's supreme leader, but since it selected Ayatollah Ali Khamenei for that position in 1989, it has been relatively inactive and meets only twice a year behind closed doors.

The city councils, on the other hand, exercise substantial political leverage, especially in the capital, Tehran. The councils appoint the mayors, who run the local governments and control the budgets.

The watchdog Guardian Council, which reviews applications to run for office, rejected 240 nominees out of 490 who initially registered to run for the Assembly of Experts. Others dropped out, and so only 140 candidates remain for the 86 seats, which are elected by district. Some districts are left only with one candidate running for the seat.

The council rejected many candidates who had a lenient stance toward reformers but also some who are affiliated with Ayatollah Mohammad Taqi Mesbah-Yazdi, a cleric who has often spoken against democracy.

Mr. Mesbah-Yazdi and a group of his supporters were running against Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, a former president and pragmatic politician, in the hope of dominating the assembly, which is considered less likely now.

In the Tehran city elections, a slate affiliated with Mr. Ahmadinejad whose name roughly translates as the Good Scent of Service (even Iranians are puzzled by the title) is running against other radicals who have been sidelined by Mr. Ahamdiejad and against reformist politicians who are trying to make a comeback after three major defeats in the past three years.

Members of the slate allied with the president had called on their supporters to vote for those close to Mr. Mesbah-Yazdi, the radical cleric, in the Assembly of Expert elections. The group is led by a young former leader of the Basij Militia force, Mehrdad Bazrpash, and the sister of the president is a member.

Analysts say the group has a chance of winning if the turnout is low. The turnout in the last city elections in Tehran, in 2003, was only 12 percent after voters who had brought the reformists to power stayed home when they concluded that the reformists had failed in their efforts to create a more open society. That led to victory for the radicals. They appointed Mr. Ahmadinejad, then an unknown figure in Iran's politics, as mayor and then nominated him for president.

Mr. Ahmadinejad has cracked down on civil liberties since his election, and his fiery speeches and uncompromising foreign policy on such issues as the country's nuclear program is causing the country to face possible sanctions. He also has failed to deliver on his promise of improving people's economic status, experts say.

Reformists are appealing to their supporters to vote in an effort to slow down his radical policies.

"This election can be a way for us to find our place in the government again and to try to moderate the situation," said Ali Nozarpour, one of the reformist candidates for the Assembly. "We are telling people that if they don't vote, they will let a minority to decide for them."

Enthusiasm over the election appears to be increasing as the reformists have intensified their campaign at universities and around the city. On Wednesday, 20 local candidates spent time talking to people on the streets of Tehran to persuade them to vote.

"A lot of students are saying that they will vote for the reformers," said Sajad Ghoroghi, a graduate student at Amir Kabir University who has decided to vote despite his disillusionment with the reformists.

"Voting does not mean that we approve of what the reformers did during the eight years they were in power," he said. "We want to vote to stop the current situation."

DOJ_NMG_0106328

The other major group running against the president's allies in Tehran is a radical group that supports the current mayor, Mohammad Baqer Qalibaf, who also ran against Mr. Ahmadinejad in the presidential election last year..

The radicals initially said they would join to create one slate against the reformists. But Mohammad Tavakoli, a radical member of Parliament, said in a letter that was posted on a Web site that the young supporters of Mr. Ahmadinejad refused to join a coalition with the more veteran radical politicians, the Iranian daily Aftab-e-Yazd reported.

"They say that they will definitely win and do not need to have a coalition with other groups," Mr. Tavakoli wrote, warning that such an attitude would damage Parliament's relations with the government of Mr. Ahmadinejad, where the more veteran group holds a substantial number of seats.

Another radical, Emad Afrough, expressed concern that the election could be rigged, the newspaper Etemad reported. This is the first time that the committee that supervises the election is controlled by the group in power.

"Rigging does not take place only when the votes are being counted," he was quoted as saying. "It can happened secretly in different ways."

Iran Province Looks To Everyday Issues In Polls (AFP)

By Aresu Eqbali

AFP, December 14, 2006

Conservative-reformist power struggles or foreign policy are far from the minds of the voters of Takestan, a dusty Iranian town whose inhabitants are more concerned with unemployment and the cost of living.

The streets of the town, whose name means "vineyard" and where grape-farming is the main industry, are underdeveloped and many people go about their business with little faith in political promises.

"Construction of houses, improvement of traffic infrastructure, green spaces, medical and educational centers" was how the town's governor, Ali Sadeghi Niaraki, outlined the town's priorities.

With youth unemployment rates still high, joblessness and wages are among the main concerns of people ahead of municipal elections on Friday -- if they believe their votes can make a difference.

"Takestan now is developing metal projects ... farmers today do not have only one job," the 48-year-old governor said.

"The number of candidates for this round of municipality elections is 52, with a 20 percent growth in the number of registered contenders," Niaraki proudly added.

The central street has been plastered by posters and banners of candidates from different groups including ultra-conservatives supporting the President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad as well as the reformists.

The oddly similar surnames of candidates -- there are lots of Rahmanis and Rahman-Dousts on the posters -- makes it look like a tribal battle rather than political elections.

"I am the mother of three young men at a rented home. They need jobs, they want to raise a family, but we simply cannot afford it," said Moloud Mardi, 49.

"So, what is the difference who wins the city council when we see they will not do anything about the problems?" asked Moloud Mardi, 49.

"Now that they need us to vote they promise many things, but we have not seen any action from them yet," she said, vowing not to go near the polling stations.

A group of street-sellers on unbuilt land in downtown begged to differ.

"The councils take care of people's problems, they can build schools and streets. It does not matter whom we vote for in which elections. It is important to vote to make the country proud," said Khosh Ghadam Eskandari, 34, mother of two teenagers and a young boy.

She was faced by quick objections from a neighbouring vendor who deals in second-hand teddy bears and dolls.

"I am not happy with my income. Their promises are just words. We only vote because we need to have the (electoral) stamp on our papers in order not to get into trouble," complained Abu Bakr Rasti, 31.

A Peugeot 405 limousine parked in the main street, plastered with the pictures of the sole female candidate for the town's council, was one of the main attractions of the afternoon.

DOJ_NMG_0106329

Maryam Taherkhani, 25, has become a municipality candidate because she believed "at least one woman should be sitting in the council among the other male members to take care of order and cleanliness".

"Building green spaces and movie theaters are the things that we need," she said.

Despite her bizarrely luxurious campaign limousine, she considered her town as "deprived, with jobless youths" -- one of Iran's most persistent economic problems.

"I do not know about elections that much. We may vote however, even though they do not do anything for the town," said a 28-year-old farmer, Karam Ardebili while spreading oil seed around his inherited land.

"Reformists" and "conservatives" sounded to him very important things that he said he had nothing to do with.

"I am happy with my income but I would ask for loans to rent fields," the married man with one child said, adding that he honestly only cared about his agricultural job and nothing more.

Hezbollah Out To Develop New `cold War,' Some Say (MCT)

By Tom Lasseter

McClatchy Newspapers, December 14, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon - For most Americans, the standoff between the militant Shiite Muslim group Hezbollah and Lebanon's government may look like inside politics in a country that's barely big enough to contain its name on most world maps.

But Hezbollah's two-week-old siege of Prime Minister Fuad Saniora's administration is, in many ways, a test of U.S. power and credibility in the Middle East at a time when the Bush administration is struggling to regain the offensive in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Analysts, Lebanese leaders and Western diplomats agree that the crisis is an outgrowth of a developing showdown between the United States, which backs Saniora, and Syria and Iran, which support Hezbollah.

"Because Lebanon doesn't count in anybody's equation, it is the perfect place to use it as a cold war arena; there is a cold war in the Middle East now," said Timur Goksel, who was a longtime senior adviser to the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon until 2003. "I think Hezbollah is being drawn into this cold war ... they are taking sides."

That cold war can be seen across the region. In Iraq, Syria and Iran are helping forces aligned against U.S. troops. In the Palestinian-Israeli conflict, Iran has pledged millions to help the Hamas-led Palestinian government - which the United States and Europe have cut off - and Syria continues to support Hamas and several Palestinian terrorist groups.

The fight is complex: The United States wants to stop the tide of Iranian Shiite power from destabilizing oil-rich Sunni Arab countries with significant Shiite populations, such as Kuwait, Bahrain and Saudi Arabia. The government of Saudi Arabia, in particular, has grown anxious about the ascent of Iranian influence in the region.

At the same time, however, American officials are seeking ways to curb the violence in Iraq by bolstering the Iranian-backed Shiite government there, which U.S.-sponsored popular elections brought to power.

As the United States has been pushed and pulled by the region's problems, what some U.S. officials believed was an invincible American empire has begun to look weaker to some in the Middle East.

Top Hezbollah officials have made no secret of thinking that America is stretched too thin to stop them.

"What can America offer you?" Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah said via video link to a huge crowd of demonstrators last week in Beirut. "It is sinking in the mud of Iraq and Afghanistan and Palestine."

A Western diplomat based in Beirut said Hezbollah officials had made their intentions clear by constantly pairing Saniora with U.S. Ambassador Jeffrey Feltman in their speeches.

"Why are they using this rhetoric of saying, `The Feltman government'? Why are they saying Saniora's a U.S. agent?" said the diplomat, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the subject. "It's because they want to be able to deliver the United States a strategic defeat in Lebanon. Because they see the problems in Afghanistan, they see the problems in Iraq, they see no progress in Palestine and they want to be able to play the defeat of the Saniora government ... as a defeat of the United States."

Hezbollah leaders counter that the United States, facing setbacks in Iraq, is seeking to use Lebanon as a base from which to shape Middle East politics.

DOJ_NMG_0106330

"Their main enemy in Lebanon is Hezbollah. They want to get rid of Hezbollah and use it (Lebanon) as a bridge to other goals," Hezbollah spokesman Hussein Rahal said. "They want to begin in Lebanon, then Palestine, then Syria and then Iran."

Another Western official, who also asked not to be identified, conceded that "what has happened in the region is not exactly as we envisioned it; I think it underscores the importance that Lebanon survives as a democratic state."

Hezbollah assertions that Saniora is a U.S. puppet are incorrect, the official said.

"That coming from the force that is on the payroll of Iran, that receives a large amount of arms from Iran, that's just laughable," the official said. "It's a cheap emotional trick to paint this as a fight against American hegemony."

Many Lebanese Sunnis and Christians say that Hezbollah and the Saniora government are being disingenuous when they accuse the other side of being too closely tied to foreign powers.

"In our view, both of them are tied to outside political axes of some sort," said Osman Bakhach, a spokesman for the Liberation Party, a fundamentalist Sunni political group that calls for establishing an Islamic caliphate and opposes the United States and Hezbollah.

Emil Moukarzel, a spokesman for the Lebanese Forces, agreed. His organization, which is one of the main Christian groups in Lebanon and played a major role as a militia in the country's 1975-90 civil war, is pro-Western but has tried to remain outside the current conflict.

"The major war here is between the United States and Iran," he said.

Hezbollah and its allies began massing demonstrators in front of the main government building on Dec.1. They demanded that Saniora either give Hezbollah enough Cabinet seats to dissolve the government, or scrap the government immediately and begin anew, presumably with Hezbollah and its allies at the fore. The crowds outside the government center have ebbed and flowed, but they've never numbered fewer than tens of thousands.

Hezbollah officials said they'd summoned the demonstrators after concluding that Saniora had sided with the United States during last summer's Israeli military campaign - which devastated Shiite villages in south Lebanon - and watching while the prime minister pushed for a tribunal that the militant group believed would target Syria, one of its main backers.

"We cannot leave this government to lead the country to this fate, of following the Americans," said Mohammed Fneish, a Hezbollah member who resigned from the Saniora Cabinet last month along with five other militia members and allies. "The main issue is the Americans want to keep this government in power because they can control them."

The Western diplomat in Beirut said that for the Bush White House, Lebanon had acquired the image "of the heroic democratic country" in a way reminiscent of how the Reagan White House viewed "captive nations" such as Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia during the Cold War with the Soviet Union.

"It became impossible for anyone to suggest that we should be just accepting their incorporation into the Soviet empire," the diplomat said. "Lebanon has almost become like that."

Lebanese Government Issues Own Warning (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

The Washington Post, December 14, 2006

BEIRUT, Dec. 13 -- For years, Fouad Siniora was a man of numbers more than rhetoric, as a banker, finance minister and friend to Rafiq al-Hariri, the billionaire former prime minister assassinated last year. This week, he stood before a crowd that included more than 1,800 women at his barricaded government headquarters, more populist than pragmatist, more agitator than accountant.

"Victory to Lebanon!" the prime minister shouted, jabbing his fists into the air and playing to a boisterous crowd.

Women from the southern town of Sidon surged forward, some holding signs reading, "You make us proud." Others pushed at his guards, straining for a view. In occasional moments of bedlam, youths climbed atop chairs: "God be with you, Siniora!"

In the test of wills that Lebanon's crisis has become, the government is playing a game of perceptions. Ministers insist it is business as usual, while in almost daily scenes, busloads of supporters from elsewhere in Lebanon are ferried to the stately Serail, as Siniora's headquarters is known. The government, in sometimes blunt ways, is mobilizing its sectarian constituencies -- usually Sunni Muslim -- as a veiled warning to Hezbollah and its Shiite Muslim followers not to go too far in a campaign the government's supporters variously portray as a coup d'etat, an attempt to grab power for the Shiite community or a ploy to deliver leverage here to Iran and Syria.

"I suppose they did not expect our resistance as a government, and they did not expect the passionate reaction of the Lebanese people, especially the Sunni reaction," said Nayla Moawad, the social affairs minister.

For nearly two weeks, thousands of supporters of Hezbollah and its allies have camped at the foot of the Serail, pushing for a greater share of power in the cabinet or Siniora's resignation. Every few days, more barricades go up: a third coil of barbed wire and now spare tires stacked two high across the road. The camp itself -- sprawled across the downtown, now largely shuttered, that Hariri envisioned as his legacy -- is becoming more permanent. Under construction Wednesday was wood scaffolding around an outdoor latrine, near the doorstep of the libertine, now-closed Buddha Bar.

Since the demonstration staged Sunday by Hezbollah and its allies, one of the largest in Lebanese history, the crisis has entered a lull of sorts. Hezbollah and its allies have spoken vaguely of escalation, but all sides seem willing to give a chance to mediation underway by the Arab League and its secretary general, Amr Moussa.

Since October, Hezbollah and its supporters have sought one-third plus one of the seats in the cabinet, which would give them an effective veto over key decisions and allow them to force the government to resign at will. Siniora and his supporters have insisted on approval first of an international court to try Hariri's alleged killers. While Hezbollah has not publicly opposed it in principle, its ally Syria, blamed by government supporters for the assassination, has.

Other issues are still in the air: The government and its supporters want an election to replace President Emile Lahoud, a Syrian ally; Hezbollah and its allies want early parliamentary elections that they believe would deprive the government and its supporters of a majority.

"We'll deal with any Arab or local initiative very positively but on the basis of one-third-plus-one in the government," said Amin Sherri, a Hezbollah member of parliament.

The crisis is entrenched in a very Lebanese context, with its delicate communal balance. Hezbollah's foes have suggested that its leader, Hasan Nasrallah, has lost his standing in the Arab world by miring himself in a local political struggle; even Nasrallah felt the need to address the charge in a speech last week.

From the beginning of the crisis, the government itself has played sectarian politics as a way to slow Hezbollah's momentum, a game that even some of its supporters admit is dangerous. In an almost unprecedented move for a government traditionally built on sectarian consensus, the Sunni mufti, Mohammed Rashid Kabbani, led Friday prayers at the Serail on Dec. 1, the first day of Hezbollah's protests, when hundreds of thousands of Hezbollah's supporters converged on downtown. At the time, he called toppling the Sunni-led government an uncrossable "red line." Loyalists of Hariri's son, Saad, have organized rallies in the country's Sunni strongholds: Tripoli, the northern Lebanese region of Akkar and parts of the Bekaa Valley in the northeast.

For the past week, the government has brought delegations of mainly Sunnis but also Christians and Druze to the Serail for revival-like rallies and receptions in which Siniora has tried to shed his technocratic image.

"With our soul, with our blood, we sacrifice for you, Siniora," the women from Sidon shouted Tuesday.

In a conservative dark blue suit, Siniora entered the room of marble floors and chandeliers to a rapturous standing ovation. He shook hands, kissed babies, raised his hands into the air. At times a bit awkward, he still tried to seize the moment.

"The enemy is there on the border," he said, a reference to Israel, as he jabbed his finger. "The enemy is not in the streets of Beirut. We don't have to dig trenches among the Lebanese in the streets! We want to build bridges!"

Government officials are reluctant to talk publicly about playing the sectarian card in a country that still bears scars from the 1975-90 civil war. They contend such appeals are more a response to Hezbollah's campaign than an initiative by government officials. But privately, they assert they have intimidated Hezbollah, which has mobilized its constituency but gone to great lengths to portray its campaign as a broad-based effort that includes substantial numbers of Christians loyal to Michel Aoun, a populist former general. There is a sense, too, among supporters of the government that Hezbollah is not prepared to escalate the conflict dramatically.

"They realize it's not possible to enter into what they want alone," said Nabil de Freige, a member of parliament and supporter of Siniora's government.

DOJ_NMG_0106332

At least for now, Hezbollah is signaling the same.

"We will not be provoked into where they are trying to take us," said Nawar Sahli, a Hezbollah parliament member.

Nearly two weeks into the crisis, the Serail remains businesslike; bouquets of flowers are freshly arranged next to an entrance for frequent convoys of cars with tinted windows. Several ministers, Moawad among them, have taken up residence there, fearing for their safety. Others walk the halls casually in suits, going ahead with cabinet meetings and sessions to prepare for a donors' conference next month in Paris to assist Lebanon's recovery from this summer's 33-day war with Israel.

"They may have thought we would be afraid and we would collapse immediately," Moawad said.

As she spoke, Hezbollah anthems blared from the protest below. "Oh, you most honorable people," the favorite goes.

But she added, "It is the future of Lebanon that is at stake."

Party Set To Accept Plan To End Crisis (WT)

By Sharon Behn

The Washington Times, December 14, 2006

A Lebanese official yesterday said the leading government party was ready to accept an Arab League package of political solutions to defuse the crisis paralyzing the country.

The Shi'ite Muslim group Hezbollah has tied up central Beirut for more than a week with huge street protests aimed at undermining the government of Prime Minister Fuad Siniora and gaining more political power.

Arab League leader Amr Moussa told reporters Tuesday that "progress has been made" toward a compromise resolution, but that all parties would have to make concessions for a consensus to be reached.

Amal Mudallali, a foreign policy adviser to parliamentary majority leader Saad Hariri, said the package would grant the opposition more seats in the Cabinet but leave it one short of the veto power demanded by Hezbollah.

The deal floated by the Arab League and accepted by the ruling anti-Syrian March 14 Alliance would assign 19 Cabinet positions to the governing party, 10 to an opposition comprising Hezbollah and the Christians led by Gen. Michel Aoun, and one to a political independent.

The deal also supports the establishment of an international tribunal to investigate the bombing murder of former Prime Minister Rafiq Hariri, the holding of early presidential elections and the formation of a new government.

"It has to be approved all at the same time," said Miss Mudallali. "Our position is, this is a comprehensive package to finish the current crisis. The political situation is such that it cannot afford much more tension, nor can the economic situation."

Lebanon's political leaders were still negotiating yesterday evening. The main sticking points appeared to be the sequence of events in the package and final formal approval of the international tribunal.

"There is no indication that we are any closer to an agreement," said Miss Mudallali.

President Emile Lahoud and parliamentary speaker Nabih Berri -- both seen as supporting Syria and Hezbollah -- have resisted taking the final steps needed to authorize the tribunal.

A U.N. investigators' report says there were links between the assassination of Rafiq Hariri on Feb. 14, 2005, and theslaying or attempted killing of 14 other prominent figures over the past two years, the Associated Press reported yesterday.

The AP quoted the head of the U.N.-led inquiry, Belgian prosecutor Serge Brammertz, saying in New York that the investigation had reached "a critical stage."

The government, which thinks Syria is behind the killings, sees the tribunal as essential to establishing Beirut's independence from Damascus.

Prominent Hamas Rebel Is Killed As Palestinians Renew Infighting (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, December 14, 2006

JERUSALEM, Dec. 13 — In renewed fighting among Palestinians, gunmen forced a prominent Hamas militant to his knees on Wednesday, then shot him dead outside a courthouse where he worked, in the southern Gaza Strip.

Hamas, the militant Islamic group that leads the Palestinian government, said a “death squad” from the rival Fatah faction was responsible for the killing of the militant, Bassam al-Farra, in Khan Yunis. Fatah denied involvement.

DOJ_NMG_0106333

The shooting occurred just two days after unidentified gunmen in Gaza City killed three sons, ages 3 to 9, of Baha Balousha, a senior Palestinian security officer and Fatah member. "This is a very dangerous situation," said Fauzi Barhoum, a Hamas spokesman. "There has been an escalation in the violence and the chaos."

Hamas and Fatah, the two dominant Palestinian factions, have been trying for months to form a national unity government. However, the talks have broken off, and the violence this week has again raised the prospect of widespread internal fighting, even a civil war.

Mr. Farra was arriving Wednesday at the courthouse in Khan Yunis in a taxi, when several men grabbed him and forced him to his knees on the sidewalk, while another man shot him, Palestinian witnesses said.

Palestinian security forces and Hamas militants set up roadblocks, but the gunmen escaped and no arrests were made.

Mr. Farra, who was about 30, was a leading local figure in Hamas's armed wing. He was a judge's assistant at the courthouse, Palestinians said.

The Palestinian prime minister, Ismail Haniya, of Hamas, who has been traveling in the Middle East for more than two weeks, plans to return to Gaza on Thursday to address the crisis, aides said.

"We want to assure you that the words 'civil war' don't exist in our dictionary," Mr. Haniya said in Khartoum, Sudan, The Associated Press reported. "They don't exist in our makeup, in our culture."

Palestinian factions have periodically fought one another since the Palestinians began an uprising against Israel in 2000. Criminal gangs and Palestinian clans have also been involved in internecine violence. However, the internal fighting and the sense of lawlessness have increased this year as the political rivalry between Hamas and Fatah has intensified.

The Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, of Fatah, is expected to announce his plan soon for ending the political deadlock, and aides have said he is leaning toward new presidential and parliamentary elections. But Hamas has challenged his authority to call new parliamentary elections, and proposing a new round of voting could add to the tensions.

In other violence on Wednesday, Israeli troops shot dead an armed Palestinian who approached Gaza's perimeter fence, the Israeli military said. The shooting was the first fatality on either side since the Israelis and Palestinians declared a cease-fire in Gaza on Nov. 26. Also, a Palestinian stabbed an Israeli security guard, seriously wounding him, at a checkpoint near the northern edge of Jerusalem, Israeli officials said.

In another development on Wednesday, Israel's Supreme Court sided with the government, ruling that a section of Israel's West Bank separation barrier, which runs near the northeastern boundary of Jerusalem, could stand. Arab residents in the area had appealed to the court, contending that the barrier greatly disrupted daily life and made it difficult to move between East Jerusalem and other parts of the West Bank.

Palestinian Gunmen Kill Hamas Commander (AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak

AP, December 14, 2006

Palestinian gunmen ambushed a Hamas commander outside a Gaza courthouse Wednesday, forcing him to his knees and killing him gangland-style in an attack that threatened to push Hamas and Fatah closer to civil war.

The brazen daylight slaying forced Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas to rush home from a trip abroad and dampened already fading hopes for creating a national unity government and renewing peace talks with Israel.

The attack on the Hamas activist was the latest in a wave of bloodshed that began Monday when unknown assailants gunned down the three young sons of a Fatah-allied security officer in Gaza City. Fatah accused Hamas in those killings; the Islamic militant group denied involvement.

Both sides criticized President Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah for failing to halt the violence.

On Wednesday morning, four gunmen calmly ate breakfast at a food stand outside the courthouse in the southern Gaza town of Khan Younis as they lay in wait for Bassam al-Fara, 30, a judge at the Islamic court, witnesses said.

When al-Fara, who belongs to the largest clan in Khan Younis, emerged from a taxi, three men grabbed him and forced him to his knees, while the fourth shot him, the witnesses said. The attack left his body and the sidewalk riddled with bullet holes. The witnesses declined to be identified, fearing for their safety.

DOJ_NMG_0106334

Palestinian security officials set up roadblocks and Hamas militants established checkpoints of their own as they searched for the gunmen.

About 3,000 people turned out for al-Fara's funeral, some firing shots in the air.

Outside the family home, his widow, a black veil covering her face, said her husband had received many death threats, the last on Tuesday, but she would not say from whom.

In a statement faxed to reporters, Hamas accused a Fatah "death squad" of al-Fara's killing. Late Wednesday, Fatah issued a statement saying the killing was a family dispute, and Fatah was not involved.

Fawzi Barhoum, a Hamas spokesman, said al-Fara was a field commander in the Hamas military wing. He pledged to hunt down the killers. "Hamas is not going to forget the blood of its members," Barhoum said.

Fatah spokesman Tawfik Abu Khoussa rejected the accusations. "We condemn all acts of anarchy whatever may be behind them, and we call on the brothers in Hamas to stop firing accusations before the investigation," he said.

Haniyeh, who was in Sudan, said he would return to Gaza on Thursday, cutting short a trip to Arab and Muslim countries including Iran and Syria. Haniyeh left Gaza on Nov. 28 on what was billed as a monthlong trip.

At the al-Fara home in Khan Younis, Hamas lawmaker Salah Bardawil said Abbas was responsible for failing to stop the security agencies from carrying out killings. "We ask the president to live up to his responsibilities before God and the law," he said.

After nightfall, gunmen fired at a Hamas rally at the Nusseirat refugee camp in central Gaza, witnesses said. One demonstrator was hurt.

Fatah activists also criticized Abbas; about 1,000 Fatah supporters marched to his house in Gaza City, demanding action.

Maj. Othman Shalouf, a Palestinian security officer, said Abbas must take charge of the situation.

"The time has come to exercise your powers and stop this farce," he said. "Security agencies are able to control things, but we need a political decision from you." Abbas was at his office in the West Bank city of Ramallah at the time and had no plans to go to Gaza.

Also Wednesday, Israeli soldiers shot and killed a Palestinian near the Israel-Gaza border fence. The military said he was armed and carrying explosives. A cease-fire has stopped most violence between Israel and Gaza.

Abbas plans a speech to his people on Saturday in which he is expected to outline his plans to hold elections to break the deadlock between Fatah and Hamas.

The Hamas victory in January's parliamentary voting pushed Fatah out of power but led to an economic and political stalemate. Israel, the U.S. and the European Union, which list Hamas as a terror group, all cut off contacts, economic ties and aid to the Palestinian government, further deepening poverty and instability in the West Bank and Gaza.

Hamas is responsible for dozens of suicide bombing attacks in Israel over the past decade. The Islamic group has rejected international demands that it recognize Israel, renounce violence and accept existing peace deals, but Hamas flatly refuses.

Israel has tried to promote the idea of separate peace talks with Abbas, a moderate who was elected a year before the parliamentary vote.

Somalia's Islamists And Ethiopia Gird For A War (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman And Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, December 14, 2006

MOGADISHU, Somalia, Dec. 9 — The stadium was packed, the guns were cocked and even the drenching rain could not douse the jihadist fire.

Thousands of Somalis, from fully veiled, machine-gun-toting women to little boys in baggy fatigues, gathered Friday to rally against what they called foreign aggression. As a squall blew in, they punched wet fists into the air and yelled, "Allahu akbar," or "God is great."

"I am ready to die," said Osama Abdi Rahim, dressed head to toe in camouflage and marching around with a loaded rifle. He is 7 years old.

DOJ_NMG_0106335

The inevitability of war hangs over Mogadishu, Somalia's bullet-pocked seaside capital. But unlike the internal anarchy that has consumed the country for 15 years, the looming battle is now with Ethiopia, threatening to further destabilize the troubled Horn of Africa.

In the past week the increasingly militant Islamists in control of Mogadishu and much of the rest of the country have begun a food drive, a money drive and an AK-47 assault rifle drive, and have sent doctors and nurses, along with countless young soldiers, to the front lines.

For its part, Ethiopia, with tacit approval from the United States, has been steadily slipping soldiers across the border, trying to hold off the Islamists and shore up Somalia's weak, unpopular and divided transitional government.

Though that government has been recognized by the United Nations as the legitimate authority in Somalia, its power barely extends to the municipal limits of Baidoa, the inland town where it is based.

The Islamist forces, on the other hand, seem to be very popular here, having defeated Mogadishu's warlords earlier this year to pacify one of the world's most murderous cities.

Their troops, which United Nations officials say are secretly getting weapons from several Arab countries and Eritrea, have encircled Baidoa and are vowing to wage war against the Ethiopian forces unless they leave. Ethiopian convoys have been attacked, and the Islamists recently skirmished with soldiers from Baidoa, with dozens reported killed. That taste of war seems to have whetted the appetite for more.

"We wait for the Ethiopians like dry land waits for rain," said Mustafa Ali Mohammed, an Islamic leader in Burhakaba, a town near the dividing line between the Islamists and Baidoa.

Analysts are unanimous that a full-scale conflict between the Islamists and Ethiopia, a country with a strong Christian identity, would be disastrous for Somalia, which is already suffering from severe flooding and years of neglect, and for the region as a whole, because neighboring countries may jump in.

Gen. John P. Abizaid of the United States Central Command — or Centcom — which has responsibility for American military interests in the region, recently flew to Ethiopia to meet with Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, who had told American officials that he could cripple the Islamist forces "in one to two weeks."

Walking a careful line, General Abizaid made it clear that a broad military invasion of Somalia could create a humanitarian crisis across the Horn of Africa, Centcom officials said, but did not tell Ethiopian officials to pull their troops out.

Indeed, some American officials say the United States supports Ethiopia's military buildup because it is the only way to protect the weak Baidoa government from being overrun, force the Islamists to the negotiating table and contain what they call a growing regional threat.

American officials have accused the Islamists of sheltering terrorists connected to Al Qaeda, but the Ethiopian troops' presence seems to have only increased the potential for terrorist activity. Suicide bombers, unknown in Somalia until a few months ago, have attacked Baidoa twice recently, and last month the first Iraqstyle roadside bombs were detonated against Ethiopian convoys.

Residents of Mogadishu say hundreds of fighters from other Muslim countries have arrived at the city's main airport in recent days, drawn by the Islamists' blaring call for a holy war against Ethiopia and against America, which is especially despised here.

Memories are still fresh of the botched American-led relief operation in the early 1990s, and more recently of the covert American effort to bolster Mogadishu's warlords in an 11th-hour bid to prevent an Islamist takeover. That strategy backfired, driving more people into the arms of the Islamists.

"I'll be honest," said Sheik Muktar Robow Abu Monsur, the deputy security chief for the Islamists. "America is the best friend of Islam. It wakes up the sleeping Muslim."

In fact, Jendayi Frazer, the State Department's top official for Africa policy, said diplomatic and intelligence officials believed that the Islamists could be trying to provoke an Ethiopian attack as a "rallying cry for support" to their side. The countries fought a war from 1977 to 1978 over the Ogaden, a contested area of eastern Ethiopia — and Somalia lost.

"If this thing goes to a military fight," Ms. Frazer said, "it's a bloodbath."

DOJ_NMG_0106336

American officials helped push through a recent United Nations resolution authorizing peacekeepers from African countries to back up the Baidoa officials. The resolution lets the Baidoa government, but not the Islamists, bring in weapons despite a longstanding arms embargo.

The problem with that strategy, many analysts say, is that it misreads the Islamists' power, rooted not so much in their military strength — a few hundred armed pickup trucks and a few thousand fighters — but in their popular support. The Islamists emerged several years ago as a network of clan-based courts that unified warring factions.

Ethiopia may have the strongest military in the region, trained by American advisers and complete with jet fighters, but attacking Islamist forces may only drive them underground, into a guerrilla insurgency.

American officials have said they are hoping that the moderates within the Islamic administration will prevail over hard-line, war-mongering elements. But if there ever was such a struggle, it is over.

Three months ago, Ibrahim Hassan Addou, the foreign minister for the Islamists and an American citizen of Somali descent, talked of sharing power and holding elections.

Now, like the others, he is talking war, in terms nearly indistinguishable from the most militant Islamic leaders. Moderates, he said, were backed into a corner by an American-led campaign to discredit and isolate the Islamic administration.

"Everybody was against us from the beginning, and now we have no choice but to fight," he said. "What I don't understand is why the whole world is trying to throw its weight behind a government that has been totally rejected by its own people."

United Nations officials say they support the government in Baidoa because it is the most representative of the various clans in Somalia. But one side effect of the multiclan approach has been ceaseless disputes between clan elders. Meanwhile, the Islamists have aggressively expanded their territory.

Many officials in Baidoa vehemently opposed calling on Ethiopian muscle, fearing a backlash. In the past some Somali clans have teamed up with Ethiopian forces to dominate other clans, ending in greater bloodshed. So when the idea of bringing Ethiopian soldiers to Baidoa was first proposed last year, it proved so divisive that it set off a brawl among officials — and it failed to pass.

"The problem with having Ethiopians defend us is that they make us look like the puppets that the Islamists accuse us of being," said Sharif Hassan Sheik Aden, the speaker of the parliament in Baidoa. Ethiopian officials insist that they have sent only a few hundred military advisers to Baidoa, but United Nation monitors and witnesses on the ground say several thousand Ethiopian infantry troops are digging in near the city.

Sporadic peace talks between Baidoa officials and the Islamists have produced little but broken promises. The only thing that seems to be delaying all-out war is the mutual recognition that a decisive victory is unlikely.

The Islamists are reluctant to march on Baidoa and set off a crushing Ethiopian response, while the Ethiopians seem fearful of trying to storm the Islamists' stronghold of Mogadishu, the city that claimed the lives of 18 American soldiers in the infamous "Black Hawk Down" battle in 1993.

A growing number of Democrats in Congress are urging the Bush administration to change course and deal with the Islamists for what they are: the power on the ground.

"The Islamists aren't going away, so the sooner we talk to them, the better," said Representative Donald M. Payne, the New Jersey Democrat who is expected to become the chairman of the House subcommittee on Africa when his party takes control of Congress in January.

In Mogadishu the Islamists are continuing their hearts-and-minds campaign, organizing neighborhood cleanups, delivering food to the needy and resuscitating old national institutions like the Supreme Court, which was given a fresh coat of paint and reopened in October.

Streets that were clogged with years of debris are now clear and bureaucracy is budding, with more rules and more paperwork, including forms at the airport that ask name, age, nationality and religion — Muslim or non-Muslim being the only choices.

All the talk of slaughtering Ethiopian invaders and their American sponsors, though, seems to have brought out a harsher side of the Islamic administration. Nearly every day, rings of people gather on Mogadishu's streets to watch lashings, and the crowds cheer as leather whips cut canals into flesh. One Islamic leader in a town north of Mogadishu recently issued an edict threatening that anyone who did not pray five times a day would be beheaded.

"It's black and white," said the leader, Hussein Barre Rage. "The Koran says people must pray."

Not long ago Somalia was a place where women wore skirts and men drank beer, and even today a large chunk of the population is quietly concerned about the absolutist direction the Islamists are heading in.

But the prospects of war with Ethiopia seem to have pushed many of these people solidly into the Islamic camp.

"I'm not into thought control," said Dahir Abdullahi Hirsi, a pharmacist in Mogadishu. "But I hate Ethiopians even more."

Regional War May Loom In Africa (WP)

By Stephanie McCrummen

The Washington Post, December 14, 2006

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia, Dec. 13 -- With the Ethiopian government saying it is technically at war with Somalia's Islamic Courts movement, and the movement having declared holy war against Ethiopia, there is fear that an all-out conflict in the Horn of Africa may be unavoidable.

In the past week, several skirmishes have broken out between militias loyal to Ethiopia and those loyal to the Council of Islamic Courts, the movement that has taken control of the southern region of the country, including Mogadishu, the capital.

The fighting has occurred around the southern town of Baidoa, seat of Somalia's fragile but internationally recognized transitional government. Ethiopia considers the interim government a buffer against Islamic Courts leaders who have long expressed desire to create a "Greater Somalia," including ethnically Somali portions of Ethiopia, Kenya and Djibouti.

Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi on Wednesday rejected a declaration by a leader of the Islamic movement that Ethiopia withdraw its troops or face war. Though the Ethiopian government has repeatedly denied having more than several hundred military trainers in Somalia, diplomats in the region estimate that at least 8,000 troops have poured in around Baidoa and that thousands more are gathering along the Somali border.

"This declaration is based on falsehoods," Meles said in an interview, adding that the movement, also known as the Islamic Courts Union, is "hellbent" on controlling all of Somalia. "Now, if the transitional government doesn't want our trainers, we're happy to withdraw them at any moment," he said.

The weak transitional government has made no such request.

For now, hopes for a peaceful resolution are pinned on a U.N. Security Council resolution adopted last week, authorizing deployment of an African Union force, excluding troops from neighboring states, to Baidoa. In theory, the resolution would remove Ethiopia from the volatile equation and encourage more moderate leaders within the Islamic movement to join the transitional government.

Some analysts, however, contend that the measure has already prompted the Islamic Courts to push toward Baidoa and will ultimately serve as a rallying point for the movement's more radical factions, which have said they would consider any African Union force a foreign invasion.

In any case, deployment could take months. The president of the transitional government has requested 8,000 African Union troops, though only one battalion of about 800 Ugandan troops is ready, according to African Union officials.

In question at the moment is whether the Islamic movement or Ethiopia will mount a full-fledged offensive before the African Union soldiers deploy, and whether the transitional government, which has spent much of its time exiled at the InterContinental Hotel in Nairobi, will simply disintegrate, leaving no internationally recognized government for the United Nations, or Ethiopia, to support.

"My feeling is that Ethiopia will go to war. . . . Their own security is at stake," a senior Kenyan diplomat said on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the situation. "Unfortunately, the [U.N.] resolution was sponsored by the United States, and it will be used by the Courts as a propaganda tool. But at least there's a window."

Besides fear of an Islamic government on its border, an increasingly authoritarian Ethiopian government is also concerned about radicalization of its own Muslim citizens, who now account for nearly 50 percent of the population. The government has accused the Islamic Courts of training and arming insurgent groups in the ethnically Somali region of Ethiopia called the Ogaden. The two countries have been to war over the area three times since Somalia's independence in 1960.

The situation unfolding in Somalia, a society of warring clans and sub-clans without a central government since dictator Mohamed Siad Barre fell in 1991, is one in which diplomats, analysts and others involved tend to agree on one point: that war would be disastrous, threatening to destabilize a region of great strategic import not only to Africa but also to the United States, because of its proximity to the Middle East and Red Sea shipping lanes.

A triple car bombing at a checkpoint outside Baidoa last month heightened those fears, with the transitional government blaming the attack on al-Qaeda sympathizers within the Islamic Courts, which denied responsibility. Some analysts say that even if Ethiopia, which has a predominantly Christian army, initially trounces Islamic Courts fighters in a war, the movement's more radical members might retaliate with suicide bombings and other terrorist-style attacks in neighboring countries such as Kenya, Ethiopia and Djibouti, where the United States has a significant military presence.

"I think if the ICU [Islamic Courts Union] suffers from defeat, it will only take months for them to regroup and it would strengthen them internally," said Matt Bryden, a consultant with the International Crisis Group, a policy research group. "If they are hit, there is a risk they would come back on steroids and pose a threat to the whole region."

Meles rejected that argument, saying the policy of dialogue and engagement has only bought the Islamic Courts movement time to expand its control.

"It surprises me that intelligent people at the dawn of the 21st century could claim that if you respond to terrorism with force, you spawn terrorism," he said. "But that if you appease them, you somehow tame them."

Since 1991, Somalia has held no fewer than 15 peace conferences aimed at cobbling together some sort of central government.

A U.S.-led attempt to stabilize the country led to the deaths of 18 American troops in an October 1993 battle depicted in the movie "Black Hawk Down." After the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, the U.S. government was accused of bungling Somalia policy again by supporting warlords marketing themselves as an "anti-terrorism coalition," who generally terrorized Somalis who came to hate them.

The Islamic Courts, initially a grouping of local clerics, offered an alternative to that lawlessness, establishing an order based on Islamic law village by village, often persuading local militias to join them.

A recent U.N. study found that although the transitional government is supported by Ethiopia, among other countries, the Islamic Courts are receiving substantial assistance from Iran and Hezbollah, a claim some regional analysts contend is exaggerated.

Support for the Islamic movement by Eritrea, Ethiopia's neighbor and rival, appears to be a big part of Ethiopia's motivation. The Ethiopia-Eritrea proxy conflict in Somalia could ignite a regional conflagration and threaten U.S. anti-terrorism efforts in the Horn of Africa, according to a report due out this week from the New York-based Council on Foreign Relations. It describes "a general unraveling of U.S. foreign policy" in the region and calls for the United States to exert stronger pressure on the two countries to implement a U.S.-brokered border agreement.

The U.N. study found that the Islamic Courts group has also raised money from various Arab states and the Somali diaspora. Relatively quickly, the movement established an efficient system of taxation and social welfare programs that enabled businesses to function and that seem to have earned support among Somalis, even if many in the traditionally moderate country are uneasy with the harsher aspects of Islamic law. At the same time, the movement has been backed by a more radical military wing called the shebab, made up of young men raised in a chaotic country awash with weapons, and indoctrinated with the ideology of holy war.

Both the United States and Ethiopia have accused the Islamic Courts of harboring suspects in the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania and other attacks. Movement officials have denied that, accusing both countries of waging a propaganda war.

Diplomats and analysts differ sharply on whether Islamic Courts leaders such as Sheik Hassan Aweys are genuinely striving for legitimacy or cynically concealing a radical agenda.

DOJ_NMG_0106339

"The Courts are not monolithic" said Mario Raffaelli, an Italian diplomat working in Somalia. "In my experience, the majority is not following this extreme approach."

Raffaelli said the Courts group has an incentive to negotiate even with a weak transitional government because doing so would provide the movement with legitimacy.

Some observers, including Ethiopians opposed to war, are convinced that the United States is tacitly giving a green light to Ethiopia to attack. That, they say, would amount to the worst U.S. policy blunder yet in Somalia. Beyene Petros, an opposition leader in Ethiopia's parliament, questioned the wisdom of a visit that Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, head of the U.S. Central Command, paid Meles in Ethiopia last week.

"If there is disapproval, you don't pay visits, right?" he said. "We used to see this call for restraint, but I have not seen that lately."

Russia Ready To Cut Off Gas Supplies To Belarus, Georgia (FT)

By Neil Buckley And Arkady Ostrovsky

Financial Times, December 14, 2006

Russia is preparing to cut off natural gas supplies to neighbouring Belarus and Georgia unless the two former Soviet republics agree by the year-end to pay much higher prices in 2007.

Coming a year after Gazprom, the Russian gas giant, briefly cut gas to Ukraine in a similar pricing dispute, such a move could provoke further criticism that Moscow is using energy as a political tool. It might also intensify pressure on Russia to ratify the European Energy Charter treaty, which would require such disagreements to be resolved through arbitration.

Action against Belarus could affect supplies to Poland and Germany because a transit pipeline runs across the republic, though it carries only a third of the volumes running through a bigger export pipeline across Ukraine. Last January, pressure in the trans-Ukrainian pipeline to western Europe dropped as a result of what Gazprom said was Ukraine "stealing" gas for its own use.

Gazprom has made clear it is prepared to reduce price increases in exchange for stakes in the republics' gas distribution networks. It is pushing hard for 50 per cent of Beltransgaz, the Belarusian company that also controls the export pipeline across the country, although Russia and Belarus differ sharply over its value.

Dmitry Medvedev, Gazprom chairman and Russia's first deputy prime minister, declined to comment directly to western reporters this week on whether the company was prepared to cut off supplies. But he admitted negotiations were "not easy".

Sergei Kuprianov, a Gazprom spokesman, told a radio station he could not exclude a cut-off to Belarus, though he added: "We would hate to see that." But it is understood Gazprom is preparing for a worst-case scenario if agreements are not reached.

Senior Russian officials say the increases are a move away from subsidised supplies for former Soviet republics towards transparent market pricing, which Gazprom aims to achieve by 2008.

While Belarus has been happy to remain in Moscow's orbit, western-leaning Georgia sees the threat as politically motivated. It has seen Russia sever transport and mail links in a feud and portrays the demand to double the price it pays from $110 per thousand cubic metres to $230 - close to European levels - as a matter of more than economics.

Georgian officials say because Georgia's gas is sourced from nearby Central Asia, it should pay less than more distant European customers. It says it can replace Russian gas with supplies from Azerbaijan and from Iran. But as well as trying to raise prices to $230 to Azerbaijan, Russia is reducing its gas exports to the country next year.

Putin Turns On Close Ally Belarus (FT)

By Neil Buckley

Financial Times, December 14, 2006

Russia is set to deal a double blow to the economy of one of its closest allies – potentially making life much more difficult for the man the US has called “Europe’s last dictator”.

As well as pressing for Belarus to pay much more for its natural gas, Moscow said this week it would slap an export duty on what are currently duty-free Russian crude oil exports to its close Slavic neighbour of $180.70 per tonne from next year.

DOJ_NMG_0106340

The measures could sharply reduce or wipe out the $4bn-plus effective annual subsidy Russia provides to Belarus, which has helped Alexander Lukashenko, its authoritarian president, deliver higher wages and living standards to his 10m people.

That, say analysts, could make it harder to sustain the support that saw Mr Lukashenko re-elected last March to a third presidential term with 82 per cent of the vote – albeit in a poll international observers condemned as below international standards. It could also drive a wedge between countries with close cultural and historic links.

"Raising gas prices to [market] levels is equivalent to breaking off relations entirely," Mr Lukashenko recently told Russian journalists visiting Minsk. "We will survive, but you will lose the last ally."

Belarus pays only $46.67 per thousand cubic metres for Russian gas, saving it more than $3bn compared to market prices, but Russia is now pushing to increase the price to $200.

At the same time, Belarus imports duty-free crude from Russia, refines it at two refineries, and sells the petroleum products to western Europe at market prices, pocketing a healthy profit. Russian export duties will deprive the Belarus budget of about $1.7bn a year.

This is a sharp turnaround from nine months ago, when Russian president Vladimir Putin was criticised for being one of the few world leaders to congratulate Mr Lukashenko on his controversial election victory. It is the more surprising since Russia and Belarus signed agreements in the mid-1990s on creating a political and economic union, including a common currency and union constitution.

Analysts from both countries suggest Moscow is penalising Mr Lukashenko for not delivering on pledges of closer integration with Russia, including the currency union and selling half of Beltransgaz, the Belarusian gas distributor, to Gazprom, the Russian natural gas giant. Beltransgaz controls the gas export pipeline to western Europe.

"Mr Lukashenko monetised his rhetoric," says Yaroslav Romanchuk, head of the Mizes Research Centre, a Minsk think-tank. "He sold his integration pledges for a high price, but now Putin feels he was cheated."

Analysts attribute Mr Lukashenko's support for the union state in the 1990s to his belief that it could lead to a senior position for him in Moscow – even president of the union. His enthusiasm waned after the Kremlin made it clear there was no prospect of that.

Mr Lukashenko says there can be no talk of further integration with Russia in a pre-election period. That would postpone matters until after Russia's presidential elections in 2008.

The Belarus president now has a difficult choice. He is loath to cede a half-share to Russia in Beltransgaz, which one western diplomat calls Belarus's "sacred cow".

But even a limited gas price increase could render much of the country's largely state-owned industry uncompetitive – and handing over the Beltransgaz stake would probably only delay Russia's demands for a higher gas price. Stanislav Bogdankevich, a former Belarus central bank governor, estimates that 60 per cent of Belarusian industry is barely profitable or loss-making.

Independent economists suggest Mr Lukashenko may be forced to introduce market reforms into the economy. That could mean privatising some of its more attractive industrial assets – with Russian companies the most likely buyers.

From Russia, With Polonium (WP)

The Washington Post, December 14, 2006

IT'S STILL not known how the former Russian KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko came to ingest the deadly dose of polonium-210 that killed him in London last month. But thanks to the radioactive trail left behind by the isotope, some important conclusions about the case are now possible.

First, the polonium was smuggled into Britain from Russia, where most of the known global supply of the intensely toxic substance is produced. Second, the dose was almost certainly carried by one or both of the former Russian security operatives -- one of them also a KGB alumnus -- whom Mr. Litvinenko met at a London hotel Nov. 1. Finally, the government of Vladimir Putin is making it difficult for British and German investigators to question the suspects, who are now sequestered in Moscow hospitals.

Does this mean that Mr. Putin or the FSB agency -- successor to the KGB -- is responsible for the death of Mr. Litvinenko? Not necessarily: It's conceivable, as Russian and some Western investigators have lately begun suggesting, that he was a victim of a botched attempt to smuggle nuclear materials out of Russia for some other purpose. Still, Mr. Litvinenko is one of a number of opponents of Mr. Putin who have fallen victim to poisonings in the past several years; he himself charged that the FSB maintained a poisons laboratory, and he accused Mr. Putin of ordering his assassination. The Russian president retorted that enemies based abroad are staging operations to discredit him. But why, then, did the instrument of Mr. Litvinenko's death come from Moscow? And why are Russian authorities shielding the two men implicated in the smuggling?

Mr. Litvinenko's case, like that of the murdered journalist Anna Politkovskaya, may never be solved. But what is already known should cause Western governments, including the Bush administration, to insist on some answers from Mr. Putin. How did a toxic dose of polonium, a substance reportedly produced and held by only three Russian government entities and one private company, come into the hands of people who could smuggle it into Britain? Polonium can be used not only to poison someone; it can trigger a nuclear weapon or fuel a "dirty bomb" that could wreak havoc in a major city. The leakage of such materials is a serious threat -- and not just to enemies of Mr. Putin.

Russia's Killing Ways (WP)

By Oleg Gordievsky

The Washington Post, December 14, 2006

The KGB and its predecessors liquidated people abroad quite regularly in the 1920s and '30s and even after World War II. But after two embarrassing and highly publicized defections of assassins, in 1957 and 1959, these activities ceased. Nikita Khrushchev, Leonid Brezhnev and later Yuri Andropov all avoided political killings when they led the Soviet Union.

(Of course, this did not prevent the assassination in London of Georgi Markov in 1978, when the Bulgarian dictator Todor Zhivkov persuaded Andropov to allow the KGB to help carry out such an operation.)

There were no secret assassinations under Mikhail Gorbachev or Boris Yeltsin. But under Vladimir Putin, the militant element of the KGB (now known as the FSB) slowly began working to persuade the leadership to carry out such killings, according to my sources. "Too many enemies," they said.

Those members of the FSB have a different style than in the past, however. The Communist Party was cruel, but it had its rules. The current people are like bandits -- no code, no rules, hard to distinguish from the Mafia. The gangster mentality started to spread after 2000; there were assassinations inside the country, of enemies of the regime. But there were so many contract killings at the time under Putin that it was difficult to tell which were the work of the FSB and which were not. In that atmosphere, it was easy to disguise an assassination.

The FSB has also become a protection racket. Some of those in business who are willing to go along with the FSB report everything to its operatives and also give 10 percent of their profits to the KGB's successor agency. And everyone is happy.

So in a way it's a big criminal state. The FSB has become like the Mafia in its methods and goals.

In 2003 the journalist and reformist politician Yuri Shchekochikhin was murdered in Russia. It was obvious from the way his "illness" developed that he was poisoned.

Anna Politkovskaya, a courageous journalist, honest and intelligent, was shot two months ago. Well before that -- in 2004 -- she was poisoned on a flight to the Caucasus. It was, I am certain, the work of the FSB. Afterward, the Putin-controlled media put out the usual propaganda to cover up the act. After Politkovskaya's death this year, many Russians said -- because she was Jewish and had American citizenship -- "Oh, just as well someone shot her; she was probably an American spy."

In July Russia's parliament passed a law, introduced by Putin, to permit the assassination of "enemies of the Russian regime" abroad. As a result, overeager -- perhaps chauvinistic, anti-Semitic or xenophobic -- factions within the FSB may suggest someone to kill. But there is no paper trail. (By the way, I don't think the recent illness of Yegor Gaidar -- a man whom nobody reads, whose importance is entirely in the past -- was due to poison. He is too insignificant to be killed by the regime.)

Here, too, the FSB has learned from the example of Joseph Stalin. Documents proving Stalin's atrocities continue to surface. To prevent such disclosures, orders for assassinations no longer have names or signatures on them, according to what I am told by my connections. Directives such as the one to assassinate Alexander Litvinenko are written to say, for example, "Request permission to carry out inquiry abroad," with no mention of the target. The document goes to an archive with nothing tying those involved to an assassination.

DOJ_NMG_0106342

The first such killing took place three years ago, in Qatar. Zelimkhan Yandarbiyev, a former president of the Chechen republic, lived there as a pensioner, and was with his son and bodyguard when his car exploded. The two Russian intelligence agents who carried out the killing were caught, tried and imprisoned. But because Qatar wanted to avoid trouble with Russia, the prisoners were released to their home country after five months, to serve their sentences there. Once home, however, they were decorated rather than jailed.

Now, with Litvinenko, they have dared to kill a citizen of Britain on the soil of that country. Yandarbiyev, Shchekochikhin, Politkovskaya, Litvinenko: Russia has become a terrorist regime.

The writer, who was once a colonel in the Soviet KGB, defected to Britain in 1985.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Leahy Promises 'Real' Oversight Of FBI (AP)

By Laurie Kellman
AP, December 14, 2006

President Bush should expect tougher oversight of the war on terrorism and a closer look at his administration's policies on torture and other human rights issues, the incoming chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee said Wednesday.

Sen. Patrick Leahy said his panel also will look at recommendations by the Iraq Study Group that law enforcement officials from the FBI and other offices in the Justice Department be sent to Iraq to boost a police force riddled with corruption. Leahy noted reports that police helped Saddam Hussein's nephew escape from a prison near Mosul.

"The police force has proven to be one of the worst failures of the occupation," said Leahy, D-Vt. "I look forward to the Judiciary Committee contributing to these efforts by exploring the dozen recommendations relating to the Iraqi justice system and the training of Iraqi police forces."

Leahy said he would also deal with what he says are the administration's human rights abuses by creating a new subcommittee focused on legislation on such issues as torture and detainee treatment. Democratic Whip Dick Durbin of Illinois will chair the new panel, Leahy said.

The incoming chairman should not count on big changes in regard to oversight of the Justice Department, according to a spokesman for the agency.

"As we have for the past six years, we're looking forward to working with the Senate Judiciary Committee," said spokesman Brian Roehrkasse. The relationship, he added, includes "working with the committee to provide information that it legitimately needs."

"In the past, we've reached accommodations, and working together we expect we can do so in the future," he said.

Expecting resistance to his plans to examine the administration's use of executive power, Leahy said he would not hesitate to subpoena witnesses and documents. He said he expected to summon Attorney General Alberto Gonzales before his panel "soon."

Leahy wants to examine the administration's warrantless wiretapping program and its legal and physical treatment of detainees, saying that White House policy has violated Americans' civil rights and the human rights of war prisoners.

Roehrkasse maintained that the administration's domestic surveillance program and treatment of detainees fall within the bounds of U.S. and international law and are appropriate responses to the terrorist threat the nation faces.

Like the current committee chairman, Republican Sen. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, Leahy suggested Congress could dissuade Bush from issuing more such statements by threatening to withhold funding or blocking nominations.

Leahy, who was chairman of the committee in 2001-2002, said the return of Democratic control would mean a period of "restoration, repair and renewal" after what he termed years of the Bush administration's virtually unchecked power to hunt for terrorists even within U.S. borders.

"This administration has been less and less willing to let us know what they are doing," Leahy said. Bush's warrantless wiretapping program and the government's secretive terrorism risk assessments of Americans traveling abroad merit a closer look by his panel, Leahy said.

"Americans' privacy is a price the Bush administration is willing to pay for the cavalier way it is spawning new databanks," he said in his prepared text. "We are way overdue in catching up to the erosion of privacy, and the Judiciary Committee now will help to bring this picture into focus."

Also on the agenda, Leahy said, is a bill he has introduced to crack down on war profiteering in Iraq. The measure would prohibit profiteering and fraud by contractors in connection with war, relief or reconstruction efforts and would set stiff punishments of prison time and fines.

Senator Promises Vigilant Oversight Of War On Terror (MCT)

By Margaret Talev

McClatchy, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON - The next chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee said Wednesday that he'll subpoena documents and testimony on U.S. terrorism, detainees and domestic-surveillance programs if Bush administration officials don't cooperate once Democrats take over in January.

"I expect to get the answers," Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., said during a speech at the Georgetown University Law Center. "I'm not trying to set up the idea of a confrontation for the sake of a confrontation. I hope people will pay attention, will answer questions. We'll try it that way first."

The administration "has secretly been compiling dossiers on millions of law-abiding Americans," Leahy said. He said that U.S. citizens should be able to see or challenge their so-called terror scores, which he said are secretly assigned by the government. He also called for more regulation of data mining.

Leahy did not specify whom he might subpoena. Asked if telephone company executives could be targeted for their secret roles in domestic surveillance, Leahy would say only: "Watch what we do."

One document he may seek to subpoena, he said, is what's believed to be a 2002 memo listing authorized CIA interrogation techniques on suspected terrorists. Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse did not address that memo specifically, but said his department had kept lawmakers sufficiently in the loop about terrorism matters.

"The department will continue to work closely with the Congress as they exercise their oversight functions, and we will appropriately respond to all requests in the spirit of that longstanding relationship," Roehrkasse said.

Leahy, a former prosecutor turned civil libertarian, also threatened to block President Bush's judicial nominees, withhold funds, or change federal law if need be to curb the president's use of "signing statements" where the president signals his intention to abide selectively by newly signed laws.

Last year, the president issued a signing statement that critics said could be cited as cover for ignoring the law's ban on torture of detainees if he found torture was in the interest of national security.

While the practice is controversial, presidents have issued similar statements throughout U.S. history, though none so frequently as Bush, and rarely so provocatively. Whether Congress can curb the practice by an equal branch of government is a question for constitutional law and possibly the U.S. Supreme Court.

McClatchy Newspapers reported earlier this year that by January 2006, Bush had invoked the practice some 500 times. Reagan challenged 71 legislative provisions, President George H.W. Bush used it for 146 laws while President Clinton challenged 105.

Curt Levey, executive director of the Committee for Justice, a group that supports Bush's judicial nominees, said he was troubled by Leahy's remarks.

"Individual senators on the floor can vote against a nominee for whatever reason they want, (including) if they want to get revenge on the president for his signing statements," Levey said. "But for Leahy to use the committee to prevent these nominees from getting a debate or up or down vote on the Senate floor is completely unacceptable."

Leahy Says Democrats Will Investigate Bush's Surveillance (BLOOM)

By William Roberts

Bloomberg, December 14, 2006

Dec. 13 (Bloomberg) -- Senate Judiciary Committee Democrats will investigate and conduct hearings on the Bush administration's domestic eavesdropping on suspected terrorists, said incoming panel chairman Senator Patrick Leahy of Vermont.

``We have a duty, a real duty, to repair the real damage done to our system of government over the past few years," Leahy said in a speech today at Georgetown University Law School in Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0106347

Leahy said he told Attorney General Alberto Gonzales two weeks ago that he will be asked to appear before the Senate panel to defend the administration's use of wiretapping without a court warrant, which Leahy said has eroded U.S. constitutional rights.

``I expect to get answers. If we don't then we'll use the subpoena," Leahy said. Democrats took control of the Senate and House in the Nov. 7 election.

Leahy said he also will pursue revisions in a new law that gives President George W. Bush wide latitude in deciding what interrogation techniques are permissible. The Judiciary Committee conduct an inquiry into war profiteering in Iraq and will try to strengthen open-government laws such as the Freedom of Information Act, the incoming chairman said.

``The administration has rolled back open-government laws and systematically eroded Americans' privacy rights," Leahy said. ``It has brazenly refused to answer the legitimate oversight questions of the people's duly elected representatives and it has acted outside the law to wiretap Americans."

The Justice Department didn't have an immediate comment on Leahy's speech.

Senator Specter

Leahy said he will work with Republican Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, the outgoing Judiciary Committee chairman, to revise the law Congress passed at the end of the legislative session to provide for CIA detention and interrogation of terrorist suspects.

The measure, which Leahy called ``sweeping and ill- conceived," bars federal courts from considering habeas-corpus petitions filed by terrorism suspects challenging their detention.

``The bill written by the White House and passed by the last Congress is designed to ensure that the Bush-Cheney administration is never again embarrassed by a United States Supreme Court decision reviewing its unlawful abuses of power," Leahy said. ``I am committed to restoring basic American values to the way we combat terrorism."

Two-thirds of the U.S. public believes the FBI and other agencies intruded on the privacy of Americans as part of federal counter-terrorism investigations, according to a new Washington Post-ABC News poll released today. Fifty-two percent said they favored congressional hearings on how the Bush administration spied on Americans.

Data-Privacy Bill

The poll was a telephone survey of 1,005 randomly selected adults nationwide conducted Dec. 7-11 and had a margin of error of plus-or-minus 3 percentage points.

Leahy said he intends as chairman of the Judiciary Committee to advance a data-privacy bill to prevent data brokers from collecting and selling personal information that intrudes on Americans' privacy.

The committee will pursue an inquiry into war profiteering, he said. ``Where did all the money go?" Leahy said. ``We are going to ask those questions."

Leahy said he will seek to strengthen and improve open- government laws such as the Freedom of Information Act, which he said has been eroded by the Bush administration.

In the next Congress, Leahy said the Judiciary Committee will act to confirm Bush's judicial nominees if they are approved by both senators from the state where the court sits and by the Senate majority and minority leaders.

Leahy Vows To Repair Bush 'Damage' (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, December 14, 2006

Incoming Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick J. Leahy said yesterday that he plans to rein in President Bush's program of wiretapping without warrants, rewrite the policy for handling terrorism detainees and more closely scrutinize nominees to the federal courts.

"As a Democratic majority prepares to take the lead on the Judiciary Committee, we do not have the luxury of starting with a completely clean slate," the Vermont Democrat told an audience at Georgetown University Law Center. "We begin knowing that we have a duty to repair real damage done to our system of government over the last few years."

Mr. Leahy accused Mr. Bush of "corrosive unilateralism," eroding the privacy rights of Americans, erasing constitutional checks and balances, and "packing" the federal judiciary.

The Republican House and Senate, he said, accepted White House policy changes without question.

"I came to the Senate during the ebb tide of Vietnam and Watergate. In my 32 years since then in the Senate, I have never seen a Congress so willfully derelict in its duties," Mr. Leahy said. "This has been an unfortunate chapter in Congress' history, a time when our Constitution was under assault, when our legal and human rights were weakened, when our privacy and other freedoms were eroded."

Still, he said, he hopes to proceed in a bipartisan manner.

DOJ_NMG_0106348

"Senator Leahy has not yet assumed the chairmanship of the Judiciary Committee, but his statements today and in recent weeks are already raising disturbing questions about his ability and willingness to give fair consideration to the president's judicial nominees," said Curt Levey, executive director of the conservative Committee for Justice, who attended the speech.

Though short on specifics, Mr. Leahy criticized the program of wiretapping without warrants and said he hopes to update the laws governing foreign intelligence warrants. "With meaningful oversight and cooperation from this administration, we can achieve the right balance," he said.

Sen. Jon Kyl, Arizona Republican and Judiciary Committee member, defended the president's program, aimed at capturing communications of terrorist plotters.

"Protecting legitimate privacy rights while ensuring the safety and security of the American people from terrorists is not a zero-sum game," he said in response to Mr. Leahy's comments. "We have done and can do both. Indeed, we should be seeking ways to add more tools to fight terrorists, not begin dismantling the effective laws Congress has passed in recent years."

Mr. Leahy said he wants Congress to reconsider legislation denying habeas corpus rights to terrorism suspects held at the U.S. Naval Base Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

He also said he hopes to make "further progress" on the Senate's immigration reform bill, which proposes a path to citizenship for most of the estimated 12 million to 20 million illegal aliens in the country.

"We made some bipartisan progress on the committee and in the Senate last year only to be stymied by Republican congressional leaders," he said. "We can work together to bring people out of the shadows, to treat hardworking people with dignity and respect rather than disdain and discrimination."

Mr. Leahy criticized Bush nominations to the federal bench. "For too long, this White House has used judicial nominations for partisan political purposes and refused to work with us on consensus nominees," he said.

Those remarks reopened a rift with conservatives, who see only partisan politics in Senate Democrats' filibusters of several nominations.

Mr. Levey said Mr. Leahy's calls for consultation overlook the Constitution, which gives the president the "sole power of appointing judges."

"Leahy apparently views himself as the president's partner in selecting nominees, rather than as part of the limited advice-and-consent process envisioned for the Senate by the Constitution," he said. "Moreover, when Senator Leahy speaks of wanting 'consensus' judicial nominees, what he appears to have in mind are nominees that are acceptable to the coalition of ultraliberal groups that have orchestrated much of the opposition to the president's judicial picks."

Panel To Focus On Civil Liberties (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 13 — The Senate Judiciary Committee plans to create a Subcommittee on Human Rights and the Law to examine issues like torture, war crimes and human trafficking, the incoming chairman of the panel said on Wednesday.

In a speech outlining an agenda of “restoration, repair and renewal,” the new chairman, Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, said that the new subcommittee would bring a focus to efforts to protect civil liberties.

The announcement seemed to underscore Mr. Leahy’s intention to use oversight more aggressively than Republicans had.

“This has been an unfortunate chapter in Congress’s history,” Mr. Leahy said of the recent years of Republican control.

“I have never seen a Congress so willfully derelict in its duties as during this administration,” he added.

Mr. Leahy, in an appearance at the Georgetown University law school, accused the White House of “corrosive unilateralism” in refusing to cooperate with Congress. After the September 2001 attacks, he said, “the White House accelerated its power plays at the expense of the other branches of government — all in the name of fighting terrorism.”

The Bush administration, Mr. Leahy said, had “brazenly refused to answer the legitimate oversight questions of the public’s duly elected representatives and it has acted outside the lawful authority to wiretap Americans without warrants and to create databanks and dossiers on law-abiding Americans without following the law and without seeking legal authorization.”

He said the administration had made judicial appointments for “partisan political purposes and refused to work with us on consensus nominees.” Bipartisan nominating panels should be considered to screen candidates, Mr. Leahy said.

A spokesman for the Justice Department, Brian Roehrkasse, said in a statement, “As we have in the past six years, we’re looking forward to working with the Senate Judiciary Committee, including working with the committee to provide information that it legitimately needs.”

“In the past we’ve reached accommodations on working together,” Mr. Roehrkasse said; “we expect we can do so in the future as well.”

DOJ_NMG_0106349

Conservative groups quickly issued statements denouncing Mr. Leahy's speech. Curt Levey, executive director of the Committee for Justice, said, "When Mr. Leahy speaks of wanting 'consensus' judicial nominees, what he appears to have in mind are nominees that are acceptable to the coalition of ultra-liberal groups that have orchestrated much of the opposition to the president's judicial picks."

Leahy Threatens To Subpoena Bush Officials (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — The incoming chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee said Wednesday that he would subpoena Bush administration officials if they refused requests for documents and testimony, including two long-sought memos detailing its detention and treatment of terrorism suspects overseas.

The comments by Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) represent the strongest and most specific statements yet directed at the White House on the investigative agenda of the Democratic leaders poised to assume control of Congress in January.

Leahy's threat shows the depth of frustration among Democrats who believe the administration has withheld crucial details about some of the most provocative anti-terrorism moves since the Sept. 11 attacks.

"I expect to get the answers. If I don't … then I really think we should subpoena," Leahy said after a speech at Georgetown law school. "If the president wants to claim executive authority, then let him do so, and then we can determine where we go from there."

The remarks signaled a possible legal confrontation with the White House over what Democrats and many legal scholars view as its expansive and unchecked use of executive power. It also marks a possible return to the use of an oversight tool that has been all but forgotten by the Republican-led Congress over the first six years of the Bush administration.

"I'm not trying to set up the idea of a confrontation for the sake of a confrontation," Leahy said. "I hope people will pay attention, will answer questions. We'll try it that way first."

Leahy has his sights set on two administration documents that have been among the most controversial for human rights and civil liberties groups concerned about the U.S. response to the Sept. 11 attacks and the Iraq war.

One is a presidential order signed by Bush authorizing the CIA to set up secret prisons outside the United States to house terrorism suspects. The other is a 2002 Justice Department memorandum outlining "aggressive interrogation techniques" that could be used against terrorism suspects.

Though the two documents have been known about for years, the Bush administration has kept them under wraps, only acknowledging their existence this fall after Bush transferred 14 detainees from the prisons to the military detention center at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, for possible trials.

Leahy has made a number of sweeping demands for documents about the treatment of detainees from the Justice Department and other agencies, only to have most of them returned unanswered. Last month, he made a request to Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales for the presidential order and Justice Department memo. Leahy said he expected Gonzales to testify before the judiciary committee "soon."

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said Wednesday that the request was being reviewed.

"The department will continue to work closely with the Congress as they exercise their oversight functions, and we will appropriately respond," Roehrkasse said, adding that the department would work with the committee "to provide information that it legitimately needs."

"In the past we've reached accommodations, and working together we expect we can do so in the future as well," he said.

The issuance of subpoenas would mark a new and combative chapter in that relationship.

For years, the Republican-controlled Congress has relied on the administration to voluntarily provide testimony and documents, reinforcing its reputation, at least among Democrats, as a rubber stamp for Bush policies. The judiciary committee has issued subpoenas in recent years, but they have tended to target private firms rather than government figures.

Though Leahy said he would appeal to the administration's sense of bipartisanship, he also indicated that Congress might not hesitate to ensure compliance with its requests.

Legal experts said the most effective way to enforce a subpoena is to use the power to withhold funds from administration projects or to refuse to consider nominees who require Senate approval — courses that Leahy said the committee would consider.

"Congress has the ability to make sure that the president does what the Constitution requires him to do to faithfully execute the laws," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0106350

Leahy also said he would press for more information about the administration's domestic surveillance program under which the National Security Agency has monitored communications between suspected terrorists abroad and people in the U.S. without first obtaining a warrant.

Congress considered legislation this fall that would essentially ratify the controversial program, which one federal court has found to violate the Constitution. But Leahy said he could not support any such legislation until he knew more about the program.

Leahy also promised tougher legislation to crack down on war profiteering by private contractors in Iraq, and restrictions on the government's ability to secretly collect dossiers on airline travelers. He said he would push to overturn portions of the new Military Commissions Act of 2006 that stripped terrorism suspects of the right of habeas corpus to challenge their detention in the courts.

He also said he would set up a new judiciary subcommittee to oversee international human rights issues, including torture.

"This election was an intervention," he said. "The American people rose up to take away Congress' rubber stamp, and to demand a new direction with more accountability."

U.S. Warns Of Threat To Satellites (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, December 14, 2006

The Bush administration warned Wednesday against threats by terrorist groups and other nations against U.S. commercial and military satellites, and discounted the need for a treaty aimed at preventing an arms race in space.

Undersecretary of State Robert G. Joseph also reasserted U.S. policy that it has a right to use force against hostile nations or terror groups that might try to attack American satellites or ground installations that support space programs. President Bush adopted a new U.S. space policy earlier this year.

"We reserve the right to defend ourselves against hostile attacks and interference with our space assets," Joseph said in prepared remarks to the George C. Marshall Institute.

Joseph, the senior arms control official at the State Department, said nations cannot all be counted on to use space purely for peaceful purposes.

"A number of countries are exploring and acquiring capabilities to counter, attack, and defeat U.S. space systems," Joseph said

He also said terrorists "understand our vulnerabilities and have targeted our economy in the past, as they did on 9/11." He said terrorists and enemy states might view the U.S. space program as "a highly lucrative target," while sophisticated technologies could improve their ability to interfere with U.S. space systems and services.

Joseph did not identify terror groups or nations that might have such motives. An aide to Joseph, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the matter, said that information was classified.

"For our part, we must take all of these threats seriously because space capabilities are essential" to the U.S. economy and government, Joseph said. He said the U.S. is more reliant on space than any other country.

"No nation, no state-actor, should be under the illusion that the United States will tolerate a denial of our right to the use of space for peaceful purposes," he said.

Wade Boese, a spokesman for the private Arms Control Association, challenged the adminstration's policy. He said rejecting additional international arms controls for space runs counter to U.S. security interests "because the United States has the most to lose from an unregulated space arena."

Boese said he believes the administration wants to avoid negotiations in order to preserve the possibility of deploying space-based missile defense systems, such as interceptors.

Joseph listed telecommunications, transportation, electrical power, water supply, gas and oil storage, transportation systems, emergency services, banking and finance, and government services as relying heavily on data transmitted by satellites.

"The United States views the purposeful interference with its space systems as an infringement on our rights," he said, adding. "If these rights are not respected, the United States has the same full range of options — from diplomatic to military — to protect its space assets as it has to protect its other critical assets."

Joseph ruled out negotiating a new international space agreement, saying the 1967 Outer Space Treaty established an effective arms control regime. The treaty bans the stationing of weapons of mass destruction in outer space and declares outer space should be used only for peaceful purposes.

A new agreement is not necessary, Joseph said. "We should concentrate on real threats," he said, citing Iran and North Korea.

"There is no arms race in space and we see no signs of one emerging," he said.

U.S. To Defend Space With Military Force (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, December 14, 2006

The United States will use military force in space to protect satellites and other space systems from attack by hostile states or terrorists, the Bush administration's senior arms-control official said yesterday.

Robert Joseph, undersecretary of state for arms control and international security, said in a speech outlining a new White House space policy that free access to space is a "vital" U.S. interest and that the Bush administration opposes new agreements that would limit U.S. space defenses.

"To ensure free access to space ... we must continue to develop a full range of options to deter and defend against threats to our space infrastructure," Mr. Joseph said in a speech to the George C. Marshall Institute, a private think tank.

The United States will "oppose others who wish to use their military capabilities to impede or deny our access to and use of space," he said. "We will seek the best capabilities to protect our space assets by active or passive means."

"No nation, no non-state actor, should be under the illusion that the United States will tolerate a denial of our right to the use of space for peaceful purposes," he said. "We reserve the right to defend ourselves against hostile attacks and interference with our space assets," he said.

U.S. officials said the comments are an indirect warning to China, which has fired a ground-based laser gun at a U.S. satellite that passed over its territory -- an event viewed as one sign of Beijing's efforts to develop space arms that can blind or destroy systems.

Mr. Joseph said yesterday that a number of nations are developing weapons to "counter, attack and defeat U.S. space systems." He did not name the countries. Asked after the speech about the Chinese laser incident, he declined to comment.

"In view of these growing threats, our space policy requires us to increase our ability to protect our critical space capabilities and to continue to protect our interests from being harmed through the hostile use of space," he said.

The United States has become very reliant on the use of satellites for civilian communications as well as military command and control, with a large portion of government communications transiting space.

The White House announced in October that President Bush authorized a new national space policy, the first since 1996, that states that the United States is committed to the peaceful use of space and rejects any nation's attempts to claim sovereignty over it.

The policy also views any attempt to interfere with space systems as an infringement on the right of free passage in space, and describes space capabilities as "vital" to national interests.

Mr. Joseph said yesterday that space should be regarded similarly to open seas where free navigation is a right.

"If these rights are not respected, the United States has the same full range of options -- from diplomatic to military -- to protect its space assets as it has to protect its other critical assets," he said.

"There is also a broad range of means, both passive and active, by which space assets may be protected or the effects of the loss of their services minimized," he said.

Alternatives include non-space backup systems, satellites with onboard subcomponent replacement parts, satellite maneuvering systems to avoid threats, electronic and other system security, data encryption, and communications frequency shifts.

Mr. Joseph said the United States needs to use space systems as part of a strategy to manage crises, deter conflict or "if deterrence fails, prevail in conflict."

Both Russia and China have sought to introduce arms-control agreements at the United Nations designed to limit U.S. space weapons or defenses, and the Bush administration opposes the proposed agreements and talks.

Mr. Joseph said the Outer Space Treaty has been a long-standing and effective tool to guide international cooperation in space. New international agreements are "unnecessary and counterproductive," he said.

"We do not need to enter into new agreements; rather we should be seeking to gain universal adherence to existing agreements, including the 1967 Outer Space Treaty, and we should concentrate our efforts on real threats, such as those to the nuclear nonproliferation regime which, as a consequence of actions by Iran and North Korea, are under great strain," Mr. Joseph said.

Judge In Pakistan Dismisses Charges In Bomb Plot (NYT)

By Salman Masood

The New York Times, December 14, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0106352

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, Dec. 13 — A judge threw out terrorism charges on Wednesday against Rashid Rauf, a Briton of Pakistani descent whom prosecutors depicted as a major figure in a plot to smuggle liquid explosives onto trans-Atlantic airliners and detonate the bombs in flight.

The ruling means there are now no terrorism charges against two people once accused of being linchpins of a major bombing plot by Al Qaeda. The other is Tayib Rauf, Mr. Rauf's younger brother, who was detained in Britain in August and was soon set free without charge.

But it was not clear whether the ruling would clear the way for Rashid Rauf's return to Britain for questioning on other charges.

Reports of a bombing conspiracy created powerful strains between American and British investigators over the timing of a crackdown on suspects in which British authorities rounded up 25 people on Aug. 9 and 10, later charging 17 of them. The other eight, including Tayib Rauf, were set free without charges.

British officials involved in the case said that American investigators had pushed for quicker arrests but that the British had wanted to wait to gather admissible evidence.

One of seven people arrested in Pakistan in the case was Rashid Rauf, 25, who holds Pakistani and British citizenship. Pakistani officials identified him as a "key figure" and said he had contacts to Al Qaeda in Afghanistan.

But in Rawalpindi on Wednesday, Mr. Rauf appeared in a counterterrorism court and the judge dismissed most of the charges against him, upholding a defense objection that they lay outside the court's jurisdiction.

Mr. Rauf still faces some secondary charges in Pakistan and is being held by the authorities. Britain has requested his extradition, and Pakistani officials said they were considering the request.

"Rauf was booked under six charges, such as impersonation, cheating, forging documents, presenting those forged documents as real and keeping explosives," Hashmat Habib, his lawyer, said in a telephone interview.

"When we scrutinized the charges, we were of the opinion that none of the charges fell under the jurisdiction of the antiterrorism court. The court agreed with our objection."

Mr. Rauf is now scheduled to appear next Wednesday before a District and Sessions Court to answer the remaining charges, Mr. Habib said.

Mr. Rauf has not been charged in Britain in connection with any airline plot, and a Home Office spokeswoman said no extradition request had been made in relation to a plot.

Britain has, however, filed an extradition request for Mr. Rauf as a suspect in the murder of an uncle, Mohamed Saeed, who was stabbed near his home in Birmingham in April 2002.

Britain and Pakistan have no extradition treaty, so it is Pakistan's choice whether to permit extradition.

The British government offered no immediate comment on the case.

Accounts differ over when Rashid Rauf was arrested. The Pakistani police said he was taken into custody on Aug. 10, the day of the British raids, in Chohan Chowk, near the Islamabad airport. But Mr. Habib said his client was arrested the day before while traveling between Multan and Bahawalpur, in Punjab Province.

Mr. Rauf left Britain in 2002 to settle and marry in Bahawalpur. He was not a subject of scrutiny before his arrest in August, although the police had linked his wife's family to an outlawed Islamist group.

Terror-Free Investing (WSJ)

By Sarah Steelman

The Wall Street Journal, December 14, 2006

JEFFERSON CITY, Mo. -- The idea of "shareholder democracy" is today much bruited about, but whatever connotations that term has acquired, at bottom it means investors have a "vote" -- that is, they can choose where to put their money, and where not. That kind of democracy assumes a new urgency in the post-9/11 world, as tens of billions of dollars are currently surging into countries that sponsor terrorism.

According to the independent research provider Conflict Securities Advisory Group (CSAG), there are some 485 publicly traded companies doing business with four regimes designated by the State Department as sponsors of terror. The activities of these mostly foreign-owned companies -- such as Total, Sinopec and BNP Paribas -- in terrorist-sponsoring states generate billions in revenues for the governments of Iran, Sudan, North Korea and Syria.

By so doing, these companies create part of the cash flow that enables these nations to underwrite the activities that our armed forces are fighting around the world. Were they to stop doing business with our enemies, it would be vastly more difficult for those regimes to sponsor terrorism, finance weapons of mass destruction programs and threaten -- or, in the case of Sudan, engage in -- genocide.

In this case, shareholders -- citizens -- have the power to influence. If American investors in these businesses -- not only institutional investors such as public pension systems, money managers, investment trusts and university endowments, but also individuals -- pressure companies to sever such business relations, they can become change agents in the financial sector and force multipliers for our troops abroad.

It's high time we afford all American investors the opportunity to exert this influence by investing terror-free. That's why I am pleased to announce that the Missouri Investment Trust (MIT) became, in July of this year, the first public agency in America to implement a terror-free investment fund. This specially crafted, actively managed international fund screens out companies with ties to regimes involved with terrorism.

Our experience makes clear that it is possible for investors to hold these companies accountable for their business decisions by excluding their stocks from portfolios. We are proving that terror-free investing is a matter of choice, and that Wall Street will respond to the demand. What's more, it can be accomplished with leading investment firms and without sacrificing returns.

From a financial standpoint the results have been impressive. MIT, in conjunction with CSAG and Boston-based State Street Global Advisers, engaged in extensive due diligence. We backtested bidders' portfolios, for instance, and found that performance would not have been impaired over the past five years had the terror-free screen been in place.

The transition to the new fund was minimally disruptive. In fact, in the first quarter following its establishment, MIT's screened fund outperformed the MSCI EAFE index (the benchmark for international equities in developed Asian and European countries) by 74 basis points -- showing that this terror-free public fund will do well for Missourians while also doing good for America.

This result should not be surprising. The Securities and Exchange Commission determined years ago that companies conducting business in U.S.-sanctioned nations are exposed to "global security risk" -- risk that, in some cases, can negatively affect share value. Sadly, and somewhat shockingly, the vast majority of fiduciaries have, to date, ignored this financial risk, to say nothing of the ethical considerations, when investing in these companies.

Terror-free investing should not, however, be limited to public funds. Elected officials, fund managers, American corporations and Wall Street ought to afford this investment option to the maximum degree possible.

Toward that end, in 2007, Missouri's 529 College Savings Advisor Plan will make available to all American investors the Roosevelt Anti-Terror Multi-Cap Fund (RATF) -- the only mutual fund in the country that is currently certified to exclude companies that have business ties to the terrorist-sponsoring states referenced. Additionally, Missouri is actively pursuing the inclusion of an international terror-free fund in our 529 advisor plan line-up.

Missouri is not alone in believing that Americans want to invest terror-free. Nationwide Financial has elected to make this same certified fund available to investors through its vehicle for corporate 401(k) plans. Recently, Swiss America, a tangible asset firm located in Arizona, became the first Nationwide 401(k) client to offer its employees the RATF option. The vast majority of Swiss America's employees took advantage of this option. Nationwide is exploring how to make a terror-free investment option more available to its over 25,000-member private sector plan base.

More importantly, this type of shareholder activism has a long record of success. Over 20 years ago, companies responded to such pressure by freezing their business relations with South Africa until apartheid was abolished. In short order, the government maintaining that oppressive practice was forced first to abandon it and then to relinquish power.

Lincoln said it best: "We -- even we here -- have the power, and bear the responsibility." This American culture of civic engagement has made all the difference: encompassing everything dumping tea into a harbor to buying war bonds to serving in the armed forces.

By choosing to invest terror-free, we can help cut off financing for terror-sponsoring governments, help our soldiers, make our investments less risky and make a difference in the contemporary fight for liberty. That's democracy.

Ms. Steelman is state treasurer of Missouri.

A Fair Deal For 9/11's Injured (NYT)

By Kenneth R. Feinberg

The New York Times, December 14, 2006

FIVE years have passed since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, but the flood of litigation continues unabated in federal court in Manhattan. Some 6,000 people are suing New York City, the Port Authority and more than 100 private contractors for negligence in exposing workers to toxic dust and fumes after the collapse of the World Trade Center.

Thousands of additional claims are expected in the next few months. Waiting in the wings are approximately 40,000 workers who cleaned up the site after Sept. 11, as well as residents of Lower Manhattan, observers of the cleanup effort and people who simply breathed the harmful air on their way to work — all potential litigants. Some will probably eventually suffer the same ailments that have led to the current lawsuits.

The federal judge presiding over the lawsuits has urged settlement, warning that continuing the litigation is inefficient, expensive and risky to all parties. The mere existence of thousands of lawsuits fuels uncertainty and delays the payment of compensation to eligible victims.

Two local members of Congress have introduced federal legislation to provide compensation to people injured by the toxic dust. Congress is understandably reluctant: why open the doors of the federal Treasury yet again to New Yorkers and not provide something similar to the victims of the Oklahoma City bombing, Hurricane Katrina and other calamities? The government is generally not in the business of compensating the victims of life's misfortune.

The federal Sept. 11 Victim Compensation Fund, which I oversaw, paid more than $7 billion in public compensation to the families of those who died in the World Trade Center attacks and to injured survivors. Of that, about $500 million went to more than 1,300 recovery workers and others suffering from the same respiratory injuries that now plague those in the courtroom. Since none of these 6,000 people who have filed lawsuits received diagnoses of 9/11-related injuries until after the fund's filing deadline of Dec. 22, 2003, they were ineligible for compensation. So, reluctantly, they have turned to the courts.

There is a better way: use the principles of the 9/11 fund as a blueprint to resolve the current litigation and get money into the hands of recovery workers and others quickly.

More than $1 billion in public funds is currently available for distribution as part of the initial federal appropriation earmarked for New York City's 9/11 recovery. If you add financial contributions from those contractors and others involved in the litigation, and supplement that with funds from various city charities, a total of at least $1.5 billion is available to settle the pending lawsuits — more than sufficient to pay all eligible claims, as well as lawyers' fees and costs.

Eligibility for compensation under the settlement would require proof that the victim was in the general proximity of the World Trade Center during the cleanup period. Each claimant would also supply medical documentation of an illness caused by exposure to harmful air at the site (the medical criteria would be negotiated as part of the settlement to avoid a rush of spurious claims).

New York City and the other defendants would not admit they were at fault for these injuries; they would merely agree to use available funds to pay all documented claims. (It remains an open question whether the defendants are legally responsible for such injuries.) Up to half of this money should be set aside to pay for claims stemming from future diagnoses of injuries caused by breathing the toxic air.

As with the 9/11 fund, the neediest victims, those without a financial safety net, should be the priority. Firefighters, police officers and other uniformed responders at the World Trade Center already receive benefits from pension and health insurance policies, and these amounts should be subtracted from any payments made as a result of the settlement. Funds received by eligible claimants would be used primarily for medical monitoring and other health-related services.

And, just as the 9/11 fund should be viewed as a unique public policy response to an unprecedented national calamity, so, too, would this settlement be considered a one-time solution to all remaining physical injury claims occurring at the World Trade Center.

It is unlikely that such a settlement would expose New York City and others to future demands for similar compensation. The defendants and the court could make clear that the settlement was achieved only because of the existence of available funds and the unparalleled nature of the attack.

In any event, concern about future legal liability is no excuse for refusing to act now in compensating victims in distress.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Judge Upholds Detainee Rights Terror Law (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, December 14, 2006

A federal judge upheld the Bush administration's new terrorism law Wednesday, agreeing that Guantanamo Bay detainees do not have the right to challenge their imprisonment in U.S. courts.

The ruling by U.S. District Judge James Robertson is the first to address the new Military Commissions Act and is a legal victory for the Bush administration at a time when it has been fending off criticism of the law from Democrats and libertarians.

Robertson rejected a legal challenge by Salim Ahmed Hamdan, a former driver for Osama bin Laden whose case prompted the Supreme Court to strike down the Bush administration's policy on detainees last year.

DOJ_NMG_0106355

Following Hamdan's victory, Bush asked for and got a new law that established military commissions to try enemy combatants and stripped them of the right to seek their freedom in U.S. courts.

Hamdan's case was sent back before Robertson, a nominee of President Clinton who was a prominent civil rights advocate in private practice.

Though Robertson originally sided with Hamdan, he said that he no longer had jurisdiction to hear Hamdan's case because Congress clearly intended to keep such disputes out of federal courts. He said foreigners being held in overseas military prisons do not have the right to challenge their detention, a right people inside the country normally enjoy.

"This is the first time in the history of this country that a court has held that a man may be held by our government in a place where no law applies," said Barbara Olshansky, an attorney with the Center for Constitutional Rights, which has handled many detainee cases.

Justice Department spokeswoman Kathleen Blomquist said the agency was pleased with the ruling. Government lawyers have repeatedly argued that Guantanamo Bay detainees have no right to use U.S. courts. Blomquist noted that the new law allows detainees to challenge their detention before military tribunals, then contest the tribunal's ruling before a Washington appeals court.

"That is more process than the United States has ever provided to enemy combatants in our past conflicts," Blomquist said.

The ruling does not affect the fate of hundred of detainees whose cases are awaiting a ruling by a Washington appeals court, which is reviewing two precedent-setting detainee cases challenging the new law.

Judge Sets Back Guantánamo Detainees (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 13 — For the first time, a court has affirmed that a law enacted this fall accomplishes what the White House and its Congressional supporters sought: stripping the federal judiciary of the authority to hear challenges from detainees at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

In a ruling Wednesday, Judge James Robertson of the Federal District Court here said Salim Ahmed Hamdan, a prisoner at Guantánamo, could no longer contest his detention before a federal court because, Judge Robertson said, Congress this fall explicitly eliminated his right to file a habeas corpus challenge.

The judge said the Military Commissions Act, passed by Congress in September and signed into law by President Bush the following month, was unambiguous in denying Guantánamo detainees the use of a habeas corpus statute. Like Mr. Hamdan, hundreds of other prisoners at the base have challenged their detention, in similar cases.

It was Judge Robertson who granted Mr. Hamdan's habeas petition in November 2004, abruptly halting his war crimes trial in the middle of proceedings at Guantánamo by ruling that the process was fatally flawed.

But in his decision Wednesday, the judge said circumstances had changed fundamentally with enactment of the new law. And not only is Mr. Hamdan barred from a challenge under the habeas statute, the judge said, he cannot follow the usual second avenue to bring a habeas challenge — invoking the Constitution — because it is unclear that noncitizens at Guantánamo have that right.

Mr. Hamdan is a Yemeni who was a driver for Osama bin Laden in Afghanistan and was captured there in November 2001. He has been at the center of a debate about the Bush administration's legal tactics in fighting terrorism, his challenge occupying not only the White House but also Congress and the courts — up to the Supreme Court, which will almost certainly have to revisit the case.

The Supreme Court first ruled in the Hamdan case in June, when it repudiated the administration's efforts to put Guantánamo detainees on trial before military commissions. That 5-to-3 ruling said Mr. Bush had overstepped his constitutional bounds by establishing the commissions without Congressional authorization. Further, the justices said a previous law stripping Guantánamo detainees of habeas corpus protections did so only prospectively — that is, it did not void the several hundred habeas petitions already filed in federal courts.

In response, the Republican-controlled Congress adopted the Military Commissions Act to address, explicitly and retroactively, the question of the habeas statute's application to Guantánamo.

Judge Robertson's opinion on Wednesday said in effect that in enacting the new law, Congress and the president had undone the basis of the Supreme Court's ruling.

The judge said that although Mr. Hamdan was asserting that he was entitled to habeas protection because he had never been tried properly, he would soon "face a military commission newly designed, because of his efforts, by a Congress that finally stepped up to its responsibility, acting according to guidelines laid down by the Supreme Court."

DOJ_NMG_0106356

The issue of whether Mr. Hamdan and other Guantánamo detainees have a constitutional, rather than a statutory, right to habeas corpus is almost certain to form the heart of the legal debate that will next occur in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, before an ultimate decision by the Supreme Court. The appeals court is already considering the application of the new law in dozens of other habeas cases brought by detainees.

But by the time the cases make their way through the system, Mr. Hamdan and some other prisoners may have already been tried by military commissions, making the habeas issue moot as it applies to them.

Once the Military Commissions Act was adopted this fall, senior Pentagon officials said they hoped to resume war crimes trials before the newly reconstituted commissions by next summer. Mr. Hamdan, who has maintained that he was only a driver at the bin Laden farm and not a terrorist, may well be one of the first to go before the new commissions.

Judge Rejects Detention Challenge Of Bin Laden's Driver (WP)

By Robert Barnes

The Washington Post, December 14, 2006

A federal judge dismissed yesterday a challenge from Osama bin Laden's driver over his more than four years of detention at the Guantanamo Bay military prison, saying a new anti-terrorism law approved by Congress this fall removes the lower court's jurisdiction in the matter.

U.S. District Judge James Robertson is the first to rule on the controversial Military Commissions Act (MCA), which authorizes military trials of alleged enemy combatants and removes their right to try to bring their cases before federal judges.

Robertson dismissed Salim Ahmed Hamdan's petition because he said Congress clearly intended to keep such cases out of the federal courts. And he held that, as a foreigner with no voluntary ties to the United States, Hamdan has no claim to a constitutional right to habeas corpus.

The question of detainee rights prompted a Supreme Court ruling against the Bush administration's policies earlier this year, and it would not be surprising to see the administration's remedy -- the quickly produced MCA, passed by Congress in late September -- reviewed there as well.

"The issues in these cases won't be finally resolved until the Supreme Court resolves them," said David Remes, who represents another group of Guantanamo detainees challenging the law before the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit.

Nevertheless, the Justice Department celebrated the dismissal of Hamdan's case by Robertson, a civil rights advocate in private practice who was appointed to the bench by President Bill Clinton. He was also the first judge to invalidate the Bush plan for war tribunals when he first considered Hamdan's case in 2004.

"We are pleased that Judge Robertson agreed that the Military Commissions Act removes federal court jurisdiction over this and similar cases, and that the Military Commissions Act is constitutional," said Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse.

"The Constitution does not provide alien enemy combatants detained at Guantanamo Bay with the constitutional right to file a petition for habeas corpus in our civilian courts, and thus Congress may regulate those combatants' access to the courts," he said.

Beyond the legal wrangling, there is political pressure as well. Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), the incoming chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said in a speech yesterday before Robertson's decision that the MCA "needlessly undercut our freedoms and values" and that his committee will consider legislation to modify it.

He and other senators had questioned the constitutionality of suspending habeas corpus rights, one of the core principles of English and American law, which require the government to show a legal basis for detaining a person.

The Supreme Court twice, in 2004 and 2006, ruled against the Bush administration's procedures for detaining and trying alleged enemy combatants, but four justices said the president could seek from Congress the authority they said he lacked.

Robertson said that because it was clear he had been stripped of jurisdiction over Hamdan's habeas petition, he was not making a judgment on the constitutionality of the MCA. And he questioned at least part of the legislation.

He wrote that Congress could suspend the writ of habeas corpus only during a time of rebellion or invasion and that "neither . . . [was] occurring at the time the MCA was enacted."

But that does not help Hamdan, he wrote.

"Hamdan's lengthy detention beyond American borders but within the jurisdictional authority of the United States is historically unique," Robertson wrote. "Nevertheless . . . his connection to the United States lacks the geographical and volitional predicates necessary to claim a constitutional right to habeas corpus."

Guantanamo Inmates May Not Appeal, Judge Rules (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — In the first legal decision on a new federal law that denied access to U.S. courts to detainees in the war on terrorism, a federal judge ruled Wednesday that foreign prisoners held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, could not sue for their freedom.

But in a split decision, U.S. District Judge James Robertson also ruled that the law's denial of that right to the more than 12 million legal immigrants living in the United States was unconstitutional.

The first part of the ruling affirmed what Congress intended when it passed the Military Commissions Act in October. And appropriately enough, the decision came in the case of Salim Ahmed Hamdan, the onetime driver to Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden who had won what appeared to be a landmark victory in the Supreme Court in June.

Taking up Hamdan's suit, the high court's justices said President Bush had overstepped his power when he created a system of military tribunals for foreign-born alleged terrorists.

In response, Congress passed a law authorizing military tribunals. In addition, it moved to deny access to the courts to "aliens" who are accused by the president of being terrorists or "unlawful combatants."

Critics in the Senate said this provision was written so broadly that it took away from the nation's legal immigrants the traditional right of habeas corpus. This right allows those who are arrested and imprisoned to go before a judge and to plead for their freedom.

In Wednesday's ruling, Robertson said lawmakers had the legal power to close U.S. courts to detainees at Guantanamo Bay.

"Congress unquestionably has the power to establish and define the jurisdiction of the lower federal courts," he wrote in a 22-page opinion. Until some recent decisions, he said, it had always been understood that "an alien captured abroad and detained outside the United States" did not have a right to sue in a federal court.

Hamdan was captured in Afghanistan, and Guantanamo Bay is, technically, the sovereign territory of Cuba, Robertson noted.

However, the Constitution protects the right of habeas corpus for anyone living in the United States, the judge said. The Constitution says this right may be "suspended" during times of "rebellion or invasion."

"Neither rebellion nor invasion was occurring at the time the MCA was enacted," Robertson said, and Congress did not claim otherwise.

"Thus, the Great Writ has survived the Military Commissions Act," and any effort to block a person from going to court in this country "must be unconstitutional," the judge concluded.

The ruling clears the way for the Bush administration to go forward with a military trial of Hamdan. It is also likely to be the first of many decisions interpreting the new law.

Sens. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) and Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) also have announced they will seek to restore habeas rights for legal immigrants when the new Congress opens in January.

'04 Pentagon Report Cited Detention Concerns (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, December 14, 2006

A previously undisclosed Pentagon report concluded that the three terrorism suspects held at a brig in South Carolina were subjected to months of isolation, and it warned that their "unique" solitary confinement could be viewed as violating U.S. detention standards.

According to a summary of the 2004 report obtained by The Washington Post, interrogators attempted to deprive one detainee, Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri, a Qatari citizen and former student in Peoria, Ill., of sleep and religious comfort by taking away his Koran, warm food, mattresses and pillow as part of an interrogation plan approved by the high-level Joint Forces Command.

Interrogators also prevented the International Committee of the Red Cross from visiting at least one detainee, according to the report, which noted evidence of other unspecified, unauthorized interrogation techniques.

The report by the Navy's inspector general was presented to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld in May 2004 and was declassified in 2005. It was the first to raise the question of mistreatment of alleged enemy combatants inside the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0106358

Its details about conditions at the Navy brig in 2004 could prove critical to the fate of two of the "enemy combatant" detainees who spent years in the prison: Marri, the only one of the three who remains there and is facing the prospect of a special military trial, and Jose Padilla, a Brooklyn-born U.S. citizen now facing criminal charges in Miami.

Attorneys for Padilla have argued in recent court filings that any abusive interrogation methods used on their client may mean that his statements to government agents were coerced and, therefore, inadmissible in his trial. He is accused of engaging in a conspiracy to kill U.S. citizens and provide material support to terrorists abroad.

The attorneys told a federal judge in Florida yesterday that they have a right to learn about those interrogation methods, and they recently sought to subpoena Brig. Gen. Daryl D. Thiessen, the deputy inspector general who made the findings after inspecting the brig, and other senior military officers who worked at the prison. The attorneys said Padilla spent 1,307 days in a 9-by-7-foot cell in an isolated unit, was often chained to the ground for hours by his wrists and torso, and was kept awake at night by guards using bright lights and loud noises.

Prosecutors asked the judge to quash the subpoenas, arguing that Padilla's attorneys are making "meritless" and "sensationalist" claims to turn the court's attention away from his alleged misconduct. In previous filings, the government decried the "absurdity of Padilla's assertion" that he was abused, noting that the government was "conscientious enough to tend to his toothache."

Marri remains at the brig awaiting an appeals court ruling on whether he will be tried in a U.S. court or by a military commission, as the government requested last month. He sued the government last year over the conditions of his confinement, alleging that for 16 months in 2003 and 2004, he had been barred from contact with anyone but guards delivering food, causing his mental state to deteriorate.

Thiessen wrote in his summary that the Joint Forces Command had approved that "one detainee in Charleston has Koran, mattress, and pillow removed and is fed cold MRES as part of interrogation plan." He also noted concerns about isolation: "Limited number and unique status of detainees in Charleston precludes interaction with other detainees. Argument could be made that this constitutes isolation."

Extended solitary confinement can be considered a form of inhumane treatment. In 2003, Rumsfeld specified the use of isolation as an interrogation tactic, but he cautioned that its use required detailed plans and approvals from superiors for the length of time. His memo warned that use of isolation for more than 30 days was atypical, and that nations that consider detainees subject to prisoner-of-war protections may view this technique as "inconsistent with the requirements of Geneva [Article] III."

"What you're describing confirms what we said in our complaint," said Jonathan Hafetz of the Brennan Center for Justice and an attorney for Marri, when asked to review the summary findings. "There were periods of time when al-Marri felt he was losing his mind. He went months without hearing a human voice. . . . And these weren't rogue officers, but it was part of a deliberate violation of the laws of the U.S. by the top levels of the administration."

Padilla's attorneys -- Orlando do Campo, Andrew Patel and Michael Caruso -- did not return calls seeking comment or declined to comment. Federal prosecutors also declined to comment. A hearing is expected soon on whether Padilla's attorneys can question military officials about his treatment and the conditions at the brig.

A Pentagon spokesman, Navy Cmdr. J.D. Gordon, said multiple reviews of detention operations have not found policies that condoned abuse and have led to more consistent policies to prevent abuse.

"The reviews have resulted in numerous recommendations which have been implemented and have improved our detention operations," he said. "The Department of Defense policy is clear: We treat detainees humanely."

Thiessen's report is part of a larger review by Vice Adm. Albert T. Church III, then the Navy's inspector general. Rumsfeld ordered the wide-ranging military investigation to determine whether any interrogation policy for terrorism suspects had caused detainee abuse in U.S. military detention facilities.

The Church report presented to Congress in March 2005 concluded that there was no deliberate high-level policy that led to the numerous cases of mistreatment. Instead, it blamed inept leadership at low levels and confusion over changing interrogation rules.

Church focused on the conditions for foreign nationals held at Guantanamo Bay. But the details of what Thiessen found in the Charleston brig were not mentioned. When asked, high-ranking military officers asserted that the brig fared well in the review.

"The brig here has a good record, and the people who run it are well trained," then-Secretary of the Navy Gordon England told reporters in 2004.

A third prisoner at the brig, Yaser Hamdi, was released in 2004 after the Supreme Court ruled that the government could not hold him indefinitely without a trial, and after he agreed to U.S. conditions that he go to Saudi Arabia and give up his U.S. citizenship.

Staff researcher Julie Tate contributed to this report.

Federal Judge Asked To Decide If Padilla Is Competent For Trial (NYT)

By Deborah Sontag

The New York Times, December 14, 2006

Saying that he was mentally damaged as a result of his three years and eight months in a naval brig in South Carolina, lawyers for Jose Padilla asked a federal judge in Miami yesterday to determine his competency to stand trial on terrorism conspiracy charges.

Mr. Padilla, 36, a United States citizen who was publicly accused of plotting a dirty bomb attack and pronounced an enemy combatant in 2002, was transferred from military custody into the civilian law enforcement system earlier this year. But, his lawyers say, he has been unable to assist in his own defense, and mental health experts have been unable to help him or to help them deal with him.

"Jose's experience as a detainee was so traumatic that it's physically and mentally painful for him to answer the questions that we put to him," said Orlando do Campo, a federal public defender in Miami. "He just shuts down. We're covering a lot of the same area as his interrogators, and he doesn't want to relive it."

Saying that there was "sufficient cause" to conduct a competency hearing, the government, in papers filed yesterday, urged the judge to do so.

The government itself cited the affidavit of a psychiatrist for the defense, Dr. Angela Hegarty, who said that Mr. Padilla did not understand the nature and consequences of the proceedings against him and that he suffered "impairment in reasoning" as a result of post-traumatic stress disorder "complicated by the effects of prolonged isolation."

Mr. Padilla's lawyers said he opposed this request that his competency be evaluated. Dr. Hegarty, one of two mental health professionals who examined him, said Mr. Padilla was "fearful of being thought of as crazy." She described him as "hypervigilant," his eyes darting about, his face twitching into grimaces, his "startle response" on constant high alert.

Mr. Padilla's trial, which involves two other defendants also accused of running a "North American terror support cell," is scheduled to start on Jan. 22 and expected to last about five months. Even before the motion filed yesterday, a delay seemed possible or even probable because of the extensive pretrial litigation in the complex case.

Now the issue of determining Mr. Padilla's competency could freeze many matters. For instance, his lawyers have asked Judge Marcia G. Cooke of Federal District Court to dismiss the charges because of "pre-indictment delay" — Mr. Padilla was apprehended in May 2002 and indicted in November 2005 — because of failure to provide a speedy trial and because of "outrageous government conduct."

Judge Cooke set a hearing date for Monday to address these motions. But the government said yesterday that it would be pointless to discuss accusations of government misconduct based on Mr. Padilla's word if his competence was in question. The government vehemently denies that Mr. Padilla was mistreated in military custody.

Miami Terror Suspect Claims 'I Was Set Up' (CBS4)

CBS4, December 14, 2006

(CBS4) MIAMI A South Florida contractor arrested by the FBI along with 6 others for allegedly conspiring to commit terrorist acts is giving his side of the case from behind bars. Narseal Batiste wrote a 25-page letter to CBS4's Brian Andrews, in which he says he and his group never had terrorist intentions. Insteadm he said he and his "followers" were looking for money for their Liberty City religious organization.

The FBI tailed Batiste and his followers for months, generating hours of video surveillance as they built their case against them, saying they conspired with what they thought was a known terrorist organization to blow up federal buildings and Chicago's Sears Tower.

"I want you to know that I never had any intentions of doing a terrorist act," Batiste now says in his letter. "My group and I never had reason to harm anyone."

Batiste writes the FBI put drugs in food he and co-defendants Patrick Abraham were served by the FBI informant the night a surveillance tape was shot, on which Batiste talks about blowing up the Sears Tower. He wrote that he's simply telling the informant what he wanted to hear, just so he could get money from him for their church.

"That's why you see me playing with tissue boxes talking about blowing up the Sears Tower. I made it up right then and there," he wrote.

On the surveillance tape he is heard talkng about the Tower's weaknesses and where he would plant dynamite to take it down. He's also heard telling the informant he would need horses for an army of men to wage a war on the government in the chaos that would follow such an attack.

"If you listen to the words I was saying, it's unrealistic, such as I need horses," he wrote.

Batiste says he and his group were desperate for money, and that last September, a convenience store owner from Yemen offered assistance. He says the North Miami Beach shopkeeper, whom Batiste identifies as Abbas, teamed up with the feds to get help for his own financial and immigration problems by concocting the lies that led to Batiste and six others being arrested.

"He played like he was going to help us fix our new headquarters, because he knew our intentions were to help our community," he said in the letter. "Abbas starting talking crazy like 'I want to get Bush to stop the war in Iraq and I want to blow up something.'"

Batiste says he thought nothing of it because people can talk a lot of trash.

"Little did I know that Abbas was setting my group up to look like terrorists," he said.

"He even convinced me to play along with his conversation between him and his big brother because they said it would build a relationship tie with them and it would open the door to financial help from them."

Batiste says he went along with it. "He knew we were eager for funding and that I went into great financial stress. So he suggested I meet a rich Arab friend: His uncle from Yemen."

That "uncle" ended up being the FBI's second informant on the case, whom the government claims was passing himself off as a part of al Qaeda. Batiste identified him as Mohammed Abdul. Prosecutors have video tape of Batiste and Abdul meeting at an airport hotel, in which Abdul appears to guide the conversation toward jihad.

"As you can tell, the man doing all the talking in Mohammed Abdul," he wrote. "I was surprised he was asking the questions that he did ask."

Batiste blames the enire case on the government's first cooperating witness, the North Miami Beach convenience store owner, who was compensated for his efforts in the case both in cash and in the form of immigration assistance.

"The Government never had any reason to investigate us. It was Abbas who planted this lie against me for the soul fact of him needing money." "The Government, desperate though to catch a terrorist, followed him and began designing a case against us with manipulation, fear, and intimidation."

Batiste agreed to an on-camera interview with Brian Andrews, but after three weeks of wrangling with the Bureau of Prisons, the interview request was denied. BOP Spokeswoman Mercedes Feliciano declined to give details as to why, referring CBS4 to Batiste's court-appointed lawyer. We left several messages for Attorney Ana Jhones, but she hasn't returned any calls we've made to her since she was assigned to handle Batiste's defense several months ago. Jhone's unsucessfully tried to get a court order to prevent CBS and WFOR from airing portions of FBI surveillance tapes Prosecutors plan to use when trial begins next September.

Man Denies Planning Sears Tower Attack (WP/AP)

The Associated Press

The Washington Post, December 14, 2006

MIAMI -- A man accused of planning to blow up Chicago's Sears Tower and several federal buildings said he was never going to stage a terrorist attack, a statement released Wednesday said.

Narseal Batiste made the claims in a 25-page statement that his wife hand-delivered to WFOR-CBS4, reporter Brian Andrews said.

"I want you to know that I never had any intentions of doing a terrorist act," Batiste said in the handwritten document. "My group and I had never had reason to harm anyone."

Batiste and six others were arrested in June and accused of conspiring to blow up the Sears Tower and government buildings in Miami, New York, Washington and elsewhere.

Authorities have said the group's plot never got beyond the planning stage and the men didn't acquire explosives or weapons for the attack.

Batiste said he only told an FBI informant posing as an al-Qaida operative he planned to blow up the Sears Towers because that's what he thought the man wanted to hear. Batiste said he was hoping to get money from the informant so he could help his organization, which he said was called the Universal Divine Saviours.

"I made it up right then and there," Batiste said. "If you listen to the words I was saying, it's unrealistic, such as I need horses."

Batiste also blames a convenience store owner from Yemen, who he says befriended him and later teamed up with the informants, feeding them lies to help his own financial and immigration problems.

Batiste and the six others have pleaded not guilty to a four-count terrorism conspiracy indictment and face trial in March.

Telephone messages left after hours for Batiste's attorney and prosecutors were not immediately returned.

Liberty City Seven Leader Says He's Innocent Of Terror Charges (MH)

By Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, December 14, 2006

The reputed ringleader of the Liberty City Seven -- a group of minority men busted last June on terror charges in Miami -- claims he's no terrorist.

"I want you to know that I never had any intentions of doing a terrorist act," Narseal Batiste wrote in a 26-page statement hand-delivered by his wife to WFOR-CBS4 on Wednesday.

``My group and I had never had reason to harm anyone."

Batiste, in custody at the Miami Federal Detention Center, claims his organization wanted to raise money for the homeless and help youths in the black community.

The FBI and U.S. attorney's office take a decidely different view of Batiste and his followers, who belonged to a local Moorish religious sect. Last June, they were arrested on charges of plotting to launch terrorist attacks against the United States -- including scheming to blow up the Sears Tower in Chicago and FBI buildings in five cities.

Secret FBI recordings revealed that the alleged Sears Tower scheme was Batiste's idea. "If I can put up a building," said Batiste, who worked in construction, ``then I should definitely know how to bring one down."

An FBI informant of Arabic descent, posing as an al Qaeda operative, then came up with a fictitious plot that would become the foundation of the government's terror conspiracy case against the seven men, according to court records. The informant, called "Mohammad," led Batiste and the six others in a bayat -- loyalty oath -- to al Qaeda. He pulled them in to the scheme to attack federal buildings by first asking them to provide video of the FBI field office in North Miami Beach.

Batiste, in the statement prepared for WFOR-CBS4 reporter Brian Andrews, claims the FBI and its informant were bent on ``setting us up."

Authorities have denied the accusation, which will be a key defense issue at the trial set for Sept. 4, 2007.

Authorities Probe Foreign Student Seeking Commercial Truck-Driving HAZMAT License (FoxNews.com)

By Liza Porteus

FOX News, December 13, 2006

NEW YORK — Mohammed Yusef Mullawala wanted a license to transport hazardous materials and to learn how to drive commercial tractor trailers. There was nothing unusual about that, until he told his teacher that he only wanted to learn how to drive forward, and he wanted to learn fast.

That was enough to raise a red flag with Darleen Crawford, president of the Nationwide Tractor Trailer Driving School in Smithfield, R.I., where Mullawala took driving classes.

Federal and state authorities are investigating why Mullawala was seeking a commercial trucking license after his behavior raised flags at the Rhode Island driving school. Crawford said he was also insistent on taking the test necessary to earn a license to transport hazardous materials.

Mullawala, a 28-year-old citizen of India who is of Pakistani descent, is now in federal custody in Massachusetts on immigration violation charges.

"We are still digging into his background, digging into where he lived in Rhode Island, New York and New Jersey," Major Steven O'Donnell with the Rhode Island State Police told FOXNews.com on Wednesday. "A lot of still doesn't make any sense, why he would be doing what he was doing."

Crawford said Mullawala came to the school with a Rhode Island driver's license inquiring how to obtain a commercial driver's license within a month. It normally takes around eight weeks for a student to go through all of the required courses before he or she obtains a permit, she said.

"We've been doing this for quite a long time and a lot of things just didn't add up," Crawford said.

Crawford started documenting suspicious activity: Mullawala lived in New York City but traveled to Rhode Island for the driving classes; he missed his first day of classes; and he was very insistent on getting his hazardous material transport license.

But the fact that he only seemed interested in driving forward was the most concerning.

"We tell them from Day One, 'you will be backing up,' 'you'll be backing up every single day,'" Crawford said, adding that it normally takes two to three weeks of practice backing up before drivers get road permits and learn how to drive forward, among other things.

The situation was reminiscent of when some of the Sept. 11, 2001, hijackers told their flight-school instructor they were only interested in how to fly planes at certain altitudes, not so much how to land or take off.

"He was just really pushing to get out of here," Crawford said. "I've been doing this for 30 years so you just sort of know when something doesn't feel right."

After Mullawala took two classes, Crawford contacted Highway Watch, which had conducted an anti-terrorism and safety program at her school.

Jim Sutton, director of the Highway Watch's Information Sharing and Analysis Center, said it was the "calibrated judgment" of his five-person staff of former military, national intelligence and security officers that caused them to pass Mullawala's information on to federal authorities.

"Over a period of time, you learn that certain indicators are very valid, that they just stand out," Sutton said. "They're so anomalous to the norm that you say to yourself, 'there is something here. We need to pursue, we need to follow up.'"

In Mullawala's case, Sutton said, "there was a sense of urgency he had in finishing the course."

"Well, you don't learn those type of mechanical skills very fast," he added.

The ISAC contacted the Department of Homeland Security, which contacted Rhode Island state police.

A joint investigation was then launched by investigators from the Rhode Island State Fusion Center, the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force (JTTF) in Rhode Island, New York and New Jersey and the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

Investigators learned that when Mullawala obtained his driver's license from the Rhode Island Registry of Motor Vehicles, he gave a false statement indicating he was a Rhode Island resident. ICE then determined he was a citizen of India and in the United States on an expired temporary student visa.

On Tuesday, Mullawala went to state police headquarters thinking he was responding to another matter. He was then apprehended and turned over to ICE.

He's being held in the federal Suffolk County detention center in Boston until his immigration hearing in Boston, which is expected to be sometime within the next few weeks. He will be charged with overstaying his visa and is facing possible deportation back to India.

O'Donnell said his department, as well as the New York and New Jersey JTTFs, are investigating Mullawala's background and the residences he had in those three states.

Authorities have not yet turned up the names of any other specific individuals Mullawala may have been conspiring with.

"He didn't have family, he did have friends," O'Donnell said, adding that authorities are trying to track down people Mullawala was associated with in New York, where his most recent address is located.

That address is 161 84th Road in Jamaica, Queens, according to Rhode Island police. He also has a residence on Carpenter Street in Providence, R.I., which he apparently hasn't lived at since 2003.

Police are also studying a computer taken from one of Mullawala's residence, O'Donnell said, adding that the man apparently was a computer expert. They will look at his e-mails, as well as any Web sites he frequented. Any potential overseas connections will be handled by the FBI and DHS, O'Donnell said, although none have yet turned up.

An official at the New York JTTF office contacted by FOXNews.com said he could not comment on the status of this or any ongoing investigation.

More than 500,000 transportation workers — including school-bus drivers to mass transit workers — call in tips as part of the Highway Watch program, said spokesman John Willard. The Highway Watch ISAC vets the calls to determine which ones are substantial enough to pass on to federal authorities.

"We get a few hundred [calls] a month," Willard said. "They range from anything from 'there's a guy in his car on the side of a road' ... to 'I'm witnessing a crime' ... to 'there's this person who seems suspicious.'"

He added: "We've gotten a few of those we believe have led to very credible investigations."

The Highway Watch ISAC was first established by DHS in March of 2004. The original Highway Watch was set up in 1998 as a safety program and run by the American Trucking Association up until 2004. It added an anti-terrorism and security training program in the spring of 2002, which almost every major trucking company in the United States is now mandating for their drivers, Willard said.

The course teaches drivers how to keep themselves safe by always keeping their trucks locked, and not keeping the vehicles running when they're not in them. It also provides various emergency contact and tipline numbers.

But it also tells people what kinds of activity to be on the alert for.

"Casing," for example, can include activities such as an individual inquiring about details, of hazardous material deliveries. There was one situation in Florida where a man was seen videotaping hazardous material dropoffs, Willard said.

"We talk to them about how a typical terrorist act is carried out," he added. "Terrorists typically don't wake up on Tuesday morning and blow something up on Tuesday afternoon. It normally goes through an extensive process of targeting, casing, etc… The first thing we do is make drivers aware of that process."

BEWARE OF ILLEGAL ALIENS SEEKING HAZMAT LICENSES Wed Dec 13, 5:47 AM ET

What's the harm in allowing illegal aliens to have driver's licenses? After all, they're just all here innocently doing the jobs Americans won't do, right? And since they're already here, we might as well let them drive legally, right? We'll all be safer, right?

Wrong. Wrong. Wrong.

Driver's licenses are tickets into the American mainstream. They allow residents to establish an identity and foothold into their communities. They help you open bank accounts, enter secure facilities, board planes -- and drive tractor-trailers carrying hazardous materials.

But there aren't any illegal aliens out there who would use fraudulently obtained driver's licenses to threaten Americans, right? That's just xenophobic scare-mongering, right?

Wrong again.

Last week, law enforcement officials arrested an illegal alien enrolled at a Smithfield, R.I., tractor-trailer training school who was trying to obtain a commercial driver's license and permit to haul hazardous materials. Not many people paid attention. You should. Illegal alien Mohammed Yusef Mullawala, 28, of Jamaica, N.Y., had obtained driver's licenses from New York, New Jersey and Rhode Island. He was reportedly in a hurry to get a commercial driver's license and a permit to haul hazardous cargo.

Because he's just so passionate about the job, right? Yeah.

A joint investigation was initiated by investigators from the Rhode Island State Fusion Center, the Federal Bureau of Investigation Joint Terrorism Task Force in Rhode Island, New York & New Jersey, and the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement after driver's school officials became concerned about his suspicious behavior. "His behavior was consistent with terrorist-type activity," Maj. Steve O'Donnell of the Rhode Island state police told the press. "He showed no interest in learning the fine art of driving a tractor-trailer. He had no interest in learning how to back up." Sort of like learning how to steer a plane, but not take off or land.

News | News Photos | Images | Web" /> Homeland Security of Mullawala's suspicious behavior. (They will no doubt be labeled Islamophobes and bigots by the usual grievance-mongering mob.)

And once again, it was enforcement of immigration laws that played a critical role in detaining him. Like some of the 9/11 hijackers and several al Qaeda operatives identified in the United States over the past decade, Mullawala was here on a temporary student visa that he had overstayed.

Must I remind you that the 9/11 hijackers obtained some 364 separate pieces of identification, including driver's licenses, in order to conduct their murderous business? Hijackers Hani Hanjour and Khalid Almihdhar conspired with illegal alien day laborers at a Falls Church, Va., 7-Eleven to obtain government-issued photo IDs. Three other hijackers obtained IDs at an Arlington, Va., DMV.

News | News Photos | Images | Web" /> FBI has put law enforcement officials on high alert for U.S.-based operatives connected to al Qaeda who may be in possession of commercial driver's licenses and may be planning to use truck bombs.

In Boston, suspected al Qaeda agent and illegal alien Nabil al-Marabh obtained a license permitting him to drive semi-trucks containing hazardous materials, including explosives and caustic materials.

In Minneapolis, suspected al Qaeda operative Mohamad Elzahabi, who obtained a green card through a fake marriage, was able to obtain a commercial driver's license to drive a school bus and to haul hazardous materials -- despite FBI knowledge that Elzahabi had been tied to terrorism.

Earlier this year, more than 200 Somalian and Bosnian immigrants illegally obtained Missouri commercial driver's licenses or certifications to handle hazardous materials through a West Plains truck-driving school that had a contract with the state, according to federal prosecutors. In just a few short weeks, Democrats led by Nancy Pelosi -- a staunch opponent of strengthened ID laws and strict immigration enforcement -- will reassume power in Washington. An open borders-friendly White House has expressed willingness to deal with them. So we know who supports illegal alien workers and potential terrorist drivers waiting for amnesty. But who will stand up for us?

WAR NEWS:

Bush Warns He Won't Be Rushed On Plans For Iraq (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel And Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush on Wednesday defended his decision to put off his widely anticipated shift in Iraq policy until early next year, saying he wanted his new Defense secretary to weigh in and warning he would not be rushed into making a decision on how to proceed.

As part of his review, Bush held another round of discussions with senior officials involved in Iraq planning, this time meeting the Joint Chiefs of Staff at the Pentagon, along with outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and his successor, former CIA Director Robert M. Gates.

Although Bush declined to comment on the advice he received from the military leaders, Pentagon officials have said in recent days that top uniformed officers largely have rejected recommendations made by the Iraq Study Group to withdraw most combat forces over the next 15 months, a rejection Bush appeared to agree with.

Instead, many military commanders have voiced support for a sharp increase in troops as part of a last-ditch effort to restore order, a suggestion Bush has not rejected.

"I've heard some ideas that would lead to defeat," Bush said of his monthlong consultation process. "I reject those ideas — ideas such as leaving before the job is done, ideas such as not helping this [Iraqi] government take the necessary and hard steps to be able to do its job."

A surge in troops?

Speaking after the 90-minute meeting in the Joint Chiefs' secure conference room known as "the tank," Bush denied that his views amounted to a rejection of the Iraq Study Group report. But he warned that any sign of U.S. weakness in Iraq would undermine moderate Arab allies in the region and could allow extremists to control crucial oil reserves.

"If we lose our nerve, if we're not steadfast in our determination to help the Iraqi government succeed, we will be handing Iraq over to an enemy that would do us harm," Bush said.

The president's dismissal of any near-term reduction in U.S. troop strength has raised the prospect that he might embrace a surge in the number of American forces in Iraq, at least over a period of a few months.

A troop increase has been opposed by Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, commander of U.S. forces in the Middle East, but it has been embraced by a growing number of military advisors inside and outside the Pentagon, several of whom have pressed the case to Bush in recent weeks.

That group may be joined today by retired Army Gen. John Keane, an influential former vice chief of staff who met with Bush earlier in the week. Keane is to appear at the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative Washington think tank, to present a plan for a troop increase that was developed by think tank military analyst Frederick W. Kagan.

According to the think tank, other influential current and former military leaders contributed to the report, including retired Lt. Gen. David W. Barno, former commander of U.S. forces in Afghanistan. Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), the incoming chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, continued to press Bush to begin a withdrawal to send a clear signal to the Iraqi government that U.S. troop commitment was not open-ended.

He added, however, that he did not see Bush's delay in deciding on a new way forward as a mistake.

"I'd rather the right conclusion be reached in January than the wrong conclusion be reached in December," Levin told reporters after a speech at the Brookings Institution in Washington.

Democrats have been more receptive to recommendations of the Iraq Study Group, led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), which included a push to reach out to Iraq's meddlesome neighbors, Syria and Iran.

Sen. Bill Nelson (D-Fla.), a member of the Armed Services and Foreign Relation committees, met on Wednesday with Syrian President Bashar Assad in Damascus. After the meeting, Nelson said Assad had "clearly indicated a willingness to cooperate" in securing Syria's border with Iraq, the Associated Press reported.

Bush has resisted negotiations with either country, citing their support for Iraqi insurgents and the Hezbollah militia in Lebanon.

Talks with Kurdish leaders

Bush on Wednesday also talked by telephone to Iraq's two most prominent Kurdish leaders, Iraqi President Jalal Talabani and Massoud Barzani, president of Iraq's Kurdish provinces, to explore the possibility of forming a coalition of moderates within the Iraqi parliament.

Administration officials have suggested such a move as a way of marginalizing Shiites loyal to radical cleric Muqtada Sadr and Sunni groups with links to the insurgency.

Advocates see the strategy as a way to free the hand of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki, who remains reliant on Sadr's allies for his political base.

Bush appeared to support such an initiative Wednesday. "These men have been outspoken about the desire to have a moderate governing coalition, which we support," he said of his conversation with the Kurdish leaders.

DOJ_NMG_0106366

U.S. and Iraqi officials have acknowledged such a plan is still under consideration, but it faces significant hurdles, including a backlash from Sadr, whose Al Mahdi army is the most formidable Shiite militia in Iraq. In addition, officials said, it could be opposed by Iraq's most influential religious leader, Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, who has urged all Shiite leaders to stick together.

Bush: I Won't Be Rushed On Iraq (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, December 14, 2006

President Bush said Wednesday he would "not be rushed" into a decision on a strategy change for Iraq, saying that in a round of consultations he heard both some interesting ideas and some "ideas that would lead to defeat."

"And I reject those ideas," Bush said after meeting with top generals and Defense Department officials at the Pentagon. He said those ideas included "leaving before the job is done, ideas such as not helping this (Iraqi) government take the necessary and hard steps to be able to do its job."

Bush spoke with reporters after wrapping up a round of high-level talks on revising his Iraq war policy. Earlier he spoke by telephone with two Kurdish leaders in Iraq as part of what the White House called efforts to forge a "moderate bloc" behind the shaky central government in Baghdad.

Standing with the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Bush said he and the nation's top military commanders had "a very candid and fruitful discussion about how to secure this country and about how to win a war that we now find ourselves in."

Bush made it clear that "there has been a lot of violence in Iraq. The violence has been horrific."

Although the White House had initially suggested that Bush would deliver his speech on Iraq strategy before Christmas, he has decided to delay it until early next year.

Defending that decision, Bush said, "I will not be rushed into making a difficult decision ... a necessary decision."

Joined by Vice President Dick Cheney, incoming Defense Secretary Robert Gates and outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, Bush met with the military leaders and other members of his national security team at the Pentagon, where war commanders are calling for more U.S. trainers and equipment for beleaguered Iraqi forces.

He addressed some of his remarks to members of the nation's military, including some 140,000 now stationed in Iraq. "I appreciate their sacrifices, and I want them to know I'm focused on developing a strategy that will help them achieve their mission," the president said.

"I know there is a lot of debate at home, and our troops pay attention to that debate," Bush said. Directing his remarks to the troops, he said: "It means I'm listening to a lot of advice to develop a strategy to help you succeed."

Bush's meeting at the Pentagon lasted more than 90 minutes.

Bush said part of the reason for his putting off his speech to next year was to allow Gates to familiarize himself with the top defense job "and be part of this debate."

"At the appropriate time, I'll stand up in front of the nation and say, `here's where we're headed,'" Bush said.

Bush pledged anew to work with the Democratic-controlled Congress that convenes in January "to forge greater bipartisan consensus" on Iraq policy.

Asked by a reporter if recommendations made a week ago by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group included some of the bad advice he had cited, Bush said that his opinion of the report "hasn't changed."

"I thought it was interesting that Republicans and Democrats could work in concert to help achieve an objective," Bush said. The panel was headed by former Republican Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton, D-Ind.

On Tuesday, in similar discussions with field commanders, Bush heard Gen. John Abizaid, top U.S. commander in the Middle East, and Gen. George Casey, the top general in Iraq, ask the administration to pour increased funding into more armored vehicles, body armor and other critical equipment for the Iraqis, said a defense specialist familiar with the meetings. The source requested anonymity because the discussions were private.

Abizaid has told the Senate Armed Services Committee that troop levels in Iraq need to stay fairly stable and the use of military adviser teams expanded. About 140,000 U.S. troops and about 5,000 advisers are in Iraq.

The message to Bush, the defense specialist said, is that the U.S. cannot withdraw a substantial number of combat troops by early 2008, as suggested by the independent commission on Iraq, because the Iraqis will not be ready to assume control of their country.

Iraqi leaders, meanwhile, last month presented Bush with a plan for its troops to assume primary responsibility for security in Baghdad early next year and that U.S. troops be shifted to the capital's periphery, The New York Times reported on its Web site Tuesday night.

DOJ_NMG_0106367

Bush already has visited this week with State Department officials to review options, hosted a few outside Iraq experts, and met with Iraq's Sunni vice president, Tariq al-Hashemi. Last week, the president held talks with the leader of the largest Shiite bloc in Iraq's parliament, Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, and with British Prime Minister Tony Blair, the president's staunchest war ally.

On Wednesday, Bush placed calls to Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, and Massoud Barzani, president of the Kurdish region.

Bush's discussions across Iraq's ethnic and religious lines come as major partners in the country's governing coalition are in behind-the-scenes talks to form a new parliamentary bloc and sideline supporters of the radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, a vehement opponent of the U.S. military presence and the main patron of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. There is discontent in Iraq and within the Bush administration over al-Maliki's failure to rein in Shiite militias and quell raging violence.

President Bush Offers New Clues On His Plans For Iraq (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson

McClatchy Newspapers, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON - Acknowledging that "our enemy is far from being defeated," President Bush assured U.S. troops Wednesday that he would come up with a better plan for victory in Iraq.

"I've heard some ideas that would lead to defeat, and I reject those ideas - ideas such as leaving before the job is done," Bush said after a Pentagon briefing. "We're not going to give up. The stakes are too high and the consequences too grave to turn Iraq over to extremists."

The president's comments offered clues to his thinking as he prepares to announce a revised policy for Iraq early next month. He said he's looking for a plan that combines military action, political reconciliation, economic development and diplomatic efforts to get more help from Iraq's regional neighbors.

The resolute tone of his remarks may have delivered his clearest message: Standing with the Joint Chiefs of Staff at the Pentagon, Bush assured U.S. troops that he has no intention of leaving Iraq until they finish the job of establishing a stable democracy.

Speaking directly to the troops, he declared his "unshakable commitment" to his goals for Iraq. "We're going to give you the tools necessary to succeed," he said, "and a strategy to help you succeed."

That was in stark contrast to the tone of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group's report, unveiled last week. Its opening words: "The situation in Iraq is grave and deteriorating."

The panel said most U.S. combat troops could be out of Iraq by early 2008, and it urged Bush to make Iraqis responsible for their security as soon as possible.

Although Bush said he found "some good ideas" in the Iraq Study Group's recommendations, his analysis differed from the panel's findings.

Bush described a fight pitting allied U.S. and Iraqi forces against "the enemy" - which he defined at one point as "terrorists and insurgents and death-squad leaders." The study group said U.S. troops face a complex mix of spreading sectarian violence between Shiite and Sunni Muslim Iraqis; anti-American insurgents; and a relatively small number of al-Qaida terrorists.

The group's report also made clear that sectarian militiamen have infiltrated Iraq's military and police units and that many soldiers and police are more loyal to radical clerics than to the central Iraqi government.

The next chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee sided with the study group on Wednesday.

"Nothing will get the attention of the Iraqi leaders like the prospect of some American troops leaving Iraq," Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., said in a speech endorsing the study group's approach. "When they finally understand that our military presence in Iraq is neither permanent nor unconditional, they are far more likely to take the political steps necessary to deal with sectarian violence and to defeat the insurgency."

Levin will chair the Armed Services panel when Democrats take control of Congress next month. He favors a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops beginning in four to six months.

Bush didn't address reports that his military advisers are considering proposals to send as many as 20,000 more U.S. troops to Iraq to help train Iraqi security forces. The study group said a surge of advisers to join the 140,000 troops already in Iraq could help clear the way for withdrawal.

"I've heard interesting ideas," Bush said. "At the appropriate time, I will stand up in front of the nation and say, `Here's where we're headed.'"

The president said he's working to push Iraq's government to forge political reconciliation among the rival groups splintering the country.

"It's my job to convince the al-Maliki government to make the hard decisions necessary to move the country forward," Bush said, referring to Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. "But the good news is, he agrees."

DOJ_NMG_0106368

Bush said he'd placed phone calls Wednesday to two Iraqi Kurdish leaders, pressing the same goal. He said he'd continue to press friendly regional governments in Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Jordan and Turkey to use their influence on Iraq's behalf. He and his advisers have rejected the study group's recommendations for direct talks with Syria and Iran.

Bush dismissed calls for fast action on delivering a new strategy. He'd hoped to announce his plans next week but pushed back his speech until early next year. He's been consulting widely and said he wants his new secretary of defense, Robert Gates, to participate in the policy review. Gates will be sworn in on Monday.

"I will be delivering my plans after a long deliberation, after steady deliberation," the president said. "I'm not going to be rushed into a difficult decision."

Bush Consults With Pentagon On Iraq (NYT)

By David Stout

The New York Times, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 13 -- President Bush said today that he would not be "rushed" into deciding on a new course of action in Iraq, and that United States troops would not leave the country "before the job is done" and Iraq is free and stable.

"We're not going to give up," Mr. Bush said at the Pentagon, after discussing the Iraq situation with senior Defense Department officials and military leaders. "The stakes are too high, and the consequences too great."

While Mr. Bush said he and the Pentagon leaders had discussed "how to win a war that we now find ourselves in," he avoided using the term "victory" and referred instead to devising "a strategy to succeed" and an approach to help American troops in Iraq "achieve their mission."

In vowing that he would not be hurried, the president said he will announce his plans after "a long deliberation." He also sounded themes he has articulated for many months. Mr. Bush asserted, for example, that a free and stable Iraq will be an example to other countries and peoples in the Middle East and an ally of the United States in the campaign against extremists. And he said he envisioned an Iraq that is self-sustaining, self-governing and able to defend itself.

With members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff behind him, Mr. Bush said he had a message for the men and women of the United States who are in Iraq. "I'm listening to a lot of advice to develop a strategy to help you succeed," Mr. Bush said. "You have my unshakeable commitment."

He also said he was open to new ideas, including some outlined by the Iraq Study Group, which urged a change of course in Iraq.

Mr. Bush said he was confident that Iraq's Prime Minister, Kamal al-Maliki, wants his country to be politically unified, and that the great task facing his government and Washington involves a diplomatic campaign as well as a military one.

The president is to spell out a new strategy for Iraq in early January. For today, he was deliberately vague -- the better, he said, to keep getting valuable, interesting advice.

And while Mr. Bush pledged to work with the new, Democratic-controlled Congress on Iraq, he warned that to leave Iraq precipitously would be to hand that country over to "an enemy that would do us harm," an enemy whose deadliness was demonstrated on Sept. 11, 2001.

But that will only happen, he said, "if we lose our nerve, if we're not steadfast in our determination."

Joint Chiefs Advise Change In War Strategy (WP)

By Robin Wright And Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, December 14, 2006

The nation's top uniformed leaders are recommending that the United States change its main military mission in Iraq from combating insurgents to supporting Iraqi troops and hunting terrorists, said sources familiar with the White House's ongoing Iraq policy review.

President Bush and Vice President Cheney met with the members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff yesterday at the Pentagon for more than an hour, and the president engaged his top military advisers on different options. The chiefs made no dramatic proposals but, at a time of intensifying national debate about how to solve the Iraq crisis, offered a pragmatic assessment of what can and cannot be done by the military, the sources said.

The chiefs do not favor adding significant numbers of troops to Iraq, said sources familiar with their thinking, but see strengthening the Iraqi army as pivotal to achieving some degree of stability. They also are pressing for a much greater U.S. effort on economic reconstruction and political reconciliation.

Sources said that Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top U.S. commander in Iraq, is reviewing a plan to redefine the American military mission there: U.S. troops would be pulled out of Iraqi cities and consolidated at a handful of U.S. bases while day-to-day combat duty would be turned over to the Iraqi army. Casey is still considering whether to request more troops, possibly as part of an expanded training mission to help strengthen the Iraqi army.

The recommendations Casey is reviewing to overhaul the military mission were formulated by Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, the outgoing top U.S. ground commander, officials said. The plan positions the U.S. military to be able to move swiftly to a new focus on training, one of the key recommendations from several reviews of U.S. strategy, including from the bipartisan Iraq Study Group.

Under the plan developed by Chiarelli's staff, the military would shift about half of its 15 combat brigades away from battling insurgents and sectarian violence and into training Iraqi security forces as soon as the spring of 2007, military and defense officials said. In northern and western Iraq, U.S. commanders are already moving troops out of combat missions to place them as advisers with lower-level Iraqi army units, Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, spokesman for the military in Iraq, said yesterday at a briefing in Baghdad.

Administration officials stressed that Bush, under pressure from Congress and the electorate to abandon the United States' open-ended commitment, has made no final decisions on how to proceed in Iraq. But the new disclosures suggest that military planning is well underway for a major change from an approach that has assigned the bulk of responsibility for security in Iraq to more than 140,000 U.S. troops.

The chiefs also want to see a new push on political and economic issues, especially employment programs, reconstruction and political reconciliation, to help quell the problems that have fueled both the Sunni insurgency and Shiite-Sunni sectarian strife, say defense officials and U.S. military officers in Iraq. A new jobs program is considered key to pulling young men from the burgeoning militias.

Pentagon chiefs think that there is no purely military solution for Iraq and that, without major progress on the political and economic fronts, the U.S. intervention is simply buying time, the sources said. They particularly want to see U.S. pressure on the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to offer amnesty to Sunni insurgents, approve constitutional amendments promised to the Sunni minority, pass laws to ensure equitable distribution of oil revenue, and modify the ban on members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party taking government positions.

Bush alluded to this proposition when he met briefly with reporters after his meeting at the Pentagon. "Our military cannot do this job alone," he said. "Our military needs a political strategy that is effective."

But Bush also showed no sign that he is retreating from his basic proposition that the U.S. military must be engaged in Iraq for some time. "If we lose our nerve, if we're not steadfast in our determination to help the Iraqi government succeed, we will be handing Iraq over to an enemy that would do us harm," he said, adding that he would not be "rushed" into a decision.

Bush has been intensely involved with reviewing his options on Iraq this week, meeting on Monday with officials at the State Department and talking by videoconference on Tuesday with his commanders in Iraq. One senior administration official said last night that the situation is "fluid" and described Bush as especially mindful of the need to integrate military and political strategies.

But as the sources described yesterday, the military planning in both Washington and Baghdad is far along, in some ways tracking the ideas presented last week by the Iraq Study Group, led by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former U.S. representative Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), for instance in the emphasis on reshaping the U.S. military mission to focus on training and advising.

Thousands of U.S. combat troops in Iraq would become embedded advisers with Iraqi security forces. About 4,000 U.S. troops are now serving on 11-person military training teams embedded with Iraqi forces. The new plan would add 30 troops to each team, allowing them to provide supervision and mentoring down to the level of Iraqi army companies -- a step seen as critical to bolstering Iraqi units and preventing sectarian violence.

Meanwhile, the remaining seven to eight brigades of U.S. combat forces would focus on three core missions: striking al-Qaeda, strengthening security along Iraq's borders, and protecting major highways and other routes to ensure U.S. forces freedom of movement in Iraq.

The plan would not allow for any major reduction in U.S. troops in Iraq over the next year -- nor would it call for any surge in troops, as some, such as Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), have advocated.

The Pentagon chiefs also are urging that any new strategy be sensitive to regional context, particularly the impact of political or military decisions. They are concerned that any decision to effectively throw U.S. support to the Shiite majority may lead Sunni governments in the region to take a more active role in supporting Sunni insurgents. But they are also concerned that a crackdown on Iraq's largest Shiite militia, the Mahdi army, may have repercussions on Iran's actions in Iraq, say officials familiar with the ongoing review.

A constant subtext in the meeting yesterday, and in the ongoing White House review, is the Joint Chiefs' growing concern about the erosion of the U.S. military's ability to deal with other crises around the world because of the heavy commitment in Iraq and the stress on troops and equipment, said officials familiar with the review. The chiefs planned to tell Bush of the significantly increased risk to readiness in the event of a new emergency, rather than push for a timeline to leave Iraq.

Redeploy Troops In Iraq Soon, Brass Say (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — A proposal developed by top U.S. commanders in Iraq would significantly redeploy troops from a combat role to training and advising Iraqi forces, according to four administration officials.

The proposal, requested by Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. military official in Iraq, calls for changing the mission during the next several months, said the officials.

All requested anonymity because they are not authorized to speak publicly about the proposal.

This is "one of many plans" President Bush is considering as he weighs a new strategy for the war, said one of the officials, who works at the White House.

Bush was briefed Tuesday by Casey and Casey's boss, Central Command chief Gen. John Abizaid. Bush, who still must approve the proposal, met at the Pentagon on Wednesday with other top commanders.

Details of the redeployment proposal were provided by one official, and its general outline was confirmed by three others. Highlights include:

· Change the mission for an undetermined number of the 15 U.S. brigade combat teams currently in Iraq by March 2007. Troops in those brigades, which number about 3,000 each, would embed with Iraqi units.

The plan would dramatically increase the size of those teams from the current 12 troops per Iraqi unit.

·Redeploy the remaining combat brigades as quick-reaction forces to fight insurgents, perform border security and secure lines of communication.

·Dramatically reduce the number of U.S. operating bases. Now there are 50.

The plan depends on conditions in Iraq, including the Iraqi army's ability to run combat operations.

Some of the plan's elements resemble those proposed last week by the Iraq Study Group created by Congress. The group's recommendations included removing U.S. combat forces by early 2008; remaining troops would be embedded with Iraqi forces in a training role or serve in rapid-response teams.

Flanked by Vice President Cheney, incoming Defense Secretary Robert Gates and outgoing Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, Bush said Wednesday that he would "not be rushed" into a new strategy for Iraq.

During consultations with military, political and Iraqi leaders, Bush said he heard interesting ideas and some "ideas that would lead to defeat.

"And I reject those ideas," including leaving "before the job is done" and not helping the fledgling Iraqi government, Bush said.

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has asked Bush to let Iraq take the lead in securing Baghdad next year.

Worsening conditions in Iraq leave the Pentagon two defensible options, said Stephen Biddle, a military expert at the Council on Foreign Relations. It can either increase the number of U.S. forces to provide security and protect troops training the Iraqi army or withdraw troops immediately, he said.

Adding troops would be expensive, Biddle said. Turning combat troops into trainers could embolden insurgents, he said.

Also, the Pentagon doesn't have enough special operations troops who specialize in training military forces in other countries, said Kalev Sepp, an assistant professor at the Naval Postgraduate School.

"We have to look for ways to accelerate the training of advisers," said Sepp, a former Army Special Forces officer.

"What we're looking at is a menu of bad choices," Biddle said.

War-Weary Public Wants Congress To Lead (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Falling public support for the war in Iraq has weakened President Bush's political hand across the board, bolstering the clout of the new Democratic Congress as it prepares to take power.

A new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll1 shows Americans have grown more pessimistic after the Iraq Study Group report that the situation there has become "dire." That contributed to Mr. Bush's lowest-ever approval rating in the Journal/NBC poll -- 34% -- and turned Americans toward his Democratic adversaries. By 59% to 21%, Americans say Congress rather than

Mr. Bush should take the lead in setting policy for the nation. Nearly a year ago, when Republicans controlled Congress, Americans wanted Capitol Hill to take the lead, 49% to 25% over Mr. Bush.

"For the president, Iraq is everything," says Peter Hart, the Democratic pollster who helps conduct the Journal/NBC survey. "Until he's able to do something different on Iraq, he will have little or no leverage with the general public."

IN THE POLLS

· Graphic: Bush's approval ratings across multiple polls2

· See poll results3. (Adobe Acrobat required4)

The results show "a presidency that's been whittled down to its ultimate core," adds Mr. Hart's Republican counterpart, Bill McInturff, as even three in 10 Republicans want Congress to lead on national policy. The telephone survey of 1,006 adults, conducted Dec. 8 to Dec. 11, carries a margin of error of 3.1 percentage points.

Mr. Bush's lost standing has ramifications across the political landscape. Seven in 10 say they want the new Congress to pressure the White House to begin bringing troops home within six months.

At the same time, items on the Democrats' opening agenda for Congress enjoy strong initial backing. More than seven in 10 Americans support raising the minimum wage -- on which Mr. Bush has indicated flexibility -- and forcing the federal government to negotiate lower Medicare drug prices with pharmaceuticals companies -- which Mr. Bush opposes.

The president faces a steeper challenge resisting Democratic initiatives on other economic issues. On energy, 80% favor forcing auto makers to build more fuel-efficient vehicles even if that raises prices; 59% back eliminating tax cuts for oil companies.

On trade, 61% say the U.S. government isn't being tough in economic negotiations with China. With anxiety over lost U.S. manufacturing jobs spurring protectionist moves on Capitol Hill, that underscores the political heat on Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson to deliver results in the "Strategic Economic Dialogue" that opens today in Beijing.

Americans are looking to Capitol Hill for leadership by an even wider margin than they did after Republicans captured both houses of Congress in 1994 and confronted President Clinton. To be sure, Mr. Clinton's subsequent political victories and re-election to a second term showed an embattled president can turn his fortunes around.

But for now Mr. Bush's political woes represent a burden for his party. Some 59% of Americans, for example, say they would consider service in Mr. Bush's Cabinet discomfiting in a 2008 presidential contender, outpacing the 38% who say it would make them comfortable or enthusiastic.

One positive for the president's party: Its leading 2008 candidates enjoy independent reputations. Among Republicans, the poll shows, former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani tops the field with 34% supporting him. Sen. John McCain of Arizona, who battled Mr. Bush in 2000 primaries and is considered more certain to run, draws 29%. Both are far ahead of other Republican aspirants including former House Speaker Newt Gingrich (10%) and departing Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (8%).

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York continues to hold a solid lead over potential 2008 Democratic candidates, with 37%. But Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, an African-American whose charisma and calls for consensus-building have created a political sensation, has moved into second place with 18%. In the process he passed both halves of the Democrats' 2004 national ticket: Vice presidential nominee John Edwards draws 14%, while Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry receives 11%.

In potential general-election matchups, Mr. McCain leads Mrs. Clinton by 47% to 43% and Mr. Obama by 43% to 38%. One encouraging note for Mr. Edwards -- eclipsed lately by Mr. Obama -- is the poll's finding that the former North Carolina senator leads Mr. McCain by 43% to 41% due to solid appeal among independents.

The Democrats' momentum from midterms elections continued this week with Ciro Rodriguez's surprise victory Tuesday over longtime Republican incumbent Henry Bonilla for a Texas U.S. House seat. That leaves Democrats with a midterm election gain of 30 seats and a 233-202 House majority.

Messrs. Hart and McInturff, the pollsters, caution that big political winners sometimes receive postelection surges of public support that dissipate. Yet a month after Election Day, deteriorating attitudes on Iraq continue to fuel calls for change.

Just 19% of Americans now describe themselves as "more confident" the war will end successfully, and only 16% favor continued use of U.S. troops in all aspects of the war. Just one in four Americans believe there is anything more the U.S. can do to quell violence among Iraq's ethnic and religious groups; 65% say the U.S. is already doing all it can.

Americans express ambivalence about the Iraq Study Group's report itself, as 49% say they don't know enough about it. But they evince considerable support for its substantive recommendations; eight in 10 want U.S. troops either redeployed to secure bases to focus on training Iraqis, or removed from Iraq in a phased withdrawal beginning immediately.

Those findings reflect pressure on Mr. Bush to begin winding down the war as he enters the final two years of his presidency. By 3-to-1, Americans disapprove of the president's handling of the war. Similar pessimism among Americans on the subject was reported in a Washington Post-ABC News poll and a CBS News survey.

DOJ_NMG_0106372

At least publicly, however, the president continues to project unwavering determination as he consults advisers inside and outside the administration on what he calls "a new way forward." After meeting at the Pentagon yesterday with senior military leaders, Mr. Bush said he has heard "ideas that would lead to defeat ... and I reject those ideas." Among them, he added, are "leaving before the job is done."

New Congress Is More Trusted Than President (WP)

By Charles Babington And Jon Cohen

The Washington Post, December 14, 2006

Americans trust Democratic lawmakers more than President Bush to handle the nation's toughest problems, including the Iraq war, and a quarter of Republicans are glad that Democrats have won control of Congress, a Washington Post-ABC News poll finds.

At the same time, however, most Americans want lawmakers and the president to work together rather than pursue separate agendas. They also have modest hopes about how much the new Congress will be able to accomplish.

The degree to which congressional leaders can sustain and capitalize on initial goodwill is questionable, because the No. 1 issue for most Americans is perhaps the most difficult for Congress and the White House: Iraq. Forty-four percent of respondents said the Iraq war is the most important problem facing the government, easily eclipsing the economy -- the top concern for 10 percent -- and health care, No. 1 for 6 percent.

Asked whether they trusted Bush or Democrats in Congress "to do a better job coping with the main problems the nation faces," 57 percent of the respondents said congressional Democrats and 31 percent said Bush. When the question was broken down to specific problems, such as Iraq, the economy, immigration and the "war on terrorism," Democrats held clear majorities over Bush. Their lead was overwhelming in the area of health care: 64 percent to Bush's 26 percent.

More than half of the respondents said it was a good thing that Congress will switch from Republican control to Democratic; 17 percent called it a bad thing and 1 in 4 said it would make no difference. Shortly after Republicans took over Congress after the 1994 election, 48 percent of Americans said the switch was a good thing.

In the poll, more than 4 in 5 Democrats said the latest change in control of Congress is good, as did 55 percent of independents. Even 23 percent of Republicans called the change a good thing.

Sharon Campbell of Norman, Okla., is among those traditional GOP voters displeased with Bush and Republican lawmakers. A fiscal conservative, Campbell, 64, said in an interview that congressional Republicans "have not been conservative. . . . Look at the debt that's piled up."

Two-thirds of those polled said Bush "should work mainly to compromise with the Democrats" in Congress rather than pursue his own agenda. Fifty-six percent said the next Congress will be able to do "not too much" or "nothing at all" in the next year; 43 percent said it will be able to accomplish a "good deal" or a "great amount."

The public gave relatively low marks to the Republican-controlled Congress that ended last week, with 37 percent saying they approved of how Congress was doing its job and 57 percent disapproving. The Washington Post-ABC News poll was conducted Dec. 7-11 by telephone among a random national sample of 1,005 adults. The margin of sampling error is three percentage points.

Iraqi PM Weighs Political Realignment (AP)

By Hamza Hendawi And Qassim Abdul-Zahra

AP, December 14, 2006

Iraq's prime minister is weighing whether to sever his alliance with a radical Shiite cleric blamed for much of the country's sectarian violence, aides said Wednesday. But isolating Muqtada al-Sadr could lead to more deadly attacks, even if the strategy could produce a more stable administration over time.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has been meeting over the last three days with a small circle of his Dawa Party stalwarts to discuss their options, according to his aides who spoke on condition of anonymity because the subject is sensitive.

The meetings began after reports surfaced of a proposed realignment of the alliance supporting the governing coalition, the aides said.

The White House has acknowledged efforts to shore up al-Maliki's coalition but has denied that the move is aimed at replacing him, though some of his aides fear this is the goal.

"We've talked in recent days about a moderate bloc that has Sunni, Shia and Kurdish leaders," White House spokesman Tony Snow said Wednesday.

Central to that strategy is to curb the power of al-Sadr, the radical anti-American cleric who controls 30 of parliament's 275 seats, five Cabinet ministries and the Mahdi Army, Iraq's biggest and most active Shiite militia.

DOJ_NMG_0106373

There has been no contact between al-Maliki and al-Sadr since word of the possible new alignment surfaced this week, the aides said.

Relations between al-Maliki and al-Sadr have strained since the Sadrists suspended their participation in parliament and the government two weeks ago to protest the prime minister's Nov. 30 meeting with Bush in Jordan.

Sticking with the Sadrists could cost al-Maliki his job, the aides said. They added that al-Maliki's supporters want to be absolutely certain he could keep the top post if he broke with al-Sadr.

Al-Maliki's only public comments on the proposed new bloc came Tuesday when he said there was no alternative to his "national unity" government.

"We are opposed to anyone who moves in that framework," said al-Maliki, whose seven months in office have been defined by a surge in violence and failure to improve services.

The bid to form the new bloc comes at a particularly bad time for al-Maliki.

The aides to the prime minister said the Sadrist boycott was undermining the government and was likely to play into the hands of the parties involved in the effort to create a new bloc.

A White House memo written by National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley after a visit to Baghdad last month cast doubts about whether al-Maliki had the capacity to control Iraq's sectarian violence and recommended that he end his alliance with al-Sadr.

A new government that excludes supporters of al-Sadr would leave the cleric's Mahdi Army militia without the protection it has enjoyed since al-Maliki came to office in May.

But it could also signal the start of a new round of fighting between the Mahdi Army and the U.S. military. The two sides fought each other for much of 2004 in Baghdad and across much of central and southern Iraq.

The clashes ended after Shiite politicians and clerics convinced the Americans that al-Sadr would be less of a threat to stability if he were brought into the political process. As sectarian violence escalated, that argument seems less persuasive.

On Tuesday, the outgoing No. 2 U.S. commander in Iraq, Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, said some U.S. casualties have resulted from attacks by Shiite militias, a clear reference to the Mahdi Army.

Sadrist legislators have vowed to resist any attempt to isolate them. They did not elaborate, but al-Sadr himself has stepped up his anti-American rhetoric this week, calling on Iraqis to join in a peaceful campaign to push for a timetable for the withdrawal of all foreign troops from Iraq.

The bipartisan Iraq Study Group said Mahdi Army militiamen number about 60,000, a significant increase over previous estimates, which put its strength at about 10,000. The report, released last week, urged al-Maliki to disband the militia.

But many Shiites believe the Mahdi Army has much greater public support than it did in 2004. In the sectarian violence engulfing Baghdad since the bombing of a major Shiite shrine in February, many of the city's Shiites look to the militia for protection against attacks by Sunni Arab militants.

"The sword of the Shiites," is the phrase some Shiites now use to refer to the militia.

The bid to form a new bloc, which is expected to exclude radical Sunnis as well, is spearheaded by senior Shiite leader Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim and Vice President Tariq al-Hashemi of the Sunni Iraqi Islamic Party. Bush met the two men in the White House separately this month.

Bush also spoke on the telephone Wednesday with Iraqi President Jalal Talabani and Massoud Barzani, leader of Iraq's autonomous Kurdish region, according to Snow, the White House spokesman. Parties led by the two men also are involved in the ongoing talks about the new bloc as well as independents.

A possible stumbling bloc in creating the new bloc, however, could come from Iraq's most influential Shiite cleric, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani. Al-Sistani has consistently urged Shiite unity since the 2003 ouster of Saddam Hussein's Sunni-led regime.

An Iraqi in regular contact with al-Sistani in the holy city of Najaf said the Iranian-born cleric will not publicly state his views on the matter until "the picture becomes clearer."

Speaking on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the media, he suggested that al-Sistani may want to see a political shake-up, saying the cleric was "bitterly saddened" by the violence.

Iraqi Politicians Consider A Reshuffling (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, December 14, 2006

BAGHDAD — Bombs, mortar rounds and shootings left more than 40 Iraqis dead Wednesday as politicians met to discuss a possible Cabinet shake-up in an attempt to improve the government's track record on stemming violence.

DOJ_NMG_0106374

The Shiite-dominated government of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki faces domestic and international pressure to secure streets and provide services. Maliki blames his government's shortcomings in part on the ministers appointed under pressure from his coalition partners. Talks between Maliki, Cabinet officials and political party leaders were underway Wednesday to reshuffle the posts.

"We're trying to strengthen the position of the prime minister," said Diya Din Fayyad, a Shiite Muslim member of parliament. "There's an agreement to change the ministries."

In Wednesday's deadliest incident of sectarian violence, an explosives-packed car blew up in a crowded bus terminal in a mostly Shiite district of eastern Baghdad, killing 10 Iraqis and injuring 25 during the morning rush hour.

Apparent Sunni insurgents killed at least five civilians and injured 13 in two other explosions set off in New Baghdad, another mostly Shiite neighborhood of the capital.

Gunmen kidnapped a ranking advisor to the Shiite-dominated Ministry of Transportation in eastern Baghdad.

Suspected Shiite militants also struck at Sunnis. An Interior Ministry official reported the discovery of at least 21 unidentified bodies in and around the capital. Most had been shot multiple times, and several showed signs of torture.

Mortar rounds struck a neighborhood of mostly Palestinian immigrants in eastern Baghdad, killing one person and injuring six. The Sunni Arab Palestinians, favored under the regime of Saddam Hussein, are at times targeted by armed Shiite groups.

Mortar rounds also struck a government building near the southern city of Hillah, killing at least one civilian and injuring two.

Violence also erupted Wednesday in the northern oil city of Kirkuk, claimed by Iraq's Kurds, Arabs and Turkmens.

A pair of suicide bombers rammed into the entrance of an Iraqi army base near the city, killing at least two soldiers and injuring eight.

Roadside bombs in Kirkuk killed a police officer and a woman. An Iraqi explosives expert also died in Kirkuk when a bomb he was trying to dismantle exploded.

Police also discovered the body of an unidentified man, shot multiple times and bearing signs of torture in the style of killing often associated with sectarian death squads in the capital.

Showdown Highlights Cleric's Tenuous Grip On Power (MCT)

By Hannah Allam And Laith Hammoudi

McClatchy Newspapers, December 13, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - The day seemed tranquil at Muqtada al-Sadr's headquarters for western Baghdad. Pigeons flew overhead, swooping down to perch on palm trees that dotted the courtyard. Uniformed Iraqi policemen and soldiers sipped tea with rugged militiamen or exchanged customary kisses with black-turbaned clerics. Women came to plead for assistance.

But calm is always fleeting in Baghdad. At midday, about 50 gunmen stormed the courtyard and ordered everyone inside to stay put and to stay silent.

Sadr's Mahdi Army militiamen responded immediately, drawing automatic rifles and pistols from under their winter coats and gathering in a cluster to face the unidentified gunmen. The assailants closed ranks, brandishing shiny revolvers and battered machine guns.

The groups walked toward each other as if in a high-noon duel. A voice from the crowd called for blessings in the name of Islam's Prophet Muhammad. Sadr's soldiers began to shout age-old prayers for the prophet and his descendants, then added the Sadr camp's innovation: "Bring salvation soon, and damn their enemies!"

With the air filled with the clicking sound of weapons being prepared, visiting McClatchy journalists fled.

The sudden intrusion of the gunmen into one of Sadr's most secure strongholds exposed a paradox that dogs the Sadr movement and contributes to the daily bloodletting here: The Mahdi Army is growing larger and more sophisticated, with politicians in the government and a vast social services network that serves thousands of poor Shiites, but the anarchy of the streets makes it hard for the militia's commanders to rein in their men, much less prevent attacks from rival factions.

Even as Sadr presses for more land and power, his grasp over Baghdad remains tenuous.

Just moments before, Hazem al Araji, 37, a senior Sadr aide and head of the office, had extolled the transformation of Sadr's movement. Now, gunmen of unknown provenance were threatening his office.

Araji came to the office in the summer of 2003, when he was fresh from exile in Canada. The one-story stucco building in Kadhemiya was a Shiite seminary where baby-faced clerics-in-training dashed out between philosophy classes for falafel sandwiches.

On warm summer days, students in white robes sat under the palm trees in the serene courtyard. They idly flipped through the pages of their Qurans or sat frozen in thought as their fingers worked prayer beads. Sadr's supporters struggled to recruit members to the fledgling Mahdi Army, posting leaflets on the seminary walls. Visitors came and went as they pleased.

These days, the safest route to Sadr's west Baghdad office runs through an obstacle course of both legal and dubious checkpoints in an area known for kidnappings and car bombings.

On Tuesday, there were eight: The first was an imposing roadblock manned by Iraqi army soldiers in camouflage. The next four were guarded by Iraqi police in mismatched uniforms. Then came a couple of apparent militiamen standing in the street with guns, and next, a vehicle search by more plainclothes sentries. Finally, another batch of unidentified guards stopped pedestrians at a coil of razor wire to peer into women's bags and pat down men for weapons.

Gone are the peaceful seminary days. In their place, men in long overcoats hover, casting steely glares on anyone who enters the compound. The courtyard brims with new faces and dialects. Some were distraught Iraqis seeking financial or security help; others were militiamen or workers from Sadr's social programs.

A large poster hung on the wall showing Sadr, the firebrand cleric-turned-commander, alongside fellow Shiite Muslim leader Hassan Nasrallah, head of Lebanon's Hezbollah. Sadr stood on an American flag; Nasrallah on an Israeli one. The caption read: "Their arrogance is under your feet."

An elderly blue-eyed woman shuffled in and beseeched Sadr's representatives for medical assistance for her three sons. Two of them had been shot by U.S. troops, she said, and the third had fallen off a motorcycle while fighting Sunni gunmen.

"Are they in the imam's army?" a tall, stern man asked.

"Yes, they all are," the woman replied.

"OK, just give me their names and papers and we'll sponsor them," he said.

Araji's story illustrates the history of the Sadr movement. A devotee of Sadr's father, a prominent Iraqi ayatollah, Araji fled Iraq in 1999 after Sadr's father was killed. He returned after Saddam Hussein was deposed, but was detained twice by U.S. forces after the Mahdi Army fought two bitter uprisings against the Americans in 2004. He was out of prison last year, and his wife and four children have joined him from Canada.

During the summer's Israeli-Hezbollah war, it was Araji who led Sadr's solidarity demonstrations in Baghdad, which turned out tens of thousands. He praised Hezbollah's response to its constituents and drew comparisons with the Mahdi Army's recent activities.

"If we talk about the word militia, the Mahdi Army doesn't fit the description. We are a group of people with a belief," said Araji, now national director of Sadr's social programs and a local militia commander. "We call it an army, but it's not just an army of gunmen. We protect our neighborhoods and provide services for our people."

Araji said he'd visited Lebanon and Iran recently to check on the welfare of Iraqis in prisons and refugee camps. When asked whether he'd met with Hezbollah chief Nasrallah in Lebanon, he smiled, shook his head and steered the conversation back to his two trips to Iran. On those jaunts, he evaluated the needs of 90,000 Iraqis in exile.

At home, he said, his time is consumed with the displacement of tens of thousands of Iraqis in what he called "one of the biggest crises in modern history."

When told that Sunni Web sites accused him of fielding death squads, Araji scoffed.

"Let them bring proof," he said. "We still have many Sunni families in Kadhemiya. No one has been displaced here, but in the hot spots of Karkh, of course, there are problems. It's the same for Sunnis and Shiites." Karkh is how residents of Baghdad refer to the largely Sunni side of the city that lies west of the Tigris River.

Araji said the government had failed so miserably in providing basic services that his office petitioned the local council six months ago to take over the distribution of cooking gas and other supplies. Now, he said with pride, the Mahdi Army delivers gas and kerosene to families throughout Kadhemiya and other heavily Shiite districts.

Funding for the projects, he said, comes mainly from 2,000 donation boxes throughout Iraq that are stuffed with cash every week after Friday prayers.

"It's a weak government," he said. "They're supposed to do this, but we do it."

Araji said the Mahdi Army doesn't seek to replace the Iraqi government, but that it's obligated to step in until elected officials show results.

He searched for an answer to why Sunnis and Shiites are now at odds. He was reminded that in 2004, Sunni fighters from Fallujah were welcomed into the Mahdi Army and Sadr-allied clerics met frequently with their militant Sunni counterparts in the Muslim Scholars Association. So what happened?

"I ask myself this same question," Araji said with a sigh. "We still have some connections with them, but it's not like before." He blamed the United States and neighboring countries for sowing sectarianism.

"Sectarianism has grown so much in Iraq that we've started to lose trust between the groups," he said.

An aide ducked into the room with urgency. He kneeled before Araji and whispered something in his ear. Araji's eyes widened, he apologetically cut short the interview and ushered his guests back into the courtyard.

DOJ_NMG_0106376

Five minutes later, the gunmen arrived. Araji's black turban was lost in a tangle of uniformed and plainclothes gunmen, the swish of black robes as women ran for cover, and the glint of sunshine on weapons.

In a phone call later that night, he dismissed the showdown as "a tribal matter" and emphasized that no one was injured. Kadhemiya was still safe.

"It was a private matter," he said, and offered no further explanation.

An audio feed of the confrontation at the Sadr office is available at http://www.realcities.com/multimedia/nationalchannel/news/121206_iraq/index.htm

US Denies Saudis Threatened To Back Iraqi Sunnis (AFP)

AFP, December 14, 2006

The United States denied Saudi Arabia had warned it would financially back Iraq's Sunni community against the Shiite majority, if American troops were withdrawn.

The latest in a series of veiled cautions apparently emanating from well-placed Saudi sources appeared in a New York Times report, as President George W. Bush mulled a long-awaited change of US strategy in Iraq.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said such reports ran counter to stated Saudi policy, which he said was aimed at securing the territorial integrity of Iraq and national reconciliation.

"That has been their position; remains their position, because they believe that is in their national interest, and is not done out of charity," McCormack said.

"That's the tone and tenor of our conversations that's been conveyed from lower-level officials up to senior officials. That's what they've told us in private."

The New York Times, citing US and Arab diplomats, reported Tuesday that King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia delivered the warning to Vice President Dick Cheney in Riyadh two weeks ago.

"Its a hypothetical situation, and wed work hard to avoid such a structure," one Arab diplomat in Washington told the Times.

"If things become so bad in Iraq, like an ethnic cleansing, we will feel we are pulled into the war," the diplomat was quoted as saying.

CNN meanwhile quoted an unnamed senior US official as saying the King read Cheney the "riot act" and expressed growing concern over Iraq's deterioration.

White House spokesman Tony Snow refused to detail the content of Cheney's private conversations, but said the reports were "not something that has been described to me as something that is consistent with the conversations."

There was no immediate comment from Saudi Arabia's embassy in Washington.

The reports fuelled speculation about a possible proxy war in Iraq in the event of a US withdrawal, between Saudi-backed Sunnis and Iran-backed Shiites.

Observers here say that Saudi Arabia has largely held to a promise to the United States to desist support for Sunni brethren in Iraq while US troops are victims of a Sunni insurgency and in the crossfire of sectarian violence.

The latest intrigue in Saudi-US relations came as mystery still cloaked the sudden resignation and flight from Washington of Saudi ambassador Prince Turki al-Faisal.

The ambassador left after only 15 months on the job, saying his decision was made for personal reasons, but a flurry of speculation pointed to possible Saudi power struggles or the possibility of him being promoted to foreign minister.

Saudi Royal Family, Gov't Split On Iraq (AP)

By Salah Nasrawi

AP, December 14, 2006

Saudi Arabia's royal family and government leaders are deeply divided over how to handle the growing crisis in Iraq and other looming Mideast problems like Iran, with some favoring strong aid to fellow Sunnis and others more cautious.

The split played a key role in this week's abrupt resignation of the Saudi ambassador to Washington. It also could hurt U.S. efforts to forge a new overall strategy to calm Iraq.

More broadly, the internal dispute shows how Arab countries like Saudi Arabia, long key partners in U.S. efforts to stabilize the Middle East, are struggling to decide how to proceed as Iraq boils over and Iran gains influence.

The tension in the region is straining Saudi relations with the United States, despite both countries' assertions that all is fine.

DOJ_NMG_0106377

The resignation of Prince Turki al-Faisal, after just 15 months as ambassador to Washington, for example, came after Saudi officials concluded he was not succeeding at building strong ties with the United States, a Saudi official said Wednesday.

"Many in the royal family concluded that if he stayed longer, things might even get worse," said the official, who has close working ties with the Saudi Foreign Ministry but spoke on condition of anonymity because of the issue's sensitivity.

The Saudis had no official comment, and the White House merely wished Turki well. Turki himself could not be reached for comment.

But Iraq was clearly central to the dispute.

Turki last week fired a Saudi security consultant, Nawaf Obaid, after Obaid wrote in The Washington Post that "one of the first consequences" of any American troop pullout from Iraq would "be massive Saudi intervention" in Iraq "to stop Iranian-backed Shiite militias from butchering Iraqi Sunnis."

Saudi Arabia denied that Obaid was speaking on its behalf.

But The Associated Press reported last week that Saudi private citizens are sending millions of dollars to Sunni insurgents in Iraq, much of it used to buy weapons, because they worry about Iranian influence in Shiite-led Iraq.

Iraqi officials have said they believe some members of the Saudi royal family are either involved in that flow of money or turning a blind eye — a charge Saudi Arabia strongly denies.

The Saudis and the United States also denied a Wednesday report in The New York Times that the Saudi king told Vice President Dick Cheney the kingdom might provide financial aid to Iraqi Sunnis if the U.S. pulls troops out of Iraq.

"That's not Saudi government policy," White House spokesman Tony Snow said. He added that the Saudis, however, were "rightly concerned about the adventurism of Iranians in Iraq, and we share that concern."

The United States has been pushing Saudi Arabia to persuade Sunnis in Iraq to leave the insurgency and join with Shiites in political efforts — an effort the Saudi government has said it is undertaking.

But the royal family has been sharply divided over what strategy to adopt toward Iraq, said two Saudis with close ties to the government, speaking anonymously because internal royal deliberations are highly sensitive. Some favor robust support of fellow Sunnis inside Iraq, while others urge caution.

The bottom line has been power struggles and indecision about the best course, both said.

"They have an obsession that Shiites and Iran will control Iraq, but they do not know how to stop that," said one Saudi. The other described what he called total confusion within the government over the best course.

On Monday, 30 prominent Saudi clerics called on Sunni Muslims around the Middle East to support Sunnis in Iraq against Shiites and praised the insurgency. The clerics warned that Shiite Muslims were taking control of Iraq in a conspiracy with "crusaders" — a reference to Westerners — to marginalize Sunnis.

Many of the clerics are known to have close connections with top royal family members and receive generous donations from them.

Saudi Arabia is also increasingly worried by events elsewhere in the region including Lebanon and Iran and there is tension with the United States over the Palestinian issue.

Despite all that, Saudi and U.S. ties have long endured and "Saudi diplomacy is very much active," said Saudi political analyst Fahad al-Harithi. It looks to the contrary, he said, only "because the smoke is billowing high in the area, and hides this reality."

At Least 55 Die In More Iraqi Violence (AP)

By Thomas Wagner, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 14, 2006

A new round of car bombings and other violence struck Iraq on Wednesday, with 55 people killed or found dead as the Iraqi government unveiled a plan to assume responsibility for security in Baghdad by early next year.

The relentless attacks indicate how hard it may be for the Iraqis to replace U.S. forces in the capital, and President Bush said he would "not be rushed" into a decision on a strategy change for Iraq.

The scope of the problem was clear Wednesday, from the first bombing at a bus stop during morning rush hour through the announcement at 9 p.m. that the tortured, bullet-ridden bodies of 21 kidnap victims had been found on the streets of the capital.

"If you take Baghdad, it's unacceptable levels of violence here right now. We have got to bring it down," said Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, the top American military spokesman in Iraq.

The violence came ahead of a national reconciliation conference scheduled for Saturday. The gathering is aimed at rallying ethnic, religious and political groups around a common strategy for handling Iraq's problems.

At least 17 people were killed Wednesday in car bombings against Shiite and Sunni targets in Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0106378

The first major attack happened at 8:45 a.m., when a car bomb exploded near a Shiite mosque in the Kamaliyah neighborhood, killing at least 11 civilians, wounding 27 and heavily damaging shops and cars, authorities said. They said the mosque was not damaged.

"A Volkswagen car exploded right near the bus stop, hitting a group of people, including women and children who were waiting to take a bus to a fruit and vegetable market," said one witness, Abu Haider al-Kaabi.

Two other car bombs exploded in the mostly Shiite area of New Baghdad, killing four people and wounding 14. Another car bomb struck the largely Sunni area of Yarmouk, killing two people and wounding three.

North of Baghdad, seven tortured bodies were found in Mosul, two people were killed by roadside bombs in Kirkuk and men with explosives destroyed a small, empty Shiite shrine in Baqouba, security forces said. Two suicide car bombs also struck the headquarters of the Iraqi army's 2nd Battalion near Kirkuk, killing four soldiers and wounding 10.

South of the capital, three roadside bombings missed a police patrol, killing one civilian and wounding one in Musayyib; and gunmen killed a nine-member Shiite family in an attack on their house in Hasna village.

The U.S. maintains about 140,000 troops in Iraq, and Bush is considering a change of strategy in the country, including Baghdad, where stepped-up efforts to curtail sectarian violence failed this summer.

For several months, U.S. and Iraqi officials have been talking about proposals to transfer responsibility of security in cities from American forces to newly trained Iraqi police and soldiers.

Caldwell said Wednesday that the top two U.S. officials in Iraq and the Iraqi leadership were discussing a plan for Iraqi troops to assume primary responsibility for security in the capital.

"Obviously we all believe that to find solutions for the Iraqi problems it's going to take Iraqi solutions," Caldwell said. "And so that's in fact what they've done, they've drawn up a plan."

Caldwell acknowledged the difficulties in restoring calm in Baghdad and said the solution was for Iraqi politicians to overcome their differences.

But he stressed that the emphasis was on increasing transition teams and said the U.S. would provide enough troops to ensure that Iraq's Shiite-dominated security forces protect all sides.

"I mean, that's another set of eyes that the Iraqi leadership can count on to ensure that their security forces are performing in a nonsectarian manner out there on the street," he told reporters.

The New York Times first reported the plan Wednesday, citing Iraqi National Security Adviser Mouwafak al-Rubaie as saying it called for pulling back most American troops from central Baghdad and redefining their mission so they concentrate primarily on fighting al-Qaida and Sunni extremists.

A close aide to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki told The Associated Press that the proposal for the Iraqi army to take over security in Baghdad and other cities was first proposed to Bush by al-Maliki at their Nov. 30 summit.

"I can tell you that by next June, our forces will take over the security of the country," al-Maliki was quoted as saying then.

This plan was drafted by a joint committee made up of Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq; U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad; and Iraq's defense and interior ministers and its national security adviser, the aide said. He spoke on condition of anonymity because he was disclosing information that has not been officially released.

Ten Iraqi divisions are prepared to take over from the Americans across Baghdad and elsewhere in Iraq by March 2007, under the supervision of the multinational forces, according to the aide, who attended the meeting between al-Maliki and Bush.

By the end of June, Iraqis will take over security for all provinces and coalition forces will move outside cities, the aide said. By that time, the aide added, al-Maliki will have the right to redeploy these Iraqi forces.

Car Bombings In Baghdad Kill 15 In Crowded Shiite Area Markets (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, December 14, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 13 — Car bombs exploded in crowded street markets in two predominantly Shiite neighborhoods of eastern Baghdad on Wednesday, killing at least 15 people and wounding at least 35, Iraqi and American officials said.

The deadliest attack, in the working-class district of Kamaliya, killed at least 10 people and wounded 25, scattering bodies and reducing several cars and a row of market stalls to charred, smoldering husks, officials said.

Several hours later, two car bombs exploded almost simultaneously on a busy street in the nearby neighborhood of Baghdad al Jedida, killing at least five people and wounding at least 10, an official at the Interior Ministry said. Car bombs are a hallmark of the Sunni Arab-led insurgency and are frequently detonated in places where Shiites congregate, seemingly with the intent of inflicting the most casualties possible, fomenting sectarian violence and further destabilizing the Shiite-dominated government.

Dozens of other Iraqis were killed across Iraq on Wednesday, according to police and military reports shared with the news media.

Two suicide car bombers detonated their vehicles at the gate of an Iraqi Army regiment responsible for protecting Iraq's oil pipelines, said Col. Abdul Sattar al-Jibouri, a police commander in Kirkuk. Seven Iraqi soldiers were killed and 14 others were wounded in that attack, he said.

A group of gunmen killed nine Shiites, all from the same family, in the town of Hasna, a police official in the nearby city of Kut said. An adviser at the Transportation Ministry was kidnapped by gunmen near the ministry's headquarters in Baghdad, the Interior Ministry official said, and at least 21 bodies were recovered around Baghdad, all with gunshots to the head and signs of torture.

Four mortar shells hit an apartment block popular with Palestinians in the eastern neighborhood of Baladiat, killing one Palestinian and wounding six, the Interior Ministry official said.

Palestinians in Iraq, a population now concentrated in Baghdad, have been frequent victims of the Shiite militias this year. They carry the twin stigmas of being Sunni Arabs and of having enjoyed privileges under Saddam Hussein who, as part of his campaign to fashion himself into a Pan-Arab leader, was solicitous of their support. The housing complex that was attacked was created by the Baath Party for Palestinians who fled to Iraq following the creation of Israel in 1948.

Scattered Attacks Kill At Least 34 In Baghdad (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, December 14, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 13 -- Car bombings and other attacks across the capital on Wednesday killed at least 34 people, as U.S. and Iraqi leaders said they would step up efforts to give Iraqi forces more control of the country's security.

The deadliest blast targeted a group of men waiting for temporary work in the mostly Shiite Kamaliya neighborhood of southeast Baghdad. It killed eight day laborers and injured 13, including three police officers, said Lt. Col. Muhsin Saeed, an Interior Ministry official. The day before, a car bomb killed 70 day laborers and injured more than 230 about a mile from the fortified Green Zone.

The spate of car bombings came as Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, under pressure to stop sectarian warfare and attacks by insurgents, promised greater security. In a meeting in Baghdad with a U.S. congressional delegation headed by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), Maliki said Iraqi troops should be given control of the country's security as soon as possible, his office said.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, the top U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, told reporters that the U.S. military was just as eager to transfer authority to Iraqi forces. He also said that Maliki would increase his forces by about 40,000, to 355,000.

In a searing indictment of U.S. war strategy in Iraq, a bipartisan panel co-chaired by former secretary of state James A. Baker III called for the pullout of most American troops by 2008. In order for that to happen, the panel said, U.S. forces would have to switch from a focus on combat to the training and advising of Iraqi troops and police officers.

Caldwell said more American troops would be embedded with Iraqi forces as advisers and trainers. Iraqis "need forces that can run complex operations against terrorist and criminal elements, and the best way for Iraqi security forces to enhance these capabilities is through the mentorship and partnership of our coalition transition teams," Caldwell said.

Events on Wednesday underscored the complexity of problems that Iraqi forces may someday face on their own.

In the mixed New Baghdad district in the southwest part of the capital, two car bombs exploded simultaneously, killing 12 people, including two police officers, and wounding 13, among them three policemen, said an Interior Ministry official who refused to be identified further because he is not authorized to speak publicly.

The U.S. military said that two explosions occurred on a street near the Sunni al-Samouri mosque in New Baghdad, but that there was no damage. The military did not say whether there were casualties.

Earlier in the day, the military said, a car bomb was detonated across the street from the Shiite Kamaliya mosque in New Baghdad. The military did not disclose any casualty figures.

Police officers also fell victim to roadside bombs. One exploded at the Amil-Bayya intersection in west Baghdad, killing three people, including a policeman, and injuring five others, an Interior Ministry official said.

Another roadside bomb targeting a police patrol in the Illam neighborhood in southwest Baghdad killed two police officers and wounded three, the official said.

DOJ_NMG_0106380

Armed men killed three members of one family when they blew up a house in the mostly Shiite neighborhood of Dora in south Baghdad, the official said. In a separate incident, armed men fired on a car in the mostly Sunni Adel neighborhood in west Baghdad, killing five passengers.

A mortar shell killed one person and wounded six when it fell in the Baladiat district of east Baghdad, Interior Ministry spokesman Abdul Kareem al-Kinani said.

Relatives and friends buried an AP Television News cameraman on Wednesday, a day after he was killed by insurgents while covering clashes in northern Iraq, the Associated Press reported.

Aswan Ahmed Lutfallah, 35, was having his car repaired in the eastern part of Mosul when insurgents and police began fighting nearby and he rushed to cover the clash.

Insurgents spotted him filming and shot him, police Brig. Abdul-Karim Ahmed Khalaf said.

Fla. Senator Defies Bush, Visits Syria (AP)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

AP, December 14, 2006

In a direct affront to the Bush administration, a Democratic senator spent an hour Wednesday with Syrian President Bashar Assad in Damascus, emerging from the meeting to say Assad was willing to help control the Iraq-Syrian border.

Sen. Bill Nelson of Florida, a member of the Armed Services and Foreign Relations committees, met with Assad after the State Department said that it disapproved of his trip. The United States has limited diplomatic ties with Syria because of its support of Hezbollah and Hamas, which the U.S. deems terrorist organizations, and President Bush has expressed reluctance to seek help from Damascus on Iraq until the Syrians curb that support and reduce their influence in Lebanon.

"Assad clearly indicated the willingness to cooperate with the Americans and or the Iraqi army to be part of a solution" in Iraq, Nelson told reporters in a conference call following the meeting. The U.S. says foreign fighters often enter Iraq across that boundary.

Syrian officials have indicated a willingness before to engage the U.S. in discussions about Iraq, which the Bush administration has treated with skepticism. Nelson said he viewed Assad's remarks as "a crack in the door for discussions to continue. I approach this with realism not optimism."

Nelson said he reported the information to embassy officials and will brief his congressional committees on the trip. Also expected to visit Syria is Sens. John Kerry, D-Mass., Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., and Arlen Specter, R-Pa..

"We don't think that members of Congress ought to be going there," White House press secretary Tony Snow said, adding that the United States continues to denounce Syria's meddling in Lebanon and its ties to terrorist groups.

Snow noted the existing diplomatic ties between U.S. and Syria. "I think it's a real stretch to think the Syrians don't know where we stand or what we think," he said.

The diplomatic push from Congress comes on the heels of a recommendation by a bipartisan panel that the U.S. engage Iran and Syria on the war in Iraq. Bush has remained cool to the proposal by the Iraq Study Group, which was led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton, D-Ind.

Nelson said he ultimately received logistical support from the State Department in what he called a "fact-finding trip" across the Middle East, being transported by embassy officials from Jordan's capital city of Amman to Damascus. Prior to heading to Damascus, Nelson met with top Israeli and Palestinian officials; in coming days, he plans to visit Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Bahrain and Iraq.

Nelson said he was not interested visiting Iran "at this time" and did not say why.

However, the senator did say that he raised the issue of a nuclear-armed Iran to Assad, saying "he ought to understand that that's not only a threat to him, Syria, but to the entire world. . . . He took note," Nelson said.

The senator said he also expressed to the Syrian leader the problems caused by Hezbollah and Hamas and urged Assad to support the release of captured Israeli soldiers. Nelson said the Syrian president responded by saying Israel had 20 Syrians in captivity, one of whom died recently from leukemia.

The senator shrugged off suggestions he was challenging Bush's authority by sidestepping administration policy that the U.S. have no contact with Syrian officials.

"I have a constitutional role as a member of Congress," Nelson said.

Meanwhile, Bush criticized Damascus anew and called on it to free all political prisoners.

In a statement, the president expressed support for the Syrian people, and said they "deserve a government whose legitimacy is grounded in the consent of the people, not brute force."

DOJ_NMG_0106381

The U.S.-backed government in Lebanon led by Prime Minister Fuad Saniora is being challenged by the Hezbollah-led, pro-Syrian opposition. Bush said Syria should disclose the fate of the many missing Lebanese citizens who disappeared following their arrest in Lebanon during decades of Syrian military occupation.

"The Syrian regime should immediately free all political prisoners, including Aref Dalila, Michel Kilo, Anwar al-Bunni, Mahmoud Issa, and Kamal Labwani," Bush said. "I am deeply troubled by reports that some ailing political prisoners are denied health care while others are held in cells with violent criminals."

Florida Senator Meets With The President Of Syria (MCT)

By Lesley Clark

McClatchy Newspapers, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON - Defying the Bush administration, Democratic Sen. Bill Nelson of Florida met Wednesday in Damascus with Syrian President Bashar Assad, saying after the meeting that he believed that there was a "crack in the door" to continue discussions with Syria on curbing the violence in neighboring Iraq.

Midway through the Florida Democrat's conference call with reporters, however, the White House issued a statement denouncing the Syrian government's human rights record and calling on it to "immediately free all political prisoners."

"Syrians deserve a government whose legitimacy is grounded in the consent of the people, not brute force," the statement from President Bush said.

The White House has expressed reluctance about diplomatic outreach to Syria because of the country's role in Lebanon, where it's suspected in several political assassinations, and its support of the militant Islamist groups Hezbollah and Hamas, which the United States has designated as terrorist organizations.

The administration said the statement on Syria's human rights was unrelated to Nelson's visit, but White House spokesman Tony Snow said the administration didn't "think that members of Congress ought to be going there." He said the White House had opposed Syria's involvement in Lebanon and noted that "it's a real stretch to think the Syrians don't know where we stand or what we think."

Nelson, a member of the Foreign Relations and Armed Services committees and an incoming member of the Senate Intelligence Committee, acknowledged that the State Department wasn't happy with his decision to meet with the Syrian president to discuss whether the country could help the United States find a way out of Iraq.

Nelson said that in the aftermath of the Iraq Study Group's recommendation for a stepped-up diplomatic effort involving Syria and Iran, "it was obvious that we were going to have contacts."

"Remember what the goal was," Nelson said. "The goal is to stabilize Iraq. I felt like that that was a nonstarter for them to say that I should ignore the (Iraq Study Group) report."

Nelson rejected suggestions that he was rebuffing Bush, saying he had a "constitutional role as a member of Congress. . . . I am on a fact-finding trip throughout the Middle East."

Nelson noted that other senators - John Kerry, D-Mass., Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., and Arlen Spector, R-Pa. - are expected to follow him and that the State Department eventually supported his visit. Personnel from the U.S. embassies in Jordan and Damascus escorted him.

Nelson said Assad agreed that Syria and the United States had "a common interest to stabilize Iraq" and that Assad "clearly indicated the willingness to cooperate" with the U.S. or the Iraqi army to secure Iraq's border with Syria.

"He has a refugee problem," Nelson said of the hundreds of thousands of Iraqis who've crossed into Syria, fleeing the violence in their homeland.

The two met for about an hour in the presidential palace in a meeting that Nelson described as "cordial."

Nelson said Assad made no specific request of the United States, but that they had a "sharp disagreement of opinion" over Hezbollah and Hamas. Nelson said he made it clear to Assad that the United States wouldn't ease the pressure on Syria to stop backing the groups.

The senator said he'd urged Assad to support the release of Israeli soldiers whom Hezbollah had kidnapped, but that Assad had responded by noting that Israel is holding 20 Syrians, one of whom recently died of leukemia.

Nelson also said he'd told Assad that he planned to go to Beirut on Thursday to meet with Lebanese Prime Minister Fuad Saniora, whose government Syria's ally Hezbollah is trying to unseat.

The senator said he was "not interested in going to Iran" but that he did raise with Assad the specter of a "nuclear-ized" Iran.

"He ought to understand that that's not only a threat to him, Syria, but to the entire world," Nelson said.

DOJ_NMG_0106382

The senator's trip includes stops in Israel, Palestinian areas, Jordan, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait and Iraq. He said he planned to report his findings to the State Department and the Senate Armed Services, Foreign Relations and Intelligence committees.

Nelson noted that he spoke earlier with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, who's rejected opening peace talks with Syria.

Olmert "said that he preferred that I not go, but knowing that I was going that he knew I had the interests of Israel at heart," Nelson said.

Bush Won't 'Be Rushed' On Iraq (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, December 14, 2006

President Bush yesterday said he is "not going to be rushed" into making changes in Iraq.

After meeting with civilian and uniformed military leaders at the Pentagon, the president, in combative language similar to his rhetoric during the recent congressional campaign, said some of the ideas being floated in Washington could cause the U.S. to lose the battle for Iraq.

"I've heard some ideas that would lead to defeat," he said. "I reject those ideas, ideas such as leaving before the job is done, ideas such as not helping [the Iraqi] government take the necessary and hard steps to be able to do its job."

Yesterday's meeting was the final big consultation he has scheduled as he ponders how to change course in Iraq. The White House said earlier this week that he would not be ready to announce those changes until next year -- a delay that caused some criticism from political opponents.

The president is also trying to navigate the politics of Iraq here at home in the wake of last week's Iraq Study Group report. The bipartisan panel recommended a goal of ending the U.S. combat mission by early 2008, and also said the United States should engage Iraq's neighbors, including Syria and Iran, in diplomacy to try to isolate the insurgents in Iraq.

The administration has balked at that idea, and yesterday criticized Sen. Bill Nelson, Florida Democrat, who held his own meeting during the day with Syrian President Bashar Assad. Mr. Nelson said Mr. Assad indicated he is willing to help control his nation's border with Iraq.

But the White House said the senator's meeting, which came on the same day the president issued a statement harshly criticizing Syria's human rights record, was not a good idea.

"We don't think members of Congress ought to be going there," White House press secretary Tony Snow told reporters, though he would not say what the administration's specific objection was.

But Mr. Nelson won't be the last senator. Sen. Christopher J. Dodd, Connecticut Democrat, said he is also planning a visit to Syria during his upcoming trip to the Middle East.

"When you've got governments like Syria which have influence on the course of events, it's important to engage with them," he said.

Meanwhile, two other prominent Democrats, Sens. Carl Levin of Michigan and Jack Reed of Rhode Island, called on Mr. Bush to declare that the U.S. engagement in Iraq is not open-ended. They said that would put pressure on Iraqis to find a political solution to the current insurgency.

"The most important thing is that he send the message to the Iraqi leaders that it's not an open-ended commitment," Mr. Levin said.

Mr. Snow said Mr. Bush has heard that idea, but said Iraqis themselves don't want an open-ended commitment. Still, Mr. Snow said Mr. Bush is trying to send a different message right now.

"The president has considered everything, but I think the most important thing to do is to send signals to the Iraqis that we're going to support them," he said.

2,000 Killed In Afghanistan Since Sept. (AP)

By Jason Straziuso

AP, December 14, 2006

Almost 2,100 militants have been killed in Afghanistan since Sept. 1 in operations involving coalition special forces soldiers, a U.S. Army spokesman said.

That means more than half of the country's insurgency-related deaths this year have come in the last three months.

About 900 of the 2,077 deaths came during Operation Medusa, a major offensive in September in the southern province of Kandahar. Special forces soldiers worked alongside conventional forces from Canada during the fight.

DOJ_NMG_0106383

The two primary missions for the U.S. special forces soldiers in Afghanistan are conducting counterterrorism operations and supporting NATO troops, Master Sgt. Clifford Richardson said in an interview this week at Bagram, the main U.S. base in Afghanistan.

Nailing top fugitives like al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden and Taliban leader Mullah Omar is part of the mission of Operation Enduring Freedom but isn't the top priority of the Combined Joint Special Operations Task Force, which commands all special forces soldiers in Afghanistan, Richardson said.

More than 500 U.S. special forces soldiers and 1,000 from other coalition countries operate throughout Afghanistan and outside the command of NATO's International Security Assistance Force, unlike conventional U.S. troops now operating in the east.

American special forces worked in parallel with conventional troops from Canada during Medusa.

"We were assisting the Canadians by providing some reconnaissance and some screening and it rolled into where they could no longer push forward," Richardson said. "We rolled into a different tactical maneuver set and took over as the main element."

The number of militants killed in action since Sept. 1 — when the current U.S. special forces group arrived for an eight-month rotation — was confirmed through either physical evidence, such as body counts, or through multiple sources, Richardson said.

About 4,000 people have died in violence in Afghanistan this year, according to an Associated Press count based on figures from NATO, U.S. and Afghan officials. Those figures often come from remote battle sites and are impossible to confirm.

Taliban insurgents have stepped up attacks this year, particularly in the country's south and east, and have launched a record number of suicide and roadside bombs this year.

Richardson said that special forces soldiers here no longer operate unilaterally, but "by, with and through" Afghan security forces.

"We prefer to operate through the partner units we work with and the government of Afghanistan," he said. "That just solidifies them becoming a sovereign nation and not relying solely on the U.S. military for their own protection and security."

Bidders Unready For Jobs In Iraq (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, December 14, 2006

Nearly two-thirds of the 276 Foreign Service members who volunteered to serve in Iraq next year were found unqualified for the jobs, aggravating a shortage that has left the State Department scrambling to fully staff its embassy and other operations in the country.

The department is now offering improved benefits and career-enhancing inducements in a bid to fill 49 vacancies in Iraq. All assignments to other foreign missions have been put on hold until openings in Iraq, Afghanistan and other high-priority posts are filled.

"Stability in Iraq is our nation's highest priority. We have an ongoing need for the talents of our very best officers and staff," the State Department leadership said in a cable to all U.S. embassies and consulates around the world last week titled, "2007 Open Call for Bidders on Iraq."

An accompanying Dec. 6 cable said the incentives package for those serving in Iraq "has been reviewed and revised ... to incorporate recently approved benefits and to reflect recently passed legislation."

The changes include preferred consideration for future assignments, more generous home leave and "enhanced promotion consideration" for those who have served in Iraq.

The cable said 276 Foreign Service members applied for 160 positions in Iraq beginning next summer, but only 82 were approved. Another 15 positions will go to entry-level employees, and 14 of those now in Iraq have decided to extend their tours.

Some diplomats were perplexed by the department's decision to reject so many of its own, while so-called career-development officers are now scrambling to find "clients" to volunteer for the jobs.

Others said many of those who applied never heard back from human resources. "Too many people have told me that they have bid on Iraq in good faith and followed up as appropriate, and simply gotten the cold shoulder," a mid-level Foreign Service officer said.

A Government Accountability Office (GAO) report earlier this year found that the staff shortages were leaving the department unable to fully carry out its stabilization and reconstruction tasks in those countries.

A State Department official said in September that the department will resort to "directed assignments" if necessary to find personnel for hardship posts, principally in Iraq and Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0106384

Officials from the State Department's bureaus of Near East affairs (NEA) and human resources said that, while they appreciate all bids on Iraq, some applicants "did not have the skills required for those positions or relevant previous experience."

"We had many volunteers, and we don't always go back to say 'no,' " one official said. "Bidders who simply put Iraq on their bid list but do not contact anyone in Iraq or NEA are not considered serious bidders, unless their background makes them stand out."

Some volunteers had "partial skills" and were approved pending additional training, the official said. Another official said that some previous experience in the Middle East or in postwar reconstruction is essential for service in Iraq.

Language and cultural training also are considered assets, though only about 30 officers currently posted there speak Arabic.

But even that is no guarantee of success. One Arabic-speaking junior officer with experience in the Middle East said he volunteered to go to Iraq when he first joined the Foreign Service last year, but he was rejected.

He recently bid again but was told that he first had to do a consular tour, which is mandatory for all officers before they get tenured. Now he is considering leaving the service.

Recruitment for Iraq has become such a sensitive subject at the State Department that none of those interviewed agreed to speak on the record.

Iraq and Afghanistan present the Foreign Service with severe challenges. But while reconstruction work in Iraq's provinces is the most dangerous in the service, some officers said the department should not be too picky when assigning staff to the embassy in Baghdad.

Several officers pointed out that there are still many diplomats who have no interest in serving in Iraq. A former ambassador said some of his ex-colleagues are considering early retirement because they do not want to be forced to serve in Iraq at the end of their careers.

Grassley Recommends Three For U.S. Attorney Job (DMR)

Des Moines Register, December 14, 2006

Washington, D.C. — Three people today were recommended to the White House by Sen. Chuck Grassley, R-Ia., as candidates to become the new U.S. attorney for the Northern District of Iowa.

The final pick for U.S. attorney in the district, which has offices in Cedar Rapids and Sioux City, will be made by President Bush and submitted to the Senate. The nomination must be approved by the Senate Judiciary Committee, of which Grassley is a senior member, and the full Senate.

The current chief prosecutor, U.S. Attorney Charles W. Larson Sr., is retiring at the end of the year.

“All of these candidates bring unique experiences and exceptional qualifications to serve as one of Iowa’s lead prosecutors. They would each serve Iowa well,” Grassley said in a statement.

The candidates recommended by Grassley are:

--Matt Dummermuth, a native of Elgin who currently works for the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice in Washington, D.C. He is a graduate of Iowa State University and Harvard Law School in Cambridge, Mass.

--Chadwicke Groover of Cedar Rapids, who has worked in in the Northern District office since April and served on the Senate Judiciary Committee staff for five years. He is a graduate of Bob Jones University in Greenville, S.C., and received his law degree from Mercer University in Macon, Ga.

--Lisa Krigsten, a native of Sioux City who currently works for the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice in Washington, D.C. Krigsten is a graduate of the University of Kansas and received her law degree from the University of Iowa.

Ukrainian Economy Minister Volodymyr Makukha inked a $45 million anti-corruption grant from the U.S. during a recent trip to Washington D.C.

The United States government has approved a $45 million grant to help Ukraine fight state graft, with another $500 million in the wings.

During Prime Minister Viktor Yanukovych's recent visit to the United States, on Dec. 4-7, Ukrainian Economy Minister Volodymyr Makukha inked the agreement, which entails assistance in control of corruption.

Representing the U.S. was Millenium Challenge Corporation, which describes itself as "a government corporation designed to work with some of the poorest countries of the world."

At a Dec. 12 press conference in Kyiv, Makukha outlined the components of the grant program: The strengthening of monitoring of civil society and exposure of public corruption; judicial reform; the monitoring and enforcement of ethical and administrative standards; the streamlining of enforcement of regulations; and combating corruption in higher education.

The Economy Minister said Ukraine had applied for the US-funded program about a year ago and has now been recognized by Millenium Challenge as eligible for financial assistance.

Millenium Challenge's assistance to Ukraine falls under what it refers to as its Threshold Program, an intermediary stage on the way to greater funding, known as Compact assistance.

"The Threshold Program assistance is used to help countries address the specific policy weaknesses indicated by the country's scores on 16 policy indicators," reads a Millenium Challenge press release.

Ukraine has shown progress in all sixteen indicators over the last year, except control of corruption, according to Millenium Challenge.

"As a result of reforms already undertaken, Millenium Challenge's Board of Directors named Ukraine in November as one of three countries newly eligible for Compact assistance."

Eligibility for the greater funding is determined by "independently measured" scores for indices such as political and economic freedom, investment in education, control of corruption, respect for civil liberties, health care spending, fiscal and trade policies and judicial fairness, Millenium Challenge said.

"Ukraine is among the most aggressive reformers on our 'Ruling Justly' indicators," Millenium Challenge CEO John Danilovich was quoted as saying in the press release.

"Ruling Justly," one of three categories under which the government corporation assesses a country, includes the "controlling corruption" indice.

"While this is a tremendous achievement, it is important to underscore that there must be continued performance on Ukraine's Threshold program while it participates in its Compact development process," Danilovich said.

One indice in the "Ruling Justly" category, where Ukraine showed a need for improvement was "controlling corruption."

"The struggle against corruption is critical to Ukraine's development," Danvilovich added.

According to Millenium Challenge, Ukraine's poor performance on the corruption index is primarily explained by flawed laws, lack of independence in the country's judiciary, and endemic corruption in law enforcement, education, medical institutions, customs and the tax administration.

The Ukraine Threshold program targets many of these obstacles and will be administered by the United States Agency for International Development (USAID) and the U.S. Department of Justice.

"Ukraine has been made eligible for … assistance, but it is up to Ukraine to organize itself, consult with its civil society and develop a proposal of sufficient quality and content targeting poverty reduction through economic growth for the MCC Board to consider," said Danilovich.

During the Dec. 12 press conference, Economy Minister Makukha said Ukraine would have to develop and present Millenium Challenge with a detailed program on how to fight corruption before it can get a shot at the large funding under Compact assistance.

"It is very important for us to make up our minds about a clear program that we would be able to implement, determine the content of the program, and discuss the program with non-governmental organizations and civil society … only then can we apply to [Millenium Challenge] in order to launch this program and start implementing it", he said.

Olga Myrtsalo, a public information advisor with the Office of Program Coordination and Strategy at USAID's office in Kyiv, told the Post on Dec. 12 that representatives of Millenium Challenge will arrive in Kyiv on Dec. 18 to discuss the details of the $45 million program with Ukraine's government.

According to Ukraine's Economy Ministry, the U.S. ranks fifth in terms of direct investments into the Ukrainian economy. Millenium Challenge administers programs in dozens of mostly African and South American countries, but also Armenia, Georgia, Moldova and Kyrgyzstan, in addition to Ukraine.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron To Inmate For Skilling (AP)

By Patrick Condon

AP, December 14, 2006

WASECA, Minn. — This was what one of Wall Street's biggest success stories had come to. Jeffrey Skilling rode past a dozen waiting reporters and photographers, got out of the silver Jeep Liberty, hugged his wife and walked quietly into a life of imprisonment and menial jobs that will pay him less over the next two decades than he made for a single hour as chief executive of Enron.

Enron to inmate.

This was nothing like metropolitan Houston, but rather a farm town in Minnesota. There was no $4.7 million Mediterranean-style mansion, but a one-time college dormitory room.

Skilling reported to the Federal Correctional Institution on Wednesday, accompanied by his wife, Rebecca Carter, and his brother, Mark. The day before, a federal judge had denied his request to remain free on bond pending appeal of his conviction on fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and other charges in the multibillion-dollar collapse of the Houston-based energy giant.

Barring a successful appeal, even with time off for good behavior, the 53-year-old Skilling will be an old man at the end of his term _ 24 years, four months, more than twice as long as the sentence of any other Enron executive.

This then is to be his world until sometime in 2031: a group of low, red-brick buildings, once a branch campus of the University of Minnesota, now surrounded by two barbed wire fences and patrolled by an occasional white pickup truck.

Waseca, a town of 8,400, is 75 miles south of Minneapolis and even further removed from Houston's skyscrapers. There's an old-fashioned downtown with an implement dealership. The area is flat; the literal high points in town are the steeple of the Catholic church, a grain elevator, a water tower.

At the prison, inmates have access to exercise facilities, including a basketball court and a running track, and a pingpong table.

Like most inmates, Skilling is likely to be required to work in prison labor jobs such as food service, plumbing and painting for 12 to 40 cents an hour. At that rate, he would make a little less than $20,000 if he served his full sentence; at the helm of Enron, he earned more than $151.7 million, equal to about $24,000 an hour, from 1999 to 2001, the time span of the indictment.

Skilling and Enron founder Ken Lay were convicted last May on charges stemming from the Enron collapse, which led to the loss of thousands of jobs, more than $60 billion in company stock and more than $2 billion in employee pensions.

Lay died in July of a heart attack before he could be sentenced, prompting a judge to vacate his conviction.

Lay "probably would have faced a similar fate if he'd been able to stand up for sentencing on the same day as Skilling," said Leslie Caldwell, a former federal prosecutor and one-time chief of the Justice Department's Enron Task Force.

Andrew Fastow, the former chief financial officer pegged as the mastermind behind the complicated financial schemes that ultimately doomed Enron, got six years in prison after pleading guilty. Several other executives are serving prison terms of between 18 months and five years.

An important distinction, said former Task Force attorney Sam Buell, is that those below Skilling all pleaded guilty to some offenses, expressed remorse and in some cases went on to cooperate with the prosecution. In several instances, prosecutors recommended leniency in those sentences.

"It's harder for a judge to do that, to exercise that leniency when the judge is dealing with the person at the top who didn't reach any kind of agreement in the case," Buell said.

A better comparison for Skilling's sentence, Caldwell said, are those received by other disgraced CEOs like Bernard Ebbers of Worldcom, serving a 25-year sentence; and Dennis Kozlowski of Tyco International Ltd., who got eight and one-third to 25 years in prison in another fraud case.

"I've always thought since the beginning of the Enron case that none of this ever would have happened without Jeff Skilling," Caldwell said. "I don't think it's inappropriate that he is getting the harshest sentence of anyone."

Skilling's attorney, Daniel Petrocelli, did not return several phone messages from The Associated Press.

The Washington Post, December 14, 2006

Former Enron chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling reported to a low-security federal prison in Minnesota yesterday to start serving a 24-year, six-month sentence for his role in one of history's biggest corporate scandals.

DOJ_NMG_0106387

Skilling arrived at the facility in Waseca, about 75 miles south of Minneapolis, at 1:07 p.m. EST. Accompanying him in a sport-utility vehicle were his wife, Rebecca, his longtime assistant Sherri Sera and his younger brother Mark. Under federal guidelines, Skilling, 53, must serve at least 85 percent of his sentence -- or more than two decades. He is appealing his conviction by a jury in May on 19 counts of fraud, making false statements and conspiracy.

The Houston energy trading company that Skilling transformed became a symbol of accounting trickery after its December 2001 collapse into bankruptcy protection. Skilling and his co-defendant, Kenneth L. Lay, who died in July, bore the brunt of public vilification after financial scandals cost thousands of employees their jobs and savings.

In an emotional roller coaster, Skilling's immediate future was thrown into doubt Monday when a federal appeals court said it needed more time to consider whether he should remain free pending appeal. The next day, Circuit Judge Patrick E. Higginbotham settled that question with a two-page ruling ordering Skilling to report to prison.

But Higginbotham's ruling indicated that there were "serious frailties" with Skilling's conviction on several charges. That has given hope to Skilling's defense team that the appeals court may overturn at least some of his convictions. In his brief ruling, the judge did not cite problems with five counts of lying to auditors.

Defense attorney Daniel M. Petrocelli said in an e-mail message, "After all our arguments are presented, we are confident all the convictions will be reversed and Jeff will be given a new trial."

Over the course of the Enron probe, the biggest corporate investigation in history, more than 15 of the company's executives, including the leaders of its top three business units, pleaded guilty and agreed to cooperate against their former bosses.

Skilling's sentencing in October marked the last in a series of stiff penalties given to top executives convicted of corporate crimes committed in the booming '90s. His prison term is only a few months shorter than that of WorldCom founder Bernard J. Ebbers, who is serving a 25-year sentence in Louisiana for spearheading an accounting fraud at the telecommunications company he founded. Ebbers drove himself to prison this fall while his wife sat beside him in the front seat.

Skilling, who continues to profess his innocence and make the case that Enron was a healthy enterprise, will spend his time alongside 1,070 other inmates, most of whom were incarcerated for committing federal drug crimes, said Felicia Ponce, a prison spokeswoman.

Skilling will be required to work 7 1/2 hours per day at one of a variety of institutional jobs, including food service worker, warehouse employee and groundskeeper. Inmates earn between 12 and 40 cents per hour. The majority of the rooms in the prison, a converted college campus, contain space for four men, with a separate sink and shower area in a nearby location.

Skilling, who has openly wrestled with alcohol problems and depression, could slash more than a year off his sentence for successfully completing a prison treatment program.

A graduate of Harvard Business School, Skilling launched far-reaching ideas as a corporate consultant at McKinsey & Co. He was lured to work at Enron by Lay, the company's chairman, who died weeks after he was convicted on 10 conspiracy and false statements charges. A judge, following longstanding legal precedent, wiped out Lay's conviction because he had not had a chance to appeal before he died.

That means that Skilling, who left Enron a few months before its bankruptcy in December 2001, will be the highest-ranking leader of the energy firm to be called to account. Onetime finance chief Andrew S. Fastow, who pocketed more than $60 million for himself and his friends, is serving a six-year prison term. Former accounting executive Richard A. Causey will begin a 5 1/2 -year term Jan. 2.

No Fanfare As Skilling Walks Into Prison Life (HC)

By Kristen Hays, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, December 14, 2006

Man who once led energy giant is now federal inmate 29296-179

WASECA, MINN. — Jeff Skilling never saw himself as a felon, much less a federal inmate.

As of Wednesday, he is both, closing a major chapter in the Enron era of corporate crime that started five years ago this month when the company he professed to love mercilessly crashed and burned.

The 53-year-old ex-CEO's arrival at a southern Minnesota low-security federal prison Wednesday to begin serving a 24-year, four-month sentence had no fanfare.

He arrived in a silver Jeep Liberty in the passenger seat with his brother, Mark Skilling, in the driver's seat. His wife, Rebecca Carter, sat behind him, and next to her was Sherri Sera, his longtime administrative assistant at Enron who made an impassioned plea for fairness at his October sentencing.

The foursome took no notice of the small gaggle of photographers across from the prison's entrance. They parked the SUV at the front sliding-glass doors, got out and went inside, Skilling and his wife arm in arm.

He hugged his wife, then his brother, then Sera. Less than five minutes after they arrived, Mark Skilling, Carter and Sera emerged, climbed in the SUV and drove away.

A few minutes later, Skilling and several prison officials walked outside the building at the entrance — behind double fencing topped with shiny silver barbed wire — toward another building on the complex, which was once a University of Minnesota satellite campus.

The topcoat he wore when he arrived was already gone.

At this time five years ago, Skilling was talking to Securities and Exchange Commission investigators, insisting he truly believed Enron was healthy when he abruptly quit his post as CEO less than four months before the trading behemoth limped into bankruptcy.

He later did the same before two congressional committees, adamantly refusing to invoke his Fifth Amendment right to remain silent as others did, including former Enron Chairman Ken Lay.

Now Enron is a mere shell that exists to handle lawsuits and bankruptcy-related matters, its assets long gone, its stigma forever present. Lay, who fought a losing battle for vindication at trial earlier this year alongside Skilling, died of heart disease in July.

Skilling is now a number: federal inmate 29296-179.

Arrival generates buzzFor some in Waseca, a picturesque town of 10,000 flanked by two lakes largely frozen in the December cold, Skilling's arrival generated a little buzz. A prison employee parked at the entrance at daybreak Wednesday told colleagues arriving for work, "Skilling's coming today."

But to Jim Tippy, a retired warden at the Waseca facility who lives here, Skilling is just another inmate.

"It really doesn't faze me that much," Tippy said. "He's going to do his time somewhere. He was designated for this facility, so here he comes."

Sam Buell, a former prosecutor for the Justice Department's disbanded Enron Task Force who led the government's effort to secure the 2004 indictment against Skilling, said no one's incarceration is a cause for celebration, but "following through on the law's word is absolutely necessary to making effective our most potent mechanism for deterring people from seriously harming others."

Now a professor at the Washington University School of Law in St. Louis, Buell said that whether a multidecade sentence is needed to achieve such deterrence should be debated. Skilling received by far the harshest punishment of anyone convicted of Enron-related crimes.

"For major fraud that did in a huge public company, the answer has to be at least a substantial number of years. Whether decades are really necessary is a question we ought to be discussing as a society," Buell said.

Skilling had a glimmer of hope late Monday that he might be able to postpone or avoid prison when the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals stayed U.S. District Judge Sim Lake's November order that he report to prison by 2 p.m. Tuesday.

The panel issued the stay to give "careful consideration" to his bid to remain outside prison on bail pending the outcome of his appeal, which is expected to be filed early next year.

But late Tuesday afternoon, the appeals panel lifted the stay in an order that said, despite having found "serious frailties" on his convictions of conspiracy, securities fraud and insider trading, its review raised "no substantial question that is likely to result in the reversal of his convictions on all the charged counts."

That meant Skilling had to surrender. He wasn't given a specific deadline — but he arrived less than 24 hours after his initial surrender time.

Never weighed cutting dealSkilling was convicted in May of 19 counts of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and lying to auditors after a four-month trial. Lay also was convicted of 10 criminal counts in his case with Skilling and a separate case, but Lay died six weeks after jurors rendered their verdict. Lake erased Lay's convictions in October because he died before he was sentenced or could appeal.

Skilling staunchly maintains his innocence. At trial, he attributed Enron's demise to a skittish post-Sept. 11 market and a cash crisis that the company couldn't overcome rather than inner rot fueled by years of fraud.

Prosecutors countered that he, Lay and other top executives repeatedly lied about Enron's health to maintain an illusion of success when they knew Enron was propped up by unsustainable financial schemes.

When he learned what his sentence would be, he said he never considered cutting a deal with prosecutors in hopes of getting less time behind bars.

"I'm innocent," he said at the time. "I've told my children I'm innocent."

Skilling declined requests for an interview before he surrendered to prison.

He had hoped to be placed at a lockup in Butner, N.C. But the U.S. Bureau of Prisons instead chose the Waseca facility, which is partially surrounded by cornfields on the outskirts of the town.

DOJ_NMG_0106389

Skilling will sleep either in a cubicle with another inmate or in a former dormitory room with three other men — a far cry from his mansion in Houston.

At his sentencing, he agreed to turn over $45 million to the government. That money will sit untouched through the course of his appeal. If he wins, he'll get the money back. If his convictions are upheld, the cash will be distributed to Enron shareholders who lost money when the company failed.

Scrushy Motion For A New Trial Denied By Judge (WSJ)

By Rick Brooks

Wall Street Journal, December 14, 2006

Richard M. Scrushy moved a step closer to a possible prison sentence as a federal judge rejected the HealthSouth Corp. founder's claim that jurors who convicted him of political-corruption charges were influenced by emails and a copy of an indictment downloaded from the Internet during deliberations.

U.S. District Judge Mark Fuller, of Montgomery, Ala., refused to grant a motion for a new trial by Mr. Scrushy and former Alabama Gov. Don Siegelman, both found guilty in June of participation in a scheme to pay $500,000 bribes in return for a spot on a state regulatory panel. Both argued that two jurors used outside information to strong-arm the rest of the jury into a conviction, and Mr. Scrushy's lawyers had pressed for a wide-ranging inquiry into possible jury misconduct.

While the judge concluded that jurors were "exposed" to the indictment and a description of jury-foreman responsibilities posted on the court's Web site, it made no difference in the outcome of the 11-day deliberations, he ruled. The jury "carefully weighed the evidence and reached a reasoned conclusion free of undue influence," Judge Fuller ruled in a 57-page order.

The guilty verdict on all six charges against Mr. Scrushy, including bribery, conspiracy and mail fraud, could put him behind bars for as long as 20 years, though the judge has wide discretion on sentencing. A sentencing date won't be set until resolution of a challenge to the jury-selection process by Messrs. Scrushy and Siegelman, who have claimed blacks are underrepresented in the pool from which jurors are chosen.

Arthur W. Leach, one of Mr. Scrushy's lawyers, said he plans to appeal yesterday's ruling. Mr. Scrushy's legal team has criticized Judge Fuller's handling of the matter, including a court hearing last month at which jurors were questioned.

The political-corruption conviction isn't related to the $2.7 billion accounting fraud at HealthSouth, a Birmingham, Ala., surgery and rehabilitation-services provider. Mr. Scrushy, ousted from HealthSouth in 2003 and acquitted last year of criminal fraud charges, has insisted he is innocent of any wrongdoing. Last month, Mr. Scrushy and the company settled claims tied to bonuses he received during the fraud and legal bills, with HealthSouth recording a $35 million "recovery" from him and a $10 million reduction in a legal-fees reserve, according to securities filings. Mr. Scrushy maintains HealthSouth violated his contract when it fired him, while the company has sued him for allegedly breaching his fiduciary obligations.

HP CEO Mark Hurd Asked To Explain Options Cashout Before Scandal (AP)

By Jordan Robertson,

AP, December 14, 2006

San Francisco (AP) -- The congressional panel investigating Hewlett-Packard Co.'s boardroom spying probe has demanded that CEO Mark Hurd explain $1.37 million worth of options he exercised just before the scandal became public.

Hurd's cashout Aug. 25 — before HP disclosed the spying tactics in a Sept. 6 regulatory filing — did not appear to be part of a prescheduled program, the panel's ranking members, Reps. John Dingell and Bart Stupak, both Democrats from Michigan, said in a letter to Hurd publicly released Wednesday.

The activity came the same day Hurd was questioned by HP's outside attorneys investigating the circumstances surrounding the ill-fated effort to ferret out leaks by board members to the news media, the letter stated.

The congressmen asked Hurd to explain the reason for the transaction, seeking an answer on "whether executives are cashing in ('bullet dodging') while in possession of potentially damaging material facts that shareholders do not know."

Dingell and Stupak also asked in the letter to "please inform us whether any other HP officers or directors engaged in similar transactions during this period."

He was given until Dec. 21 to comply with the request. He testified Sept. 28 before the Committee on Energy and Commerce's Subcommittee on Oversight and Investigations.

HP said in a statement that it would comply with the panel's request.

Hurd and seven other HP executives and insiders cashed out options between Aug. 21 and Sept. 5. The company has previously said the transactions were unrelated to the scandal.

They fell within a three-week window each quarter when executives are allowed to sell shares after earnings are announced, HP said.

DOJ_NMG_0106390

On Aug. 25, Hurd exercised options on 100,000 HP shares, about 6 percent of the total stock compensation package he received at the time of his hiring. The August sale netted him a profit of about $1.37 million, according to the filings.

The cashouts have also prompted attorneys who are suing top HP executives and directors over the scandal to add insider-trading claims to the lawsuit in California on behalf of all HP shareholders.

HP's stock price has remained relatively buoyant throughout the scandal, though the uproar has led to a purging of its top ranks and felony charges against two ousted HP insiders — former Chairwoman Patricia Dunn and former ethics chief Kevin Hunsaker — and three outside investigators, Ronald DeLia, Matthew DePante and Bryan Wagner.

They have all pleaded not guilty in Santa Clara County Superior Court to charges of identity theft and fraud for their roles. Their lawyers are scheduled to return to court Jan. 17.

Investors have largely applauded HP's efforts to move beyond the scandal, including the company's agreement last week to pay $14.5 million to settle a civil lawsuit brought by state Attorney General Bill Lockyer alleging unfair business practices related to the probe.

However, the FBI, the Securities and Exchange Commission, federal prosecutors and other agencies are still looking into the shady practice investigators used to impersonate HP directors and journalists to secretly obtain their confidential phone logs.

On Wednesday, HP shares lost 16 cents, to close at $39.67 on the New York Stock Exchange. The stock has risen since about 9 percent since Sept. 5 — the day before the scandal was disclosed — when it closed at $36.46.

HP CEO Asked To Explain Stock Sale (FT)

By Kevin Allison

Financial Times, December 14, 2006

The congressional panel investigating Hewlett-Packard's boardroom spying probe on Wednesday demanded that Mark Hurd, chief executive, explain a $1.37m stock sale he made just days before news of the scandal became public.

In a letter dated December 12, two Democratic members of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, Rep John Dingell and Rep Bart Stupak, said it appeared that Mr Hurd had voluntarily cashed in $1.37m in stock options on August 25. That is the same day Mr Hurd was questioned by HP's outside attorneys, who were condcting an investigation into the scandal.

The letter asked Mr Hurd to confirm the date and explain the alleged stock sale. It said the sale did "not appear to be a part of any prescheduled programme" of share disposals.

"Continuing revelations about widespread 'backdating' and 'spring-loading' abuses have raised questions about whether executives are cashing in ('bullet dodging') while in posession of potentially damaging material facts that shareholders do not know," it said.

HP said it had received the letter and that it would respond to the inquiry.

HP's shares were mostly unaffected in the weeks after the company admitted its detectives had spied on board members, journalists and their families in order to uncover the source of a boardroom leak.

The investigation's dubious tactics, which included the potentially fraudulent acquisition of telephone records and physical surveillance, sparked a furore that claimed the jobs of Patricia Dunn, HP's former chairman, and several other HP officials. Ms Dunn and four others are facing criminal charges including identity theft for their role in the scandal. All five pleaded not guilty.

Last week, HP announced that it would pay $14.5m to settle any civil complaints brought by the state of California in connection with the case. The company remains under investigation by federal authorities including the US Justice Department. It is also facing shareholder lawsuits.

Wednesday's news came as HP announced a three-year partnership with Microsoft, the world's biggest software maker. Under the deal, HP and Microsoft will invest $300m to develop new products and services for business communciations, content management and other areas where their businesses overlap. The partnership will cover product development, testing and marketing.

HP's shares fell 0.4 per cent to close at $39.67 on Wednesday.

H.P. Board Cuts Its Ties With Lawyer (NYT)

By Damon Darlin

New York Times, December 14, 2006

Hewlett-Packard's board has ended a crucial advisory relationship with Larry W. Sonsini, the powerful Silicon Valley lawyer, according to a person with close connections to the board.

The move is the latest repercussion from the company's spying on directors and journalists, which has led to the criminal prosecution of its former chairwoman and a senior company lawyer by California authorities, several federal investigations, $14.5 million in civil fines as well as considerable embarrassment for a company that prided itself on ethical behavior.

DOJ_NMG_0106391

After the year's end, Mr. Sonsini and the firm he helped build, Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, will no longer serve as outside counsel to the board. The law firm will still do legal work for Hewlett-Packard. A company spokesman said yesterday that "Wilson Sonsini will continue to have a relationship with H. P."

Mr. Sonsini and his firm were not involved in the spying, which began after Patricia C. Dunn, the H. P. chairwoman, directed company lawyers and investigators to find the source of board leaks. But he was caught up in the events, and was criticized for failing to prevent the incident from damaging the H.P.

H.P.'s search for another lawyer to serve as outside counsel is expected to set off a scramble among Silicon Valley firms. "It's not a big revenue item for a law firm, but being able to say to other clients that 'I give advice to H.P.,' is a prestige thing," said a lawyer who did not want to be identified because he has done work for the company.

A spokeswoman for the Sonsini firm, Courtney Dorman, said, "There is a lot of ongoing work with H. P." The firm handled the transactional work for H. P.'s recent $4.5 billion acquisition of Mercury Interactive, a business software company.

Mr. Sonsini, who serves as chairman of the firm he joined in 1966, had no comment. Ms. Dorman also said that the firm's chief executive, John V. Roos, had no comment.

Mr. Sonsini has served as H. P.'s outside counsel since the mid-1990s and he advised the company during its contentious battle with shareholders over the merger with Compaq. The firm's clients include some of the region's most important companies, among them Apple, Google, Sun Microsystems and Applied Materials, and Mr. Sonsini helped take many of them public. He also serves as the chairman of the Regulation, Enforcement and Listing Standards Committee of the New York Stock Exchange and as chairman of its Legal Advisory Committee.

Mr. Sonsini has been faulted by some lawyers for not protecting the company after a director, Thomas J. Perkins, disclosed the practice of pretexting: the use of false identities to obtain the private phone records. H. P.'s detectives used the technique to get records of certain directors and journalists who covered the company.

In May 2006, another director, George A. Keyworth II, was identified as the source of the leak and was asked to resign. He refused to do so, but Mr. Perkins resigned, he now says, in anger over the investigation.

After the resignation, Mr. Sonsini, in his role as outside counsel, immediately interviewed Mr. Perkins. But he did not find that Mr. Perkins had resigned because of a disagreement with the company, which would have prompted the board to disclose the circumstances to the Securities and Exchange Commission. That has prompted an S.E.C. investigation.

Mr. Perkins also alerted the board to the use of pretexting, calling it illegal. In a response, Mr. Sonsini told him that the pretexting was "within legal limits," though that opinion turned out to be based on the advice of the H. P. lawyer, now facing charges, who in turn had received the opinion from a Boston lawyer sharing an office with one of H. P.'s private investigators.

The Sonsini firm in late August interviewed people involved in the spying, as well as Mark V. Hurd, the company chairman and chief executive, and concluded again that nothing illegal had occurred. In early September, the company filed a statement to the S.E.C. disclosing the pretexting and stating that it was "not generally unlawful."

A Congressional subcommittee asked Mr. Sonsini to testify during its investigation of the spying. He was called to testify alongside Ms. Dunn and had to sit in the witness seat for more than five hours, though she got the brunt of the queries. He defended his law firm's work during the hearing and said that he considered pretexting to be unethical and improper.

Hurd: HP Will Cut More To Continue Transformation (IDG)

By Elizabeth Montalbano

IDG News Service, December 14, 2006

December 12, 2006 (IDG News Service) -- NEW YORK -- Hewlett-Packard Co. continues to diversify and streamline its business according to goals CEO Mark Hurd set when he joined the company nearly two years ago. But the company still needs to cut costs to achieve operational efficiency, Hurd told financial analysts today.

"We are a company that is transforming, we are not a company that has transformed," Hurd said, speaking at a meeting of securities analysts here.

Hurd acknowledged that the cost of operations is still too high for the company to run as efficiently as it should, though the company has completed a 10% workforce reduction started last year as part of a huge restructuring effort. Since he took over, Hurd said HP has analyzed its cost structure, down to knowing its IT costs by employee, site and function.

"We do understand our costs now more than we did a year ago," Hurd said. But the company still needs to reduce costs and improve efficiency, which Hurd vowed HP will achieve in the next several years.

Complicating this goal is HP's acquisition strategy, as the company is working to absorb companies it purchased in 2006. The company also explained how it would integrate Mercury Interactive Corp., a software company HP acquired for $4.5 billion. The company is introducing a business technology optimization (BTO) software portfolio that brings together Mercury's applications management software with HP's systems and network management software marketed under its OpenView software family. BTO is a software product category intended to help companies use technology to meet business goals.

Hurd told securities analysts not to expect more acquisitions of this size in the future from HP, a comment that would appear to put an end to rumors that the company may buy security company Symantec Corp. Instead, the company will make smaller acquisitions as they strategically and operationally make sense, he said.

Before Hurd spoke, HP announced that it has agreed to acquire business intelligence services company Knightsbridge Solutions Holdings Corp., a 700-person company in Chicago, for an undisclosed sum.

Hurd made no mention of the boardroom spying scandal that hit the headlines in September, and which has former HP executives awaiting a criminal case that will decide whether they used illegal means to detect news leaks on the board. Instead, Hurd focused on operational efficiency and other goals, including deriving revenue from a more diverse mix of sales and services and improving its sales and customer service.

Hurd also thanked HP Executive Vice President and Chief Financial Officer Bob Wayman for his 37 years of service at the company. On Monday, Wayman said he would retire, effective Jan 1. Catherine Lesjak, the company's treasurer, who has been with HP for 20 years, will succeed Wayman.

From a financial perspective, HP weathered the scandal that rocked the company this year unscathed, earning nearly three times the profits in fiscal 2006, $6.2 billion, than it did in 2005, when the company earned $2.4 billion.

Hurd said HP still has more progress to make in terms of tapping its "total addressable market," which he said in 2009 will be about a trillion dollars. "After careful analysis, we've decided that is big," he deadpanned.

To achieve this goal, HP continues to try to improve its sales tactics, Hurd said. Traditionally, he said, it ran on the theory that "if we build great technology, customers will find it." Now, "we have this new advanced theory," he said. "If we actually try to sell the stuff, we'll actually get more revenue."

S.E.C. Eases Regulations On Business (NYT)

By Stephen Labaton

New York Times, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 13 — Responding to criticism that regulators had overreacted to years of major corporate scandals, the Securities and Exchange Commission on Wednesday issued a flurry of deregulatory orders and proposals intended to lower costs to public companies. It said the moves would not reduce investor protection.

In a daylong proceeding, the commission proposed a loose interpretation for smaller companies of an auditing provision of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 that has come under attack from many companies.

It also proposed a rule to make it easier for foreign companies to withdraw their securities from American markets. A number of companies have asked to withdraw, and officials said the current rules discouraged companies from listing on United States exchanges if they did not have the option of withdrawing later.

“We hope these proposals, when combined, will make the U.S. markets more attractive and we will get more companies here,” said John W. White, director of the commission’s division of corporation finance.

Among other noteworthy proposals the S.E.C. issued was one that would increase the financial qualifications for investors in hedge funds, to a net worth of $2.5 million from the current standard of $1 million. Officials said the proposal had the effect of adjusting the original rule for inflation, just as hedge funds are becoming more popular among some less wealthy people. The agency also proposed a new provision on fraud to protect hedge fund investors.

Some officials said the two proposals could blunt attempts to impose other tougher regulations or disclosure requirements on hedge funds. Six months ago, a federal appeals court said the commission exceeded its authority when it tried to force hedge fund managers to register with it.

The S.E.C. also adopted a rule that would save corporations the expense of mailing financial reports and proxy statements by enabling them to communicate with the vast majority of their investors through the Internet. (Investors can continue to receive paper copies of proxies and other material through the mail if they request them.)

And it proposed rules that would make it easier and less costly for banks to offer brokerage services.

Taken together, the proposals and rules are expected to provide enormous savings for public companies and Wall Street investment houses. Senior officials at the commission said the proposals and rules would not reduce the regulatory protections already afforded to investors.

The S.E.C.’s deregulatory push came a day after the Justice Department, in response to similar complaints, imposed new limits on federal prosecutors in white-collar corruption cases. Under those new guidelines, prosecutors in the field will now have to obtain permission from senior officials before trying to get companies that are under investigation to waive their attorney-client privilege.

In weighing whether to seek the indictment of a company, the prosecutors will also no longer be permitted to consider whether the company is paying the legal fees of an employee involved in the inquiry.

In recent weeks, Bush administration officials and business groups have criticized some of the changes in corporate law, securities rules and criminal procedures that were enacted in the wake of accounting frauds five years ago at Enron, WorldCom and other highflying companies.

It remains to be seen whether the decisions by the commission and the Justice Department will take political pressure off Congress to go further, or whether the business groups that have been critical of the S.E.C. rules and the Justice Department's approach will be able to persuade lawmakers to retrench further.

The commission's votes on all the measures Wednesday were unanimous, testimony to both the changed regulatory climate and the political skills of the agency's chairman, Christopher Cox, a former Republican member of Congress. He tailored the changes to avoid the divisiveness that had troubled the tenure of his predecessor.

Mr. Cox said the unifying theme of the proposals and the new rules was to increase the competitiveness and transparency of companies and markets.

"If America's markets aren't competitive, investors lose," he said. "If America's markets are not transparent and open, investors lose."

Like the decision at the Justice Department, the changes announced by the commission on Wednesday fell short of what some companies and groups had sought. In the case of the auditing rules, for instance, many businesses had sought an exemption from the requirements of Section 404 of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act. That provision requires public companies to assess the controls they have put in place to ensure that their financial reports are reliable.

Instead of a blanket exemption, officials said, the proposed guidance would give many small companies a powerful new tool in restricting their auditors from engaging in what the executives viewed as expensive and unnecessary audits of financial controls that had minimum impact on financial statements. A companion new auditing standard is to be proposed next week by the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board.

Under the guidance proposed by the S.E.C., executives would evaluate the design of only those financial controls that might carry the risk of having a material impact on financial statements. Commission officials emphasized that the guidance is being drafted to be less onerous on smaller or less intricate companies.

"Companies of all sizes and complexities will be able to conduct their evaluations more effectively and efficiently by following the proposed guidance," Mr. Cox said. "As smaller companies have less complex internal control systems than larger companies, this approach enables smaller companies, in particular, to scale and tailor their evaluation methods and procedures to fit their own facts and circumstances."

SEC Votes To Ease Audit Requirements (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

Washington Post, December 14, 2006

Securities regulators unanimously embraced a plan that they said would slash costs and restore common sense to an audit rule attacked as too expensive by business groups and lawmakers.

The Securities and Exchange Commission voted 5 to 0 yesterday to instruct corporate managers to focus their reviews on the areas that pose the greatest risk of fraud on financial statements.

Congress required executives and auditors to scrutinize corporate financial controls in the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley Act, which was passed after huge frauds at Enron and WorldCom. The rule, which cost businesses millions of dollars more than regulators anticipated, has been a lightning rod almost ever since, becoming what SEC Chairman Christopher Cox called "the single biggest challenge" in the accountability law.

SEC staff members said that under the new proposal, they would urge corporate managers to use their best judgment in evaluating controls, rather than requiring them to scrutinize specific things such as the integrity of executives and the accuracy of petty cash accounts. But, rejecting an approach advocated by some business interests, regulators refused to create special exemptions for small companies. Instead, they said their plan encourages managers to develop tailor-made reviews based on the size and complexity of their businesses.

Corporate managers have criticized outside auditors for performing unnecessary and expensive work to protect themselves from liability and make more money. Accounting firms argue that the high costs were the result of long-deferred maintenance and have since declined. The Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, which oversees the accounting industry, will make companion proposals for accountants on Tuesday.

SEC Commissioner Roel C. Campos, a Democrat, said the agency's proposal and the forthcoming rule proposal for auditors "will significantly reduce and in many cases wholly eliminate the inefficiencies and excessive costs while retaining all of the good."

Commissioner Paul S. Atkins, a Republican, said the plan may not be enough to force executives and auditors to focus on the most meaningful and risky aspects of their companies' finances. But SEC staff members expressed hope that their proposal was flexible enough so they would not need to revisit the issue.

The SEC proposal will be subject to a two-month public-comment period. Regulators hope they can pass a final version by April, in time for companies and auditors to use next year, said John W. White, director of the SEC's corporation finance division.

Separately, the five commissioners voted unanimously to propose new rules for investing in hedge funds, which are lightly regulated pools of capital designed for wealthy and sophisticated investors. The SEC has not changed its threshold for investing in the funds since 1982, Cox said, requiring long-overdue adjustments for inflation.

Concerns are mounting that more average investors and pension funds are pouring money into the $1 trillion hedge fund industry, which is subject to little oversight. A federal appeals court this year tossed out an SEC rule that would make fund managers open their books and register with the agency.

Under the current rules, individual investors need to earn an annual income of $200,000 for the past two years or have net worth of at least $1 million. The new proposal would force people to meet the old income criteria and show that they own at least $2.5 million in assets to be eligible to invest in hedge funds.

"We want to make sure that we send a strong signal . . . that caution is in order," Cox said. "We're taking steps to modernize the standard so it will be abundantly clear that these investments are not for mom and pop, unless mom and pop are very sophisticated investors."

The commission also proposed allowing companies to offer investors a choice in how they receive proxy materials and to voluntarily put that information online, which eventually could supplant paper documents.

Late yesterday, SEC leaders reissued for public comment a controversial plan that would require the majority of mutual fund board members, including board chairmen, to be independent from management. The proposal has been opposed by Fidelity Investments Chairman Edward C. "Ned" Johnson III, among others, and was rejected this year by a federal court.

SEC To Investors: More Internet, Less Hedge Funds (WSJ)

By Kara Scannell

Wall Street Journal, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Advancing several of its chairman's priorities, the Securities and Exchange Commission moved toward providing shareholders more corporate information electronically, shrinking the pool of investors who can invest in hedge funds and easing rules that critics argue hurt American competitiveness.

The electronic-information rule could affect nearly all shareholders within a year or so. The rule, approved unanimously yesterday, allows companies to distribute via the Internet annual reports and materials on board elections and other matters put before shareholders for a vote, while enabling investors to opt to continue to receive paper reports.

The so-called e-proxy rule will cut printing and mailing costs for corporations. But it will also make it cheaper for activist stockholders to launch fights against corporate boards, because shareholders of companies that distribute information to investors electronically will be able to do likewise.

The agency said it plans to make the e-proxy model mandatory by January 2008, though some members expressed concern about doing that.

Trying to boost U.S. competitiveness, the commission issued guidance it says will help companies be more "efficient and effective" when complying with a controversial section of the Sarbanes-Oxley law governing public companies' internal controls over financial statements. It also proposed a rule to make it easier for foreign companies to withdraw from SEC disclosure rules. Business groups have said U.S. regulations deter foreign companies from listing their shares on U.S. stock exchanges.

"If America's markets aren't competitive, investors lose. If America's markets aren't transparent and open, investors lose," said SEC Chairman Christopher Cox. If investors can't trust the stewards of the companies, he added, "we all lose," because they won't invest.

On hedge funds, the commission proposed cutting the number of individual investors who invest in the loosely regulated investment pools, which cater to the wealthy and institutions, including pension funds and endowments. Under current rules, which also apply to private-equity funds and venture-capital funds, individuals can invest in such funds if they have a net worth of $1 million or an annual income of $200,000 in the previous two years.

REGULATORY CHANGE

DOJ_NMG_0106395

The SEC took several actions Wednesday on Chairman Cox's agenda. Among them: · Approved optional electronic delivery of proxy statements and annual reports by 2008 proxy season. Investors can opt for paper.

· Issued guidance to firms making the internal-controls provision (Section 404) in Sarbanes-Oxley less onerous.

· Raised minimum threshold for individual investors in hedge funds to $2.5 million in investment assets, from $1 million of net worth.

· Will revisit its mutual-fund governance rule.

· Proposed easier way for foreign companies to withdraw from U.S. reporting rules.

Source: Securities and Exchange Commission

If adopted, the new rule would build on that standard, requiring hedge-fund and private-equity-fund investors to have $2.5 million in investment assets, excluding primary residences. The existing standard, in place since 1982, was intended to protect small, unsophisticated investors from getting in over their heads by pouring money into funds that often are riskier than, say, mutual funds.

The new rule could reduce the number of qualified investors by 88%, said SEC Commissioner Paul Atkins, a Republican who voted for the proposal. The SEC says 1.87% of all U.S. households were qualified to invest in hedge funds in 1982; today, 8.5% are qualified. The proposed rule will reduce that percentage to 1.29%.

The proposed rule would not apply to venture-capital funds. SEC staff members who drafted the rule said they wanted to avoid crimping the amount of capital available to such funds, because of their role in funding small start-up businesses. The 1982 standards would still apply to venture-capital investors.

Mr. Atkins expressed skepticism about that explanation, saying that it sounded like a "political rationale," and that venture-capital funds can be just as risky and vulnerable to fraud as hedge funds.

Roel Campos, a Democratic commissioner, said there was a need for "very moderate oversight" of the hedge-fund industry to see the full picture of risk to investors and the market. He suggested a carrot-and-stick approach: easing marketing restrictions for hedge-fund advisers that register with the SEC and submit themselves to a degree of regulatory oversight. A previous attempt by the SEC to require many hedge-fund advisers to register was struck down by an appeals court.

The SEC also voted unanimously to propose making it illegal for hedge funds to defraud, deceive or omit material facts to investors. The proposal would restore a similar rule voided earlier this year, when the appeals court struck down the hedge-fund registration requirement.

The SEC plans to seek public comment on the rules proposed yesterday, a process that often results in proposals being altered before adopted in final form, unless the commission decides to abandon them.

Mr. Cox said the e-proxy rule -- the only one approved in final form yesterday -- was one of several steps toward changing how investors access information. It dovetails with two other technology-based initiatives Mr. Cox is pushing. One will allow investors to quickly compare data in a corporation's financial statement with other companies' data. The other is an upgrade to the search capabilities of the SEC's Internet-based system for storing corporate financial reports, known as Edgar.

"We're trying to qualitatively improve the disclosures investors get," he said.

Business groups have been wary of using Internet-based proxies -- the documents that outline matters put before shareholders for votes. Their main fear is that activist investors would find it much easier to put their proposals before all of a company's shareholders. Consumer groups, on the other hand, have warned that electronic proxies could disenfranchise investors who don't use the Internet.

Some commissioners expressed concern about making the e-proxy rule mandatory, given other changes the SEC is weighing for the proxy process. Commissioners also fretted that a mandatory rule might crimp participation by shareholders without Internet access.

On Sarbanes-Oxley, the SEC's guidance appears to be an artful compromise aimed at addressing criticism about the law's Section 404, which requires companies to review internal controls and procedures over financial statements to lessen the chance of fraud and mistakes. The new guidance lets corporate managers use their discretion to focus on controls and processes that they feel pose the greatest risk and could result in major misstatements.

John White, director of the SEC's corporation-finance division, said the guidance is intended "to foster the preparation of reliable financial statements" and "bring information about material weaknesses into the public view." The guidance, which doesn't provide specific examples, allows management to make judgment calls "in light of the size, nature and complexity of the company," said an SEC staff member. It allows small companies more flexibility, officials said.

The SEC also voted to reissue a rule -- rejected by an appeals court this year -- that would require mutual-fund boards to have more independent members. The appeals court ruled that the SEC didn't properly consider the rules' economic impact, so the SEC plans to make two reports on the rules' costs and benefits available as part of its public-comment process.

Monster Worldwide Restates 9 Years Of Earnings (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, December 14, 2006

Monster Worldwide, owner of the most used online job-listing service, reduced past earnings by $271.9 million yesterday to correct stock-based compensation costs, and it disclosed more than $500,000 in improper payments to its founder, Andrew J. McKelvey.

The restatements cut net income for 2005 by $9.24 million, for 2004 by $14.4 million, for 2003 by $27 million, for 2002 by $44.9 million, for 2001 by $65.6 million, and for the cumulative period of 1997 through 2000 by $110.8 million, the company said in a statement.

Monster, which is based in New York, disclosed payments to Mr. McKelvey, 72, who resigned as chief executive on Oct. 6 and stepped down as chairman emeritus three weeks later after refusing to answer options-related questions. He has repaid $533,000 and may pay more, Monster said.

From 1997 to 2003, options grants were misdated “intentionally, by persons formerly in positions of responsibility,” to increase their value, the company said.

Monster is among at least 80 companies that have restated their financial results or said they would correct options accounting. The company said in June that internal auditors, the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission had started reviewing options grants. On Nov. 22, Monster fired its general counsel, Myron F. Olesnyckyj, amid the investigations.

Investigators found that the company had paid for health care costs of nine relatives of Mr. McKelvey and nine people who were personally employed by him at varying times since 1997. It also granted stock options to four of his personal employees.

Monster also disclosed payments of thousands of dollars in rent and aircraft fees to businesses owned or controlled by Mr. McKelvey.

Kelly Flynn, an analyst at UBS, wrote yesterday in a note to clients that the transactions were “troubling” and might weigh on Monster’s reputation and increase the risk of further regulatory inquiries.

But Glenn Greene of ThinkEquity Partners in Chicago, who has a buy rating on the shares, said, “This puts the issue behind them, and it doesn’t impact the fundamentals of the business going forward.”

In trading yesterday, Monster’s stock fell 31 cents, to $44.18.

New Fed Case In Muni Market Looks Like The Old Case: Joe Mysak (BLOOM)

By Joe Mysak

Bloomberg, December 14, 2006

Dec. 13 (Bloomberg) -- This is how the government's case against the municipal market will look.

The Department of Justice will put out a press release. It will read something like this:

``In the first prosecution of its kind, the Justice Department's Antitrust Division today brought criminal securities fraud charges against a securities brokerage firm for using fictitious noncompetitive bids and other misrepresentations during the restructuring of a municipal bond escrow account."

There you have it. This passage contains almost everything you need to know about what's going on in the municipal market right now. There's the Justice Department's Antitrust Division, criminal charges, and anticompetitive practices in connection with the reinvestment of money raised in a bond sale.

Yet the above paragraph isn't a look into the future. Insert ``California" in front of ``securities brokerage firm" and ``Tampa, Florida," in front of ``municipal bond escrow account," and you have the wording of a Department of Justice press release sent out on Sept. 28, 1995, more than 11 years ago.

Here's the second paragraph: ``The criminal securities fraud charge, along with a wire fraud charge, were filed in U.S. District Court in San Francisco against Municipal Government Investment Associates Inc., a San Francisco brokerage firm."

Bad Bids

What happened? The indictment of MGIA was at the time thought to be the first shot in the government's battle to reform the reinvestment of proceeds business, and so it was.

The press release went on to quote Assistant Attorney General Anne K. Bingaman saying that the charges resulted from a continuing federal grand jury investigation into collusive bidding and fraud in the municipal bond escrow restructuring business.

The parties involved all disgorged profits and paid fines.

And then? And then five years later, in April 2000, 16 securities firms paid $120 million to settle charges that they had systematically ripped off municipalities for the bonds used to fund escrow accounts.

DOJ_NMG_0106397

These 16 had to pay another $20 million to various issuers, and were later joined by a number of other securities firms. None of them, of course, admitted to liability in what was known as the ``yield-burning" investigation; they merely ``settled charges."

Again I say: What happened? MGIA was the first shot in a war that was never fought. At some point, this entire investigation took a very different turn, indeed.

`Anticompetitive Practices'

This is a funny thing. Or maybe it is a tragic-funny thing. Here it is more than a decade later, and a full investigation and round of settlements later, and the government says it is still looking at bid-rigging, price-fixing, kickbacks and ``anticompetitive practices" in the municipal bond market's reinvestment of proceeds business.

I don't understand. Back in 2000, after the global settlement was announced (at least to hear the lawyers tell the story), the government had succeeded in cleaning up Muniland. They had changed the way Wall Street and Main Street did business. Right? And wasn't that a great thing?

Well, guess what? We are right back to where we started with MGIA. The firm was doing the same things that everyone is so exercised about today. At some point, the Feds stopped pursuing the relative small-timers in the snake-pit that is apparently the reinvestment of proceeds business, and instead focused on the big Wall Street firms that systematically mispriced the Treasury securities used in escrow accounts.

What Happened?

A pretty good case can be made that the Feds should have stuck with the MGIA strand, where the dealings were dirtier and nastier and perhaps resulted in more lasting damage to public finance.

MGIA was run and owned 65 percent by one guy who also worked for another firm involved in the same Tampa, Florida, transaction. MGIA had a secret profit-splitting arrangement with the larger firm (Kidder Peabody & Co.) that ``won" the right to provide the city of Tampa with an investment agreement. The Department of Justice said the bidding was rigged in Kidder's favor.

And then there's the whole matter of the ``value" of the agreement. You can see why people are so anxious to get into this business. Kidder paid the city $1.32 million for the right to provide an investment agreement that was, the government said, worth $3 million more -- and then split that profit with the guy at MGIA.

These are all the elements that the Feds say they are so interested in, now.

Who was minding the store? For years now, the market's regulators have been saying they don't regulate the swaps and derivatives and investment-agreement business. This was apparently a license to pillage the public treasuries. And yet more than a decade ago, they were heading down that road. They had found all sorts of criminal and anticompetitive practices, and had even managed to win a case. And then that was it.

Why didn't they finish the job? Is the market better off for the extra decade of profitable, unfathomable shenanigans?

What happened?

CRIMINAL LAW:

Feds Won't Let Some Sex Offenders Go (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Justice Department is planning to detain an undetermined number of violent sex offenders after they have completed their federal prison sentences as part of a program aimed at protecting children, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says.

The initiative, modeled after "civil commitment" laws in 18 states that have kept 2,000 sex offenders locked up for mental health treatment after they served their sentences, will identify federal inmates who authorities think would pose a threat if freed.

It's unclear how officials will decide which offenders should be held past their sentences.

The potential impact on the federal prison system could be significant: Of the system's 190,000 inmates, 11,000 are sex offenders.

"We're working with the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) to see how we implement" the plan, Gonzales says.

So far, officials have referred 11 federal inmates for possible commitment after their time is served, the BOP says. The offenders would be treated at a prison in Butner, N.C.

DOJ_NMG_0106398

Civil commitment laws, which survived a U.S. Supreme Court challenge in 1997, have been one of the most extreme measures states have used to clamp down on repeat sex offenders. This year, Congress gave the U.S. government the authority to impose such a program.

Congress has "given us the right to pursue (civil commitments) and we are going to," Gonzales told prosecutors here last week.

Civil commitment programs for sex offenders have passed legal muster on the state level because courts have viewed them as similar to laws allowing confinements of mentally ill criminals until they are deemed fit to return to society.

For years, authorities from Virginia to Washington state have detained sex offenders well past their release dates and kept them in state treatment facilities. Civil trials usually determine whether offenders should stay in custody past their sentences, be released or submit to monitoring similar to parole.

Of the more than 2,000 sex offenders who have been committed across the nation, only 10% have been released after rehabilitation, says Dennis Doren, a Wisconsin psychologist and BOP consultant.

Critics say that such programs unfairly extend punishments beyond sentences set by judges and juries. "This is merely camouflage for lifetime sentences for some offenses," says William Buckman of the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers.

Gonzales Concentrates Outrage On Child Abuse (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson, Usa Today

USA Today, December 14, 2006

Horrific Internet images of tortured kids haunt Justice Department chief

WASHINGTON — In the spring of 2005, new U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales was still getting to know the Justice Department and its 100,000 employees when he stopped at Drew Oosterbaan's office a few blocks from the department's headquarters.

What happened during the next hour, Gonzales says, haunts him to this day.

Oosterbaan, director of the department's Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section, introduced his new boss to a branch of crime that had been largely overshadowed by the department's post-Sept. 11 focus on preventing terrorist attacks.

Gonzales watched silently as streaming video captured from the Internet showed fathers sexually assaulting their daughters, some younger than 10. Another segment showed men defecating on screaming babies whose tiny hands and feet were tied down with bath towels.

Rebecca Gonzales, the attorney general's wife, vividly recalls that day. The nation's top law enforcement officer, she says, arrived home clearly shaken.

"He didn't cry, but it was close," she says. "That was a terrible day. It changed him. That day put fire in him."

Passion and emotion aren't things the public sees much of from Gonzales, the former White House counsel from Texas who had long been a quiet, deferential confidant of President Bush. Unlike his predecessor, John Ashcroft, Gonzales, 51, often fades into the background at his own news conferences, content to allow subordinates to describe Justice's actions.

Until the subject turns to child abuse.

Punishing abusers has become a particular passion with Gonzales, who is emphasizing the issue like no other attorney general before him. He has launched an energetic campaign by the Justice Department to confront sexual predators with new prosecution tactics, new programs and the promise of more money to combat the problem.

Arrests and prosecutions in child exploitation cases have risen sharply since Gonzales took office nearly two years ago. Federal prosecutions jumped last year by the largest one-year margin in the past decade, from 1,244 to 1,576.

The get-tough tactics toward sexual predators include a plan to detain federal offenders after they have completed their prison sentences if they are deemed to be a potential danger to the public. Eighteen states have similar programs.

Gonzales acknowledges that preventing terrorism and the government's controversial surveillance and detention programs are his department's top priorities. However, in speeches and interviews he seems most energetic when describing — sometimes in surprisingly graphic detail — crimes against children and his desire to prevent them.

In an interview, Gonzales talks of being outraged by the images he's seen in evidence collected by investigators: Fathers forcing toddlers to perform oral sex. Physically imposing men abusing young girls. Some assaults are punctuated by the screams of frightened children, he says.

"To see the trust of these children violated is very powerful," Gonzales says.

Ernie Allen, president of the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, acknowledges that the explicit nature of Gonzales' rhetoric may be shocking to some.

DOJ_NMG_0106399

"I'm sure some people have counseled him that a senior official in government shouldn't be speaking in such graphic terms," Allen says. "He uses terms I've never heard a public official utter. I'm sure there is an element of risk to that. But what the attorney general has done is mobilize existing resources in a way that has never been done. The best way to do that is through the bully pulpit."

Allen says Gonzales communicates a "sense of urgency" no other public official of his rank has attempted. "What he is doing," Allen says, "is historic."

During a meeting with federal prosecutors last week in Washington, Gonzales said, "People often ask me what keeps me up at night. Obviously the threat of a terrorist attack never leaves my mind, and it is the top priority of our government to keep that from happening.

"But it is the faces of child victims that haunt my dreams. I can see their eyes, that awful emptiness, as if their tiny souls are trying to detach themselves from their desecrated bodies. I see the victims' images as part of my work. But now they are part of my heart, and I am not going to tire in this fight to protect them."

During his first meeting with Gonzales in February 2005, Oosterbaan recalls, he wanted to impress upon the new attorney general how the Internet had taken the exploitation of children to a new level.

Oosterbaan says he figured the best way to do that — and hopefully gain an important ally in fighting crimes against children — would be to show Gonzales the evidence.

Oosterbaan identified some of the most disturbing photographs seized by law enforcement officials. At the last moment, fearing the images would be too graphic, the career prosecutor scrapped the plan. "I couldn't scar him," Oosterbaan says.

Weeks later, Gonzales wanted a more detailed briefing. Oosterbaan remembers a phone call from a Gonzales aide who said, "Drew, he wants to see the images."

Gonzales arrived at Oosterbaan's sixth-floor office on New York Avenue NW and sat quietly as graphic videos of infants and young girls streamed across a computer screen, Oosterbaan says.

"Anyone who has seen these images are never the same, and that was true with the attorney general," Oosterbaan says. "He didn't say a lot. You almost see something drain out of people when they watch this. That is what I saw."

From that day, Oosterbaan says, he's never had a more influential advocate. Aside from Gonzales' emphasis on aggressive prosecutions and keeping convicted sex offenders in custody, the attorney general has embraced a range of initiatives aimed at protecting kids:

·The Adam Walsh Child Protection and Safety Act, signed into law this year, established federal penalties for convicted sex offenders who fail to register with authorities when they move from state to state.

·In May, Gonzales rolled out the Project Safe Childhood program, modeled after the 2001 Project Safe Neighborhood initiative, which targeted gun crimes.

The new program designates prosecutors in each of the nation's 94 U.S. attorney's offices to coordinate exploitation investigations and prosecutions with help from state and local authorities.

·Gonzales has created a group to work with Internet service providers to try to extend the time companies store user history data. Such an agreement, he says, would allow investigators to more easily track suspected child abusers.

Gonzales' interest in securing such data has drawn criticism from some privacy advocates who fear such information could be tapped for investigations that do not involve child exploitation.

The Electronic Frontier Foundation, a free speech advocacy group, has argued that the stored data could unnecessarily expose personal details of users who have no ties to criminal activity.

"It treats everyone as a criminal just in case it might be useful to the government," foundation lawyer Kevin Bankston says. "It's an incredibly invasive measure."

Oosterbaan says the initiative reflects an attorney general willing to do whatever it takes to curb crimes against children.

"What I see is a powerful and deep sense of obligation and responsibility," he says. "I have never heard a man in his position talk about the problem the way we (investigators) talk about it."

Gonzales is not the first attorney general to turn a spotlight on an enforcement issue traditionally relegated to the background.

Janet Reno, whose term spanned a series of national crises — from the first World Trade Center attack in 1993 to the international custody dispute over Cuban boy Elian Gonzalez in 2000 — focused on the safety needs of Native Americans.

Reno made frequent visits to Indian country and expanded the FBI's presence on reservations to help tribes with basic law enforcement. "He realizes that the placement of prevention and enforcement programs up front pays enormous dividends down the road," Reno says of Gonzales.

Seated in an ornate conference room that once was Robert F. Kennedy's office at Justice, Gonzales — the father of three sons, ages 23, 14 and 11 — says he doesn't necessarily want the pursuit of sexual predators to define his tenure. It's clear, however, that the issue isn't just his passion, it's his wife's as well.

Rebecca Gonzales, who once worked in the Texas attorney general's sexual assault division, is a volunteer at the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children.

"I'm firmly committed to going after terrorists," Alberto Gonzales says. "But this is a special category because we are talking about protecting the most vulnerable in our society: our children. As a father, the thought of anyone harming my sons is not anything you want to think about."

Former Children's Editor Sentenced For Soliciting Sex From Minor (AP)

By Rodrique Ngowi

AP, December 14, 2006

BOSTON— A former editor for the company that publishes the venerable Weekly Reader, a newspaper for elementary school children, was sentenced Wednesday to six years in prison for soliciting sex from a minor.

Noel Neff, 47, of Norwalk, Conn., also was fined $2,500, barred from using the Internet to access child pornography sites and ordered not to associate with anyone under the age of 18 without supervision from an adult who is aware of his criminal record.

"I made a mistake and I pay a heavy price for that mistake," Neff told U.S. District Court Judge George O'Toole shortly before sentencing. "I am extremely remorseful for what I have done."

Neff did not visibly react when the sentence was read. As federal marshals put him in handcuffs and led him away, he quietly said to his brothers, sisters and a nephew: "Take care, I love you."

His attorney, Francis O'Reilly, said his client planned to appeal.

"Our position is that a sentence of 60 months would have been more appropriate in this case," O'Reilly said.

A federal jury in May convicted Neff of using Internet to induce a minor to engage in sexual activity, which carries a mandatory minimum of five years in prison, and a maximum of 30.

Neff was arrested in July 2005 in a parking lot at the Franklin Village Mall. Investigators said he had arranged to meet with a 14-year-old boy named Chris for sex.

Chris was actually an FBI agent who had been posing as a minor and exchanging instant messages with Neff for two months, according to authorities.

Weekly Reader Corp., is based in Stamford, Conn., and publishes several magazines and periodicals for students, including Weekly Reader.

The company fired Neff a few days after his arrest.

At the sentencing, O'Toole recommended Neff be sent to a federal facility in Butner, North Carolina and attend a sex-offender treatment program offered there.

The judge also ordered a supervised release for five years and that Neff submit to drug tests and periodic polygraph tests.

Ex-church Camp Leader Arrested On Child Porn Charges; Allegations Include A Former Camper (AP)

AP, December 14, 2006

(AP) - COLUMBIA, Illinois-A former church camp leader was arrested on child pornography charges and accused of trying to coax girls, at least one of them a former camper, to pose partly naked or perform a sex act.

Aaron Niles, 20, began chatting with the girls online using the screen names "loverboyniles" and "godrocks30" after working at a Baptist summer camp in 2005, Columbia Police Chief Joe Edwards said Wednesday.

He was arrested Tuesday on three counts of child pornography and one count of indecent solicitation of a child related to incidents in April and May.

At least one of the girls in the allegations had attended the summer camp where Niles was a volunteer team leader, police said.

Investigators were still combing through Niles' computer Wednesday, but "once we complete this, the potential for additional charges are there," Edwards said.

He said investigators also were asking parents whose children may have attended the Super Summer Baptist Camp in Greenville in 2005 to check their children's computer for Niles' online user name.

Niles was jailed on $10,000 (â‚¬7,550) bond. He has an unlisted telephone number in Waterloo, near Columbia, about 15 miles (24 kilometers) southeast of St. Louis.

In a statement Tuesday, the pastor of Niles' Columbia church said the allegations left the congregation "deeply saddened."

"We hurt for the families who have been hurt by this," the statement from First Baptist Church pastor Jonathan Peters said. "We, as the leadership of this church family, have done our best to both protect our church and to demonstrate compassion to everyone involved. We have sought to show love without leniency."

U.S. Gets Subpoena To Force ACLU To Return Leaked Memo (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, December 14, 2006

Federal prosecutors are demanding that the American Civil Liberties Union turn over all copies of a secret document it has obtained, in what is apparently the first time a criminal grand jury subpoena has been used in an attempt to seize leaked material, the ACLU and legal experts said yesterday.

Prosecutors obtained the subpoena Nov. 20, saying their demand was part of an investigation into an alleged violation of the Espionage Act of 1917.

The ACLU says that the 3 1/2 -page document contains no information that should be classified and that the memo is only "mildly embarrassing" to the government. Some legal scholars said the case bears similarities to events in the "Pentagon Papers" case more than three decades ago.

The subpoena issued in the Southern District of New York provides the latest example of the Justice Department's aggressive use of the anti-spying law, a broadly worded and little-used statute that has become the bedrock in a series of leak-related investigations by the Bush administration.

In a motion filed in federal court, the ACLU called the subpoena an "unprecedented abuse" of the government's grand-jury powers that violates the First Amendment and is aimed at suppressing information rather than investigating a crime.

The civil liberties group -- which has been sharply critical of the Bush administration's terrorism and detainee policies -- said it is prohibited from disclosing the contents of the document. But it described the document as "nothing more than a policy, promulgated in December 2005, that has nothing to do with national defense."

"No official secrets act has yet been enacted into law, and the grand jury's subpoena power cannot be employed to create one," the ACLU wrote in its brief, which was filed with U.S. District Judge Jed S. Rakoff.

Officials at the Justice Department in Washington referred questions about the case to the office of U.S. Attorney Michael J. Garcia in New York. A spokeswoman there confirmed the subpoena but declined to comment further.

First Amendment advocates and experts in national security law said the subpoena represents a dramatic bid by the government to punish or intimidate media organizations and advocacy groups that attempt to publicize government policies and actions.

Lucy Dalglish, executive director of the Arlington-based Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, called the subpoena "disturbing," saying it would be easy for the government to attempt a similar move against a news outlet that had obtained a sensitive document as part of its investigative work.

"It shows me a pattern of aggressiveness to retrieve information that has escaped from the bubble," Dalglish said. "It's intimidation. It's trying to use all sorts of different methods at their disposal to stop proliferation of leaks from the federal government and to prevent public oversight of the executive branch."

William C. Banks, a law professor at Syracuse University and co-author of a leading textbook on national security law, compared the subpoena to a telegram sent in 1971 by then-Attorney General John N. Mitchell to the publisher of the New York Times, warning that publication of a leaked report on the Vietnam War violated the Espionage Act and demanding the return of the Pentagon Papers to the Defense Department.

"It's the same kind of scare tactics, it seems to me," Banks said, adding that he doubts the judge would enforce the subpoena because previous court rulings appear to support the ACLU's position.

The government is pursuing a series of leak investigations related to alleged violations of the Espionage Act and other laws governing the protection of classified information. These include a probe into the disclosure of a warrantless-surveillance program operated by the National Security Agency and the prosecution of two former employees of a pro-Israel lobbying group for allegedly violating the espionage statute.

ACLU officials said that they were told they were not the targets of the probe and that prosecutors had made clear they knew the identity of the person who had provided the group with the memo. Executive Director Anthony D. Romero told reporters that the organization has no idea how the government learned it had the memo.

The ACLU says in its brief that the document was sent as an unsolicited e-mail on Oct. 23 and that the e-mail and one printed copy of the document have been isolated pending litigation. The document is stamped "secret" and contains the heading "Information Paper," according to the subpoena.

The subpoena was issued after the ACLU refused a verbal demand from Assistant U.S. Attorney Jennifer G. Rodgers to turn over all copies of the memo, the group said. Despite the government's keen interest in the document, Romero said, the document does not appear to be particularly important or damaging.

"The government has made this document much more newsworthy now than it perhaps was at first blush," Romero said.

U.S. Subpoena Is Seen As Bid To Stop Leaks (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, December 14, 2006

Federal prosecutors are trying to force the American Civil Liberties Union to turn over copies of a classified document it received from a source, using what legal experts called a new extension of the Bush administration's efforts to protect national-security secrets.

The novelty in the government's approach is in its broad use of a grand jury subpoena, which is typically a way to gather evidence, rather than to confiscate all traces of it. But the subpoena issued to the A.C.L.U. seeks "any and all copies" of a document e-mailed to it unsolicited in October, indicating that the government also wants to prevent further dissemination of the information in the document.

The subpoena was revealed in court papers unsealed in federal court in Manhattan yesterday. The subject of the grand jury's investigation is not known, but the A.C.L.U. said that it had been told it was not a target of the investigation.

The subpoena, however, raised the possibility that the government had found a new tool to stop the dissemination of secrets, one that could avoid the all but absolute constitutional prohibition on prior restraints on publication.

The disputed document, according to the A.C.L.U., is three-and-a-half pages long and unremarkable, and its disclosure would be only mildly embarrassing to the government. It added that the document "has nothing to do with national defense."

"The government may be wanting to have its cake and eat it, too," said Rodney A. Smolla, the dean of the University of Richmond's law school. "It may want to present this to the court as not carrying heavy First Amendment implications. But to the extent the government wants to prevent the A.C.L.U. from disclosing the content of the document by virtue of this subpoena, it is a prior restraint."

John C. Eastman, a law professor at Chapman University, disagreed, saying that the subpoena was unusual but not improper and a sign of a moderate approach to a significant problem.

"Assuming it's properly classified," Professor Eastman said of the document, "I actually think the government is bending over backwards to accommodate the A.C.L.U. rather than pulling the trigger in prosecuting them."

"I'm not troubled by the fact that when we're dealing with classified documents there may be action taken to retrieve them," he added.

The A.C.L.U. said the subpoena was an effort to chill speech about the Bush administration. "The government is involved in a very conscious effort to suppress its critics," said Anthony D. Romero, the A.C.L.U.'s executive director.

Lauren McDonough, a spokeswoman for Michael J. Garcia, the United States attorney in Manhattan, declined to comment beyond acknowledging the A.C.L.U.'s filing.

In the past, the government has fired and prosecuted government officials who provided classified information to people not authorized to have it. It has also tried to force reporters and others to identify the government officials who leaked to them.

But the Supreme Court has drawn the line at efforts to restrain or punish the dissemination of truthful information about matters of public concern.

The Bush administration has been particularly vigilant in trying to keep its secrets. It has threatened, for instance, to prosecute reporters for publishing classified information.

DOJ_NMG_0106403

The A.C.L.U.'s lawyers said in court papers filed Monday that such subpoenas, if upheld by the court, would pose a direct threat to journalists.

"Many of the most important news articles of the past year (such as those concerning N.S.A. eavesdropping, rendition of foreign prisoners of our nation to other nations, Defense Secretary Rumsfeld's views on the deteriorating situation in Iraq, National Security Adviser Hadley's assessment of Iraqi Prime Minister Maliki, and the report on the Iraq insurgency's funding sources) have been based on classified documents leaked to reporters," the group's motion said.

Those articles, the motion continued, "could not be prepared and published as they have been were the government allowed to use subpoenas to confiscate 'any and all' copies of classified documents it learns are in the hands journalists and other public advocates and critics."

Experts in First Amendment law said that political advocacy groups like the A.C.L.U. are entitled to the same constitutional free-speech protections that journalists receive.

"In this case," said Floyd Abrams, a First Amendment lawyer, "the A.C.L.U.'s function is presslike" in that it collects, analyzes and disseminates information about the government.

In its motion to quash the subpoena, the A.C.L.U. said, "The document is nothing more than a policy, promulgated in December 2005."

It added, "The document contains no information concerning matters such as troop movements, communications methods, intelligence sources or the like."

The group's lawyers have agreed for now not to disclose the contents of the document, but hyperlinks to the papers posted yesterday on its Web site include the word "torture."

The identity of the source is known to both the A.C.L.U. and the government, the organization's lawyers said. The A.C.L.U. declined to name the source.

In November, Jennifer G. Rodgers, a federal prosecutor, called the A.C.L.U. and demanded the return of the document and all copies, according to court documents. She knew the date on which it had been e-mailed to the group, court papers say.

A subpoena followed. The A.C.L.U. moved to quash it, and Judge Jed S. Rakoff of the Federal District Court in Manhattan yesterday ordered the unsealing of the organization's filings and the subpoena itself. The judge will rule on the motion to quash shortly.

The Espionage Act makes it a crime for people who have unauthorized possession of some kinds of national security information to receive, retain, disseminate or refuse to turn it over to the government when asked. But A.C.L.U. lawyers say the document does not meet the statute's definition and that, in any event, a subpoena is an improper way to enforce the law.

In its filing, the A.C.L.U. also argues that the government is misusing the grand jury that issued the subpoena.

"Despite extensive research," the motion to quash says, "we have been unable to find a single reported decision even mentioning, much less enforcing, a subpoena purporting to preclude the subpoenaed party from retaining a copy of subpoenaed documents. There is no possible argument that there is an investigative purpose to such a subpoena."

"Girls Gone Wild" Producer Given Community Service (AP)

By Melissa Nelson, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 14, 2006

(AP) - PANAMA CITY, Florida-The multimillionaire founder of the popular "Girls Gone Wild" video empire was sentenced to community service on Wednesday after the company pleaded guilty to federal charges of failing to monitor the ages of the women it films.

Mantra Films Inc. also agreed to pay $1.6 million (â,¬1.21 million) in fines for using drunken 17-year-olds in videos it filed on Panama City Beach during Spring Break and failing to properly label its DVDs and videos as required by federal law.

U.S. District Judge Richard Smoak told company founder Joe Francis he added the community service to the fine because it did not appear a fine would be a meaningful punishment to the 33-year-old Francis, who makes an estimated $40 million (â,¬30.15 million) a year.

The fine represents less than 3 percent of Mantra films' profits since 2002 and only 12 percent of Mantra's 2005 profits, Smoak said.

Besides Francis, company president Scott Barbour also was ordered to complete eight hours of community service monthly for the next 30 months. Smoak said two other Mantra executives - likely the general counsel and chief financial officer - would also have to complete the community service, though the judge gave Francis the option of "stepping up" and serving 16 hours a month of community service himself and voiding his corporate officers' obligations to do the service.

"It does not take a very brave man to go out and corner a girl in the middle of spring break who had four drinks," Smoak told Francis.

DOJ_NMG_0106404

Francis said his policy has always been not to film girls under 18 and that the girls filmed in Panama City lied about their ages. Aaron Dyer, an attorney for Francis and the company, said his client would serve the judge's sentence.

Founded in 1997, Mantra released 83 different titles and sold 4.5 million videos and DVDs in 2002, according to Hoover's Inc., a business data firm in Austin, Texas.

A second company owned by Francis, MRA Holdings LLC, entered into a deferred agreement on charges of improper labeling. Under that agreement with prosecutors, the charges would be dismissed after three years if MRA Holdings cooperates with future government prosecutions, admits wrongdoing and pays fines.

Also pending against Francis are state felony charges in which he is accused of using children in sexual performances. He is accused of participating in the filming of two 17-year-old girls in sexual situations at a Panama City Beach motel in the same 2003 case that led to the federal charges.

Boeing Laptop Stolen, Putting 382,000 At Risk For Identity Theft (AP)

AP, December 14, 2006

(AP) - CHICAGO-A Boeing Co. laptop containing the names and Social Security numbers of 382,000 workers and retirees has been stolen, putting the employees at risk for identity theft and credit-card fraud.

The theft, which was confirmed Tuesday, was the third such incident at Boeing in just over a year.

Files on the computer also contained home addresses, phone numbers and birth dates. Some of the files listed salary information.

"It's very disturbing to us when things like this happen, and there are certain steps you can take right away ... but we realize we need to go above and beyond those," said Tim Neale, a spokesman for Chicago-based Boeing.

The laptop was stolen earlier this month when an employee left it unattended, Neale said. He would not reveal where the theft happened, but said no proprietary, customer or supplier data were on the computer.

The computer was turned off when it was stolen and a password is needed to log onto the desktop, Neale said Wednesday.

Boeing began contacting current and former employees Tuesday night, and it will provide credit-monitoring services for three years for those affected, Neale said.

There is no evidence that any of the previous thefts have resulted in wrongdoing, he said.

A Boeing laptop containing information on roughly 160,000 current and former employees was stolen in November 2005. Then, in April, a laptop containing information on 3,600 employees and retirees was stolen.

Neale would not say whether any disciplinary action has been taken against the employee involved in the recent theft. However, he acknowledged that in each of the incidents company policy was violated.

"It's frustrating because obviously you don't want to see this happen," he said.

ID-theft Rings Catered To Illegal Workers (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand, Usa Today

USA Today, December 14, 2006

A federal investigation that ended Tuesday in a raid on six meatpacking plants has uncovered criminal groups around the country that steal real birth certificates, Social Security cards and other documents and sell them to illegal workers, federal officials said.

One fraud ring mailed dozens of Puerto Rican birth certificates to a Worthington, Minn., man who resold them for as much as $1,000 to illegal workers as part of a set of identity documents. Some of the sets were bought by workers at the meatpacking plants, Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) spokesman Marc Raimondi said.

In its largest workplace raid ever, ICE agents on Tuesday arrested 1,282 workers at Swift & Co. meat-packing plants in Worthington, Minn.; Greeley, Colo.; Cactus, Texas; Grand Island, Neb.; Marshalltown, Iowa; and Hyrum, Utah. Workers were from Mexico, Guatemala, Honduras, El Salvador, Laos, Sudan and other countries, Raimondi said.

Illegal workers have traditionally forged documents and invented social security numbers, ICE Assistant Secretary Julie Myers said.

"The investigation uncovered substantial evidence that hundreds of illegal aliens working at Swift had apparently stolen the identities of U.S. citizens," Myers said. "The illegal aliens had obtained these documents from a variety of document rings and vendors."

In recent months, ICE agents have arrested members of document rings in Minnesota, Texas, Utah and Puerto Rico. Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said federal agents continue to investigate fraud rings tied to Tuesday's arrests.

More than 400 former Swift workers thought to be in the USA illegally are missing. In October and November, Swift interviewed 450 employees it suspected were working illegally and found 90% to 95% did not have proper documents, but Swift did not notify ICE, the court documents say. More than 400 workers were fired or failed to show up.

"Neither Swift nor ICE knows where those 400 workers are now," U.S. District Judge Mary Lou Robinson wrote in a court ruling on Dec. 7.

Agents were tipped to the fraud ring in February while in Marshalltown interviewing workers who had admitted assuming fake identities, Myers said.

ICE agents in July reviewed employment eligibility forms for 1,157 workers at the Swift plant in Hyrum. They found 300 people — 26% of the Swift workforce — had suspect identities.

One of those people was Jose Esteban Aleman of Logan, Utah, hired at Swift in 2005 under the name of Christopher Padilla, 22, according to a sworn statement. Investigators tracked the real Padilla to the Cook County, Ill., jail, where he had been held on murder-related charges since 2004, court documents say. Aleman has been charged with felony forgery and felony identity theft.

Swift said Wednesday it had resumed operations.

Pellicano Co-defendant Pleads Guilty To Federal Fraud And Wiretapping Charges (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 14, 2006

Daniel Nicherie admits hiring the former private investigator to wiretap a businessman.

The federal investigation of Anthony Pellicano took a surprising turn Tuesday when one of his co-defendants pleaded guilty to using the former private eye to wiretap a Beverly Hills businessman six years ago.

In an appearance before U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer, Daniel Nicherie also pleaded guilty to three other felony counts of defrauding the Beverly Hills businessman and others through pension fraud, wire fraud and money laundering.

Nicherie, 46, is the fifth person to plead guilty to having Pellicano wiretap his clients' courtroom adversaries or business rivals. Additionally, a former Beverly Hills police officer has admitted he illegally accessed government computers for Pellicano, and a onetime SBC employee has pleaded guilty to helping Pellicano by turning over confidential phone company records.

It was not immediately clear what effect Nicherie's plea will have on the ongoing Pellicano investigation because the U.S. government's allegations about Nicherie's actions would clearly make him a troubling witness for the prosecution.

Still, as the latest defendant to admit to wiretapping charges, Nicherie could provide authorities with another example of how Pellicano illegally spied on others.

"If you start adding up the number of people who have pleaded guilty to wiretapping, and then you hear … Pellicano denying that he wiretapped people, you have to ask yourself how believable he is," said one federal law enforcement source, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the ongoing probe.

Early this year, authorities unsealed a federal grand jury indictment that alleged Nicherie, his brother, Abner, and others hired — or worked with — Pellicano to wiretap others.

Although Pellicano and several co-defendants are alleged to have illegally gone after numerous celebrities or business executives, the sweeping 110-count indictment names the Nicheries in only one count: wiretapping businessman Ami Shafrir in late 2000.

At the time, authorities have alleged, Nicherie was posing as an attorney and investment banker in order to defraud Shafrir and his ex-wife out of some $40 million in cash, real estate and businesses. The fraud, according to an April 2004 indictment, involved an elaborate scheme through which Nicherie took control of Shafrir's companies, drained their assets and put the businesses into bankruptcy.

In that same indictment, Nicherie was accused of also defrauding Gil and Ezra Mileikowsky of Los Angeles out of $275,000 by persuading them to invest in a bogus business venture.

The fraud involving Shafrir looms as an especially significant event because at least one of Pellicano's alleged wiretaps intercepted a conversation between Shafrir and an FBI agent who was looking into the matter, records and interviews show.

The alleged intercept occurred more than a year before federal agents raided Pellicano's offices in 2002 in connection with a botched attempt to intimidate a Los Angeles Times reporter.

Until Tuesday, Nicherie had steadfastly maintained that he was innocent of the charges in the two federal cases against him. Like Pellicano, he had been held in federal custody without bond because authorities had persuaded the judge that he was too great a flight risk.

After pleading guilty in the case, Nicherie was taken from the courtroom and remained in custody. His attorney for the sentencing phase declined to comment, as did prosecutors in the ongoing Pellicano case.

DOJ_NMG_0106406

Assistant U.S. Atty. Jason Gonzalez, who prosecuted the fraud case and presented the plea agreement in court, said: "It's safe to say everyone is pleased it has been resolved."

Meanwhile, the Beverly Hills businessman targeted by Nicherie called the guilty plea "a major step towards justice.

"I am pleased to see him acknowledge responsibility, and I commend the [prosecutor] for his role in this process," Shafrir said in a statement. "Unfortunately, this is only the tip of the iceberg which has yet to expose the underbelly of the corruption involving Pellicano, phone company employees, certain police officers and departments who collectively participated in fleecing me out of millions of dollars."

Pellicano and five others, including a former Los Angeles Police Department detective and another former SBC employee, have pleaded not guilty in the case, which is scheduled for trial next summer.

Nicherie is scheduled to be sentenced in March and faces a maximum prison term of 35 years, although federal sentencing guidelines recommend a lesser penalty.

Criminal Mind On Death Row, Fate Of Mentally Ill Is Thorny Problem (WSJ)

By Gary Fields

Wall Street Journal, December 14, 2006

NASHVILLE, Tenn. -- At 8:30 a.m., Gregory Thompson, his hands cuffed to his waist, has already swallowed eight of the 12 pills he takes a day.

Mr. Thompson is on death row at the Riverbend Maximum Security Institution, and like many prison inmates, he is mentally ill. In addition to his daily drug regimen, he receives an antipsychotic injection twice a month. The medication controls his paranoia, delusions, schizophrenia and depression. It may also make him competent enough to be executed in the oversized wooden chair housed in a building less than 100 yards away.

Why the 45-year-old is here isn't in dispute. On New Year's Day 1985, he abducted Brenda Blanton Lane from a shopping-center parking lot in Shelbyville, Tenn., while stealing her car. He fatally stabbed the 28-year-old four times in the back. The last strike had such force that the butcher's knife he used came within millimeters of passing through her body. He left her to die at the end of an icy dirt road.

Today, however, Mr. Thompson's case is at the center of a complex debate about the death penalty in the U.S. Recently, the Supreme Court ruled that mentally retarded defendants and juveniles cannot be sentenced to death. Mr. Thompson is asking the courts to decide whether mentally ill prisoners can be executed if rendered competent only by medication. His twice-delayed execution and similar cases are working through the judicial system; one will likely end up in front of the high court.

There are more than 3,300 people awaiting execution in the U.S., according to the Death Penalty Information Center, a nonprofit group critical of how the death penalty is administered. Various organizations conservatively estimate that at least 10% of them suffer from serious mental illness. In all, about 17% of the nation's prisoners have a diagnosis of serious mental illness.

The Supreme Court ruled 20 years ago that federal and state authorities could not execute defendants too insane to understand that they were about to be killed. But states have wide latitude to determine how sane a defendant must be in order to be executed. They can also choose to medicate defendants to reach that point, a practice that's been outlawed in at least three states with the death penalty. Some medical and legal groups argue that it puts doctors in an ethical bind: having to treat people in order for them to be killed.

Little is straightforward in these kinds of cases. "Although there is a growing clamor to exclude the mentally ill from execution, mental illness is not easily defined," says David Elliott, who heads the National Coalition to Abolish the Death Penalty, a Washington, D.C., group. "With juveniles, you're 17 or you aren't. With mental retardation, they can do tests. Mental illness is much more complicated."

One of the most closely watched fights involves Steven Kenneth Staley, who murdered a restaurant manager during a 1989 robbery. The Texas Court of Appeals declined to hear his appeal recently, meaning Mr. Staley can be forcibly medicated. No decision has been made about how his case will proceed. Prosecutors argue that defendants could scam the system by feigning mental illness while others might avoid execution by refusing their medication.

DEATH WATCH

Tennessee's official Web site1 allows visitors to view the facilities at Riverbend Maximum Security Institution: · Death Row Housing Unit2

· Deathwatch3, where inmates are taken 72 hours prior to execution

Mr. Thompson, the Tennessee death-row inmate, takes Haldol, Cogentine, lithium and Prolexin. In the late 1990s, he was forcibly medicated. In 2001, the state requested the appointment of an official overseer to make sure Mr. Thompson took his medication. The state says Mr. Thompson is now doing so voluntarily. His court-appointed attorney, Dana Hansen Chavis, says that's only because Mr. Thompson "reasonably fears for his safety if he discontinues taking them."

"If I stop taking them, I'll end up naked and restrained again, so I take them," says Mr. Thompson in an interview.

The state doesn't dispute that medication alone makes Mr. Thompson competent. Rather, it argues on procedural grounds that he shouldn't be allowed to argue the matter in court. The only issue, the state argues, is Mr. Thompson's current mental status. His "submissions arguing for his escape from the death penalty are of themselves evidence that he is competent to die," the state says in its filings.

Mr. Thompson was born in Thomaston, Ga., in 1961 and from the age of five was raised by his grandmother after his mother was killed in a car accident. In documents filed with the court, his grandmother said she took to bed for six weeks after her daughter's death, drinking and not caring for her three young grandchildren. They occasionally got a meal or a can of food from neighbors, according to court documents. Other times, they would steal money from under the grandmother's mattress.

In 1979, Mr. Thompson graduated from Pike County High School in Georgia and joined the Navy. It was there he began experiencing bouts of paranoia and sudden anger, family and friends said in court testimony. He stayed in the military until he was dishonorably discharged in 1982 after attacking a noncommissioned officer. He returned home, worked a series of minimum-wage jobs and became prone to screaming and bouts of unprovoked anger, his family told the court.

During this period, he met Joanna McNamara, an unwed teenage mother. On Dec. 29, 1984, Mr. Thompson, then 24, and Ms. McNamara, then 15, traveled by bus from Marietta, Ga., to Shelbyville, Tenn., where they stayed with a family friend after claiming to be married. When the friend realized this wasn't true, she reported Ms. McNamara as a runaway, according to court documents.

As Mr. Thompson waited for relatives to wire money, he began imagining Ku Klux Klan members chasing the couple. Mr. Thompson is black, Ms. McNamara, white. To get away, he decided to steal a car.

The pair encountered Ms. Lane on the evening of Jan. 1 as she walked to her car in the Wal-Mart parking lot -- he picked Ms. Lane because she smiled and spoke to him, he recalls. She'd gone there to buy aluminum foil, recalls Sue Allison, a close friend and Ms. Lane's former boss. Ms. Lane, a newlywed, played piano for the Sunday school, ran a church prison ministry and had worked for several years as a local newspaper reporter.

"He chose the most gentle woman he could have found. Brenda would have given him the car," says Ms. Allison. "Brenda was one of just a few people I knew opposed to the death penalty."

According to testimony given at Mr. Thompson's trial, he forced Ms. Lane into the car at knifepoint and, as she recited the Lord's Prayer, drove around for over an hour looking for a place to leave her. He settled on a rural area in the lightly populated Coffee County in Tennessee's south-central region. As Ms. Lane walked away from the car, Mr. Thompson stabbed her.

Tennessee police initially thought she might have been abducted by someone she encountered through her prison ministry. Soon after, officials in Georgia called to say they'd caught Ms. McNamara and Mr. Thompson. The pair confessed and told investigators where to find Ms. Lane.

Authorities found her at 4 a.m. on Jan. 3, lying on her back at the end of a dirt road near the entrance to a soybean field. One of her lungs had been punctured, causing fatal internal bleeding. She remained conscious for about 10 minutes, according to the autopsy report.

Mr. Thompson's mental status has been the subject of a tangled dispute ever since he first stood trial and was sentenced to death. The first time Mr. Thompson's appeal traveled through the legal system, Tennessee's Supreme Court and federal district court both noted that no evidence had been presented proving he was mentally ill when the crime was committed. The Sixth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals agreed.

In June 2004, when a federal appellate judge was preparing a law-review article on the case, an intern working for him asked why none of the mental-health experts who examined Mr. Thompson addressed his mental state during his original trial.

The judge, Richard Suhrheinrich, studied the voluminous files and discovered that depositions and information from a North Carolina forensic and clinical psychology expert had been left out of the case. The expert, Faye Sultan, diagnosed Mr. Thompson with "Schizoaffective Disorder, Bipolar Type" and concluded he would have been suffering from symptoms at the time he murdered Ms. Lane.

"This mental illness would have substantially impaired Mr. Thompson's ability to conform his conduct to the requirements of the law," Ms. Sultan wrote in a report filed with court. Citing the missing evidence, the Sixth Circuit appeals court reopened the case and overturned its earlier ruling.

The Supreme Court intervened at the behest of the state and ruled in 2005 that the Sixth Circuit had overstepped its authority. Justice Stephen Breyer, in writing the dissent in the 5-4 decision, said the case "arises out of unusual circumstances -- circumstances of a kind that I have not previously experienced in the 25 years I have served on the bench."

DOJ_NMG_0106408

Once a new execution date was set, Mr. Thompson's attorneys were allowed to file another appeal, although this time challenging only the sentence, not the original conviction. Nearly 22 years after the crime, his case is moving through the courts for a second time.

Mr. Thompson is now arguing he is not competent to be executed because his mental condition has deteriorated. His appeal also tries to make the case that it's unconstitutional to execute a defendant made competent only through medication.

In April, the federal district court sided with the state and found that Mr. Thompson was competent to be executed. The district court also held that "even if Thompson had demonstrated that the state authorities were actually forcing him to take the medications, he has not shown that executing him in his medicated state is unconstitutional."

The case is back with the Sixth Circuit, where Mr. Thompson is challenging his execution on the same grounds. "Any fleeting semblance of competency is achieved by the use of powerful medication which was initiated against Thompson's will," his lawyers argue in a filing. Whatever the verdict, the next step will likely be a return to the Supreme Court.

Opponents of medicating death-row inmates to make them competent argue that the practice violates the Eighth Amendment's prohibition of "cruel and unusual punishments." Many groups argue that the mentally ill shouldn't face capital charges under any circumstances. Such defendants, they argue, have reduced ability to control their conduct and therefore less moral culpability.

The Supreme Court has never addressed the medication question in a capital-case ruling. It ducked the issue in the 1990s in the case of Michael Perry, a Louisiana death-row inmate, by sending the case back to the Louisiana Supreme Court. The state's high court decided it wouldn't force Mr. Perry to take medication, due in part to the ethical dilemma such a move would present to doctors. He remains on death row.

In 2003, in the case of convicted murderer Charles L. Singleton, the Supreme Court let stand an appeals-court ruling that there is no constitutional barrier to executing someone who is medicated. Mr. Singleton, who suffered from schizophrenia, was being treated against his will because he was considered a danger to himself and others. He was executed in January 2004.

The American Medical Association has tried to weave a path through this thorny problem. It says physicians shouldn't treat an inmate to restore competence except if medical intervention is needed to mitigate suffering, which could also hasten an execution. The AMA acknowledges "it will not always be easy" to decide whether or not to medicate and leaves the ultimate decision to the treating physicians.

Mr. Thompson's appeal is the first Tennessee death-row case questioning the validity of "chemical competency," and is taking the state into uncharted territory.

"Our organization has not considered whether we should take a stance on this issue," says Terrence Clark, president of the Tennessee Psychiatric Association. Dr. Clark said his personal opinion would turn on whether he, as a physician, is administering the medication to treat the patient's mental illness or whether he is acting as an agent of the state to further the execution.

Meanwhile, Mr. Thompson remains at Unit 2 at Riverbend, about four miles from downtown Nashville. The loudest sound comes from the clanking chains that keep Mr. Thompson's hands strapped close to his body. At 6 feet 3 inches and 263 pounds, he seems to wear the 4-by-4-foot room more than sit in it.

In a nearby building is the death chamber, with a gurney for lethal injections and an electric chair for electrocution. The chair is a wooden, brown behemoth, nearly 3 feet wide, with a back nearly 6 feet high. Plexiglas covers the seat. It hasn't been used since Nov. 7, 1960, but it has been refurbished. Inmates who committed their crimes before Jan. 1, 1999, can request it rather than lethal injection. Mr. Thompson says he'd prefer the chair.

With barely a blink of eyes yellowed by years of medication, Mr. Thompson talked for nearly an hour about his life and impending death, meandering between fact and fiction.

At one point he spoke of having his Grammy-winning career as a songwriter. The night earlier, he said, a dog came out of the floor of his cell, followed by a man he didn't recognize. "I didn't want to go through that, demons and angels coming out of the walls, things on the other side of death," he said.

He also has moments of lucidity. Mr. Thompson said he has had trouble sleeping, but "today is a good day. Right now I'm pretty clear on what happened." He added: "I killed her and they intend to kill me for it."

Political Drama Re-enacts Moments In A Death Chamber (NYT)

By Jesse Mckinley

New York Times, December 14, 2006

BERKELEY, Calif., Dec. 13 — As drama, what happened on stage at the Black Repertory Theater of Berkeley early Wednesday morning was not classic theatrical fare. The actors were mostly motionless, the play had only one line, and everyone in the audience knew how the story was going to end.

But creating a compelling narrative may not have been the authors' point. The play was a re-enactment of the execution of the convicted killer Stanley Tookie Williams, staged on the first anniversary of his death by lethal injection at San Quentin State Prison.

The performance was written and produced by Barbara Becnel and Shirley Neal, two friends of Mr. Williams and death penalty opponents, who were unapologetic about their play's being agitprop.

"This is political theater in the extreme," Ms. Becnel told a crowd of about 150 people who gathered to watch the performance. "But it's political theater in the extreme because we need it."

The execution of Mr. Williams, 51, a founder of the Crips gang who was convicted of murdering four people in 1979, has continued to be a rallying point for death penalty opponents as well as a source of contention about the methods of lethal injection.

In September, a representative of the state attorney general's office acknowledged that prison guards and nurses had botched Mr. Williams's lethal injection, failing to hook up a backup intravenous line to his arm. Ms. Becnel said Mr. Williams was in agony during his execution, which took 35 minutes to complete.

"I was there, I saw what they did," Ms. Becnel said. "And I can tell you it was a 35-minute torture-murder."

State officials deny that Mr. Williams suffered unnecessarily. "The execution went exactly as the protocol is designed to carry it out," said Nathan Barankin, a spokesman for Attorney General Bill Lockyer. "The lack of the extra IV line was definitely a mistake, but it didn't affect the execution."

Michael Rushford, president of the Criminal Justice Legal Foundation, an advocate for victims' rights and law enforcement, said he believed Mr. Williams was a bad role model for a play.

"I think it hurts the anti-death-penalty movement to hold up as dastardly a criminal as Tookie," Mr. Rushford said, citing Mr. Williams's work with the Crips, a violent gang based in Los Angeles.

Mr. Rushford added that Wednesday morning's performance was simply "preaching to the choir" of Mr. Williams's supporters, many of whom rallied in front of San Quentin the night of his execution.

"I don't expect an accurate portrayal of what happened," he said. "But when you've made such a big deal of it, you can't just let it drop after a year."

Mr. Williams's experiences in the death chamber were part of a Federal District Court hearing in September — stemming from a lawsuit by Michael Morales, a condemned rapist and killer — that may affect death penalty methodology in California. The judge overseeing the hearings, Jeremy Fogel, effectively halted executions in California until he could hear arguments on whether methods of lethal injection caused undue pain. Judge Fogel is expected to issue a ruling soon.

For supporters of Mr. Williams, his execution, which drew international press attention and a cadre of celebrity protesters, was unjust, in part because of his post-incarceration work speaking about the dangers of gangs through a series of children's books, lectures and memoirs, many of which were written with Ms. Becnel. Mr. Williams also claimed to be innocent.

On Wednesday, the theatrical re-enactment began at 12:01 a.m., the time Mr. Williams entered the death chamber. It was performed by six actors, including Darby Tillis, 64, an exonerated death row inmate from Chicago who played Mr. Williams and said he had little trouble connecting with the role.

"When you're on death row, you always have an imaginary scene that you live out many times: how you would feel if you went down for an execution," Mr. Tillis said.

With a simple set — folding chairs, a gurney and a platform — the play's action was minimal: three witnesses stood, a guard strapped Mr. Tillis to a gurney, a nurse fumbled with an IV. Only once did anyone speak, when Mr. Tillis asked the actor playing the frustrated nurse whether she knew what she was doing. The entire performance took about 12 minutes — about a third of the actual execution time.

And while the audience was silent throughout, some said the experience had left them shaken. Kirya Traber, 22, who wore a Save Tookie T-shirt, said she had been outside San Quentin the year before, but felt a lot closer to the drama on Wednesday.

"Here tonight," Ms. Traber said, "was a lot more solemn."

Gumshoe's Intuition: Spotting Counterfeits At Port Of Antwerp (WSJ)

By John W. Miller

Wall Street Journal, December 14, 2006

ANTWERP, Belgium -- From his perch at the North Sea port of Antwerp, Chris De Buysscher can look at thousands of 40-foot container units and pick out those most likely to contain fake Nikes, Marlboros or Dior jackets.

When he's off work, the 51-year-old Belgian can spot a knockoff Louis Vuitton bag from across a crowded, smoke-filled room.

DOJ_NMG_0106410

Mr. De Buysscher is widely regarded among his peers as the best counterfeit-goods inspector in the world. "He's a genius, plain and simple," says Christophe Zimmermann, director of the anticounterfeiting unit at the World Customs Organization, an intergovernmental voluntary association that coordinates among the world's 170 customs agencies.

The global boom in counterfeit goods has Mr. De Buysscher very busy. In the past two years, tiny Belgium has seized about 40 million counterfeit items, the most taken by any nation in the European Union. And about 90% of the Belgian seizures came from Mr. De Buysscher's three-person team policing the 22 miles of Antwerp docks.

Mr. De Buysscher is the main attraction of a WCO training program. He has made presentations in the Philippines, Morocco, Senegal, China, Croatia, Hungary and Algeria. Next year, he plans trips to Japan and Mexico. "In the morning, we give theoretical classes," says Mr. Zimmermann. "In the afternoon, Chris shows what he can do."

His skills are a low-tech blend of old-fashioned gumshoe detective work and intuition. On a recent trip to Algeria, Mr. De Buysscher singled out a shipping container from China for checking at the port of Oran. It was supposed to contain shoes -- and it did -- fake Nikes.

On the road, he and Mr. Zimmermann spend evenings and nights out, indulging in their favorite spectator sport: spotting counterfeit goods in restaurants and bars. What was fake in Algeria? "Absolutely everything," says Mr. De Buysscher. "People in Africa want Dolce & Gabbana, too."

Antwerp recruited Mr. De Buysscher to its new counterfeit-goods team a dozen years ago. Almost everything in international commerce is shipped in 20-foot to 40-foot units, containers that can be easily transferred within ports, then mounted on ship, truck or train. The challenge is to find out which ones hide counterfeits. The first years were hard. Mr. De Buysscher seized only 15 to 20 containers. This year, he's at 106 -- and counting.

At a time when ports are hiring mathematicians to do sophisticated risk analysis and installing programs and X-ray machines to keep up with the tsunami of knockoffs, Mr. De Buysscher is old school. He relentlessly checks thousands of bills of lading for subtle slip-ups. The problem with computers, he says, is that counterfeiters are always a step ahead. "They're working on giving me a computer program to work with," he says. "I don't need it." In other ports, computers do this work. Operators plug in data such as origin, type of good and shipping lane, and use an algorithm to calculate the likelihood that a box will contain counterfeit goods. Customs officers don't necessarily read the bills of lading with their own eyes.

His office and home are museums displaying choice counterfeit junk. It's a hobby many customs agents have. Recent catches include a Frosted Flakes mug, fake vodka labels and a Chinese Angelina Jolie doll from one of her "Tomb Raider" movies.

Part of his expertise comes from knowing brand-name goods. He visits outlet malls to study the products of Nike and Oscar de la Renta. He knows how things are packed in certain countries. Boxes from India, for instance, usually have red rims. "If one of those says 'Made in USA,' there's a problem," he says.

He's also up on fashion and can recognize 10 perfumes by nose alone, he says. "Chanel, Dior and Yves Saint Laurent smells are trademarked, just like the bottles they're in."

A container billed as dark tea from Ningbo, China, that had passed through Singapore recently raised several flags. "Boats from China usually go through Hong Kong," he says. "Also, everybody knows the Indians make dark tea and the Chinese make green tea." Inside were nine million fake Marlboros.

Roughly half the container boxes that Mr. De Buysscher opens contain fakes. "An astonishing ratio," says Mr. Zimmermann. An inspector needs to have a high batting average because there are so many boxes coming through and nobody could check them all. The port of Antwerp usually takes in more than 15,000 containers a day. Customs officials have the resources to check less than 0.5% of them. Opening and unloading a container can cost up to $3,000 in labor and other costs.

Fatalistic customs officials admit that despite their efforts, a lot of counterfeit goods get through. "We're overwhelmed," says Mr. De Buysscher. Playing the odds, Antwerp anticounterfeit agents don't bother to check boats coming from North America.

The need for Mr. De Buysscher's skills is growing. There are 400 million container boxes in the world, and the number is growing by 9% a year. The growth of the $500 billion counterfeit goods industry is one of the biggest economic challenges facing European and American companies as they relocate production to Asia. "This is nothing short of an economic crisis," says EU trade commissioner Peter Mandelson.

China, the source of almost two-thirds of all counterfeit goods seized in the EU, has agreed to crack down on counterfeiters. But WCO officials say progress is slow. Pirates are branching out beyond shirts and CDs to cargo such as auto parts and prescription drugs. "Losing the battle against counterfeit goods could cost human lives," says Michel Danet, secretary-general of the WCO.

One afternoon recently, Mr. De Buysscher read the paperwork for a box on the 2,500-container ship Wan Hai 312 that was labeled "women's coat." Several elements raised a bushy eyebrow. First, all freight was prepaid, a common smugglers' move to get goods through a port quickly. The bill of lading didn't include a brand name, nor did it contain an official port of origin number in the top right-hand corner.

He ordered the box impounded. The next day, he received a panicked fax from the importer, a Chinese man in Paris. "There has been a mistake, please ship back to China," he wrote.

Mr. De Buysscher didn't do that. When he opened the box, he took out a jacket and read the label. It said "Ice-Dior." He pulled the fake fur off the hood. "Dior wouldn't make this," he sniffed.

Mr. De Buysscher called Daniel De Jaeger, a Brussels lawyer who handles hundreds of cases a year for Dior. Mr. De Jaeger filed a complaint with Belgian customs to prevent delivery of the shipment. Dior pays to destroy counterfeit goods, at a cost of between $6,600 and $13,200 a year. "We can't go to China to catch counterfeiters," says Mr. De Jaeger, "so we have to get them when they cross our borders."

Small-Town Judge's Personal Justice Stirs Concern (NYT)

By William Glaberson

New York Times, December 14, 2006

KEESEVILLE, N.Y. — Like many teenagers in this bleak old mill village near Lake Champlain, Michael C. Burrell had been in trouble before. But when an attempted assault case landed him at age 19 in the courtroom of the village justice, the experience was unlike anything he had faced before.

He said the justice, George J. Head, insisted that they meet each week outside court, in what people around here call his "judge's probation" program.

There is no such thing as judge's probation, and private sessions between a judge and a defendant facing jail violate rules of judicial conduct.

But Justice Head seems to have stretched the rules in a number of ways. When he sentenced young men to regular probation, he sometimes drove them to their appointments. One young man was discovered driving the justice's car, and others say they met with the justice at his home. One said he even wound up moving in for eight months.

"He's the judge," said Mr. Burrell, who said he met privately with Justice Head several times last year. "He tells me to do something, I'm going to do it."

One of the bedrock principles of American law is that judges are supposed to be impartial toward the people who come before them. They are to be decision makers, not participants, in cases. They are not to befriend defendants, and are barred from meeting with them outside the presence of their lawyers or prosecutors, or outside court. At the very least, they are required to avoid any personal involvement that makes it appear they have taken sides.

But bedrock principles have a way of getting lost in New York's town and village courts, a sprawling world of more than 1,250 small courtrooms. Over the decades justices have illegally jailed people, threatened enemies, protected friends and made grievous legal errors, with little supervision or penalty. The law often counts for little, because three-quarters of the justices are not lawyers. Now the system is under scrutiny by state officials, who are holding hearings and taking steps to fix some of its most glaring flaws.

What has played out in this remote village in northeastern New York provides one more startling look at what can happen when meager training mixes with plenty of unchecked power.

"Judge Head rules Keeseville, and God help you if you oppose him," said Diane Webster-Brady, the lawyer who handled Mr. Burrell's case.

'It Wasn't Professional'

Justice Head, 72, a retired state trooper who has been a justice in the area for 15 years, declined repeated requests for an interview. But lawyers say he has told them over the years that he can supervise Keeseville's wayward youth better than county probation officers.

In interviews and documents, several young men — some of them high school dropouts, adrift from their families, and some with serious police records — said he seemed to offer relief from their poverty and troubled lives, providing shelter, food, the use of his car, or even tuition or lawyers' fees.

But most said they felt unsettled or threatened by the control the justice had over them, and by his unusual version of probation. They described regular meetings — once a week or more — at which the justice would check on their progress, with the suggestion that if they went along, they would be treated well, but that if they did not, there would be trouble.

Sometimes, they said, the meetings were in the house of the justice, who is long separated from his wife. Sometimes they were in the justice's small office off the village courtroom, where Mr. Burrell said he met with Justice Head last year.

"It was me and him talking," said Mr. Burrell, who had run away from a substance abuse program where Justice Head sent him after several arrests in connection with attempted assault and other crimes. Mr. Burrell said the justice discussed his own background, and asked about his.

"It wasn't professional," he said. "I think he crossed the boundaries."

Other people noticed the unorthodox meetings, too. More than a dozen current or former prosecutors, lawyers and officials in the area said they were aware of the justice's out-of-court dealings with defendants, and many said they questioned the propriety of his actions.

In January, one prosecutor filed a motion to transfer a drunken-driving case out of the village court because the 20-year-old driver had been at the wheel of Justice Head's car, with its official license plates. After the arrest, the prosecutor wrote, the young man was "picked up by the Honorable George Head from the police station."

Still, the lawyers and officials said they could not publicly challenge the justice because of his power here. One lawyer said he had reluctantly agreed to "judge's probation" for a client because it won him a better deal.

The Clinton County probation director, David M. Marcoux, acknowledged he had heard that Justice Head accompanied some young defendants to their probation appointments. And when asked, he said that no other judge in the county did so. But he would not say any more about Justice Head or his special probation program.

"He's still a sitting judge in the county," Mr. Marcoux said, "and it's nothing I feel I should make any comment on."

Yet people are being asked to speak up by the state agency that investigates misconduct by judges. In recent weeks, the Commission on Judicial Conduct has been hearing testimony about Justice Head from local officials and some of the young men. Commission officials would not discuss the status of their investigation.

Meanwhile, state judicial officials have begun a series of sweeping changes to the entire system of town and village courts, which are also known as justice courts. On Thursday, two committees of the State Assembly plan to hold a joint hearing into whether the courts should be overhauled even further.

Several legal experts said in interviews that Justice Head's methods appeared to be the kind of conduct that made people question the system's fairness and professionalism. Judges in New York have been disciplined for inviting defendants to their homes, or meeting privately with parties in a legal case.

Ann E. Pfeiffer, a former Rochester City Court judge who teaches at Syracuse Law School, said it was not proper for a judge to take on the role of a social worker, roommate, confidant or friend. "A judge, particularly in a small town, should be as detached as he can be," she said.

A Hard Place to Grow Up

Keeseville, with a population of 1,850, is certainly small, the kind of remote place where critics of the justice courts say it may be most difficult for state judiciary officials to monitor the justices. It has a few churches, not many jobs, the hulk of an old Grand Union on desolate Front Street and a changing cast of aimless teenagers who say they feel trapped in a place that seems forgotten.

The village, which has a reputation for drug crimes, bar fights and beatings, can be a hard place to grow up. One recent Sunday, two young men were hit by a car on Main Street about 3 a.m., and one was killed. Witnesses told the police that the driver, 28, was drunk. When the two men were hit, they were rolling around in the road, fighting.

Seven years ago, Mr. Head, a jowly, broad-shouldered man, was elected village justice, after eight years as a town justice in the area. He had attended college but did not graduate, according to a document he filed with court officials. He has no law degree; the only training that New York has given its justices for decades is six days of initial schooling and an annual refresher course.

Keeseville's mayor, Mark J. Whitney, said Justice Head had "performed well for us."

But Theodore Carter had a different impression. A high school dropout with a long arrest record, he ended up before Justice Head two years ago, when he was 18. He had tried to beat up another teenager, he said, and because he could not make bail, he spent 20 days in jail.

When he was released to attend Keeseville's regular afternoon court session, he said, Justice Head told him that to avoid more jail time, he would have to serve judge's probation and chop wood for the village.

"I didn't think it was any big thing," Mr. Carter said, "until he told me I'd have to go meet with him." Justice Head set the location: his office in the old school building that Keeseville uses as a community center. "He told me to meet him at 8:30 at night," Mr. Carter said.

When he arrived, the rooms all around the office were empty. The halls were dark. "Nobody was there except for the judge," Mr. Carter said. "It made me feel uncomfortable."

Justice Head, he said, talked about himself and gave Mr. Carter his home phone number to call at any hour of the day or night. "It was kind of awkward," Mr. Carter said.

DOJ_NMG_0106413

In later meetings, Mr. Carter said, he seemed to disappoint Justice Head because he did not reveal much about himself. Eventually, in a private session two months ago, he said, the justice adopted a harsh tone, taking three folders out of a drawer — the records, Mr. Carter said, of three harassment charges against him that had not moved forward.

The justice, he said, seemed to hint that he could activate the cases. Asked what he made of that, Mr. Carter said, "I think he means he's going to hold it over me."

Visiting the Justice

For another young man, the meetings started the same way: In court, Justice Head declared that he would see him weekly. But the location would be even more private.

"Judge Head," the man said, "said he wanted to see me at his house the following day."

The young man, an unemployed laborer who is now 24, agreed to be interviewed for this article on the condition that his name not be used, saying he was embarrassed about receiving favored treatment from the justice.

His years of interacting with Justice Head, he said, began when he was 18 and facing a petty larceny charge, having already served jail time for sexual abuse. They would meet, he said, at the justice's home or office, almost always alone.

"At first he didn't want nobody knowing about it," the man said. But eventually, he said, people saw him at "George's house" or driving "George's car."

Later, he said, Justice Head bought him a used car, and once paid for a lawyer when he was charged with a sex crime in another town.

"I just didn't want to go back to jail," the man said, explaining his dealings with the justice. "When you are at the lowest you can be, who else do you want to befriend you than a judge?"

Another young man, then 17, said the justice invited him home the night before he was to be sentenced to community service, according to notes of a 2005 statement he gave to a law enforcement official, who shared the notes with The New York Times. The man declined to be interviewed for this article, but he told the official that the justice tried to have him do work at the house as a form of community service.

And one young defendant described a deal that went even further.

"We had a meeting," the man, Dennis C. Valentin, recalled in a recent interview. "He was going to help me study, and he offered me the place to stay in his mansion."

Mr. Valentin, 25, said his life was in bad shape back then, in 2001. A high school dropout, 19 at the time, he had grown up in a broken, sometimes violent home, he said. He had been arrested after a drunken street brawl, but had run away at first instead of facing the charges.

He turned himself in to Justice Head, who he said got him talking about his ambitions: to get into the Army, or otherwise get out of Keeseville. "It's just a rough little town," Mr. Valentin said.

He jumped at the justice's offer. "I pretty much went to stay with him," he said. The justice approved a plea deal: instead of jail, Mr. Valentin would get a conditional discharge that would free him if he stayed out of trouble for six months.

Already living in the justice's house, Mr. Valentin said, were a 21-year-old man whom the justice sometimes drove to Alcoholics Anonymous meetings, and a man in his late 20s who also had gotten in trouble with the law.

That older man had lived in the house for years, and the justice had helped pay his parochial school tuition, Mr. Valentin said.

Mr. Valentin said he stayed for eight months, with free room and board. "He pretty much tried to get me on the right track," he said.

The effort apparently did not work. Two years later, Mr. Valentin was arrested again — this time, he said, for statutory rape. He is now serving six years of probation, ordered by another judge.

But he remains grateful for his time in Justice Head's home.

"It was a nice place to be," he said. "The judge is really smart. You can sit down and watch 'Jeopardy' on TV, and he is going to get practically every question."

Assisted Suicide Advocate Jack Kevorkian To Be Paroled In June (AP)

By Kathy Barks Hoffman, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 14, 2006

(AP) - LANSING, Michigan.-Assisted suicide advocate Jack Kevorkian, the ailing former pathologist who claimed to have assisted in at least 130 deaths in the 1990s, will be paroled in June, state Corrections Department spokesman Leo Lalonde said Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0106414

Kevorkian, 78, is serving a 10- to 25-year sentence for second-degree murder in the 1998 poisoning of Thomas Youk, who suffered from Lou Gehrig's disease. Kevorkian called Youk's death, which was videotaped and shown on CBS "60 Minutes," a mercy killing.

Kevorkian has promised he would not assist in a suicide if he was released from prison.

Lalonde did not reveal any other details and directed calls to Russ Marlan, another spokesman for the department. A message seeking comment was left with Marlan Wednesday afternoon.

Mayer Morganroth, Kevorkian's attorney, said in July that his client had less than a year to live. Gov. Jennifer Granholm ordered corrections authorities to carry out an independent medical evaluation of Kevorkian, but did not commute the retired pathologist's sentence, as Morganroth had hoped.

Morganroth said in June that Kevorkian's weight had dropped to 113 pounds (51 kilograms) and that he was suffering from hepatitis C and diabetes.

Michigan banned assisted suicides in 1998.

Ala. College Desegregation Case Ends (AP)

December 13, 2006, 7:06 Pm Est

AP, December 14, 2006

U.S. District Judge Harold Murphy approved agreements settling the case, which has so far generated $210 million in state funds for the desegregation effort, most of it going to historically black Alabama A&M and Alabama State universities.

In his order Tuesday, Murphy agreed with both sides that there is no reason for further action.

He said the state, its historically white universities and other defendants have eliminated traces of segregation "to the extent practicable and consistent with sound educational practice ... and have demonstrated their commitment to continuing to operate in a constitutional and nondiscriminatory fashion."

One of the plaintiffs, retired teacher Alease Sims of Birmingham, said the legal fight had accomplished a lot.

"It has been a privilege and an honor for me to do something to help my people and all the citizens of Alabama," she told The Birmingham News.

"We worked hard to have a court ... say those kinds of things about higher education in Alabama. That's quite an accomplishment," state's attorney Robert Hunter said.

Orders and agreements in the case have produced or will lead to additional courses, new money for classroom buildings, diversity scholarship and endowment funds for the state's historically black universities.

The case also has led to creation of a unified Alabama Cooperative Extension Service, increased funding for a need-based scholarship program, and agreements by the historically white universities and some of the state's two-year schools to work to boost their numbers of black faculty members and administrators.

By 2014, when the last of the court-ordered requirements expire, A&M and ASU each will have received more than $200 million, said state Rep. John Knight, a key plaintiff in the case.

The case began in 1979, when the U.S. Department of Education found "vestiges of segregation" in the state's higher education system, chiefly the number of black students and faculty members at predominantly white colleges, and funding and degree-program disparities between white and black campuses.

The U.S. Justice Department sued Alabama in 1981, after state officials and university administrators were unable to agree on a corrective plan. More plaintiffs were added over the years.

A spinoff issue, involving Alabama's lowest-in-the-nation property tax structure, is still being litigated. Plaintiffs contend it keeps blacks from getting financial aid needed for higher education. Murphy ruled against the plaintiffs, who are appealing to the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

South Elgin To Allow Group Home Under Settlement With DOJ (AP)

AP, December 14, 2006

SOUTH ELGIN, Ill. - The village will allow Unity House Inc. to operate a home for up to seven residents recovering from drug or alcohol addiction under an agreement that settles allegations of Fair Housing Act violations, the U.S. Justice Department announced Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0106415

Federal prosecutors had argued the Village of South Elgin violated the act by refusing a permit for the establishment of a group home for alleged substance abusers. Village Attorney Derke Price said officials had been concerned about allowing a business in a residential area.

The settlement also calls for South Elgin to pay $25,000 in damages to Unity House, $7,500 each to two residents who were not able to live in the home when the permit was denied and $15,000 to the United States as a civil penalty.

The village board approved the settlement at a Dec. 6 board meeting. It still must be approved by the U.S. District Court in Chicago.

"This settlement should send a message to other communities that no municipality, driven by neighborhood opposition, can prohibit persons recovering from addictions from enjoying the benefits of living in the safe and supportive environment of a group home," U.S. Attorney Patrick J. Fitzgerald said in a statement.

On Nov. 17, 2003, South Elgin denied a special use permit to Unity House for a group home that was to house nine unrelated men.

Price said at the time of the application, Unity House operator Bret Mathis failed to prove the facility could handle that number of people, in addition to parking all the residents' cars on the property, as state laws require.

"He believed we were turning him down and discriminating," said Price, who added that the village has no problem with group homes. "We are not admitting to any wrong doing by agreeing to the settlement."

A message seeking comment was left Wednesday evening for Mathis.

Lacrosse Players Tout DNA Test Results (AP)

By David Scott

AP, December 14, 2006

RALEIGH, N.C. - DNA testing in the Duke lacrosse rape case found genetic material from several males in the accuser's body and her underwear - but none from any team member, defense attorneys said in court papers Wednesday.

The papers were filed by attorneys for the three lacrosse players charged, Reade Seligmann, Collin Finnerty and David Evans. They complained that the information about DNA from other men was not disclosed in a report prosecutors provided earlier this year to the defense.

The testing was conducted at a private laboratory for the prosecution.

"This is strong evidence of innocence in a case in which the accuser denied engaging in any sexual activity in the days before the alleged assault, told police she last had consensual sexual intercourse a week before the assault, and claimed that her attackers did not use condoms and ejaculated," the defense said.

In an interview, defense attorney Joseph Cheshire said the findings suggest the accuser had sex shortly before the March team party where she was hired to perform as a stripper. The woman has said three lacrosse team members gang-raped her in a bathroom at the party.

"None of (the DNA material) happens to be from lacrosse players who are supposed to have had sex with her, which is pretty significant," said Cheshire, who represents Evans.

District Attorney Mike Nifong declined to comment on the defense motion. A trial is not expected to start until spring.

Prosecutors ordered the testing at DNA Security of Burlington after an initial round conducted by the state crime lab failed to find a conclusive match between the 27-year-old accuser and any lacrosse player, a fact trumpeted by the defense attorneys.

Stan Goldman, a criminal law expert at Loyola Law School in Los Angeles, said the defense can use what DNA Security found to argue that if their clients did in fact rape the accuser, the extensive testing should have uncovered their DNA. But he downplayed suggestions that the report could be the key to winning the case.

"There seems to be so many problems with this case, it's hard to say one more will be fatal," Goldman said. "If the jury was going to believe the case before this, it strikes me this is not going to be fatal."

DNA In Duke Rape Case Not Linked To Athletes (LAT)

By David Zucchino, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 14, 2006

A private lab used by prosecutors failed to report finding genetic material that didn't match samples from suspects, a defense motion says.

DURHAM, N.C. — A private lab used by prosecutors in the Duke University lacrosse rape case failed to disclose that it had found DNA from unidentified males in samples taken from the accuser's body and underwear, according to a defense motion filed Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0106416

The DNA did not match samples taken from three Duke lacrosse players charged with raping an exotic dancer during an off-campus party March 14. Nor did it match DNA taken from 43 other members of the university lacrosse team, or the accuser's boyfriend, the defense motion said.

"This is strong evidence of innocence in a case in which the accuser denied engaging in any sexual activity in the days before the alleged assault," lawyers for the three accused players wrote in the 61-page motion.

The DNA — which the motion said came from "multiple males" — was not mentioned in the lab's final report, submitted to the Durham district attorney's office in May and subsequently provided to the defense.

Defense lawyers found references to the DNA while scouring 1,844 documents handed over by the lab Oct. 27 under a judge's order. DNA Security Inc. in Burlington, N.C., initially refused to provide them, citing cost and privacy.

The accuser, a black student at North Carolina Central University in Durham who was hired to perform at a team party, told police she was raped in a bathroom by three white players who did not use condoms.

A few hours after the alleged rape, a doctor and nurse collected standard rape kit evidence from the woman at a hospital.

"Enough of that DNA existed for DNA Security to conclude that none of it matched the defendants, their teammates … or anyone else who submitted a DNA sample to the investigation," the motion said.

The lab performed DNA tests on more than a dozen items, but its final report to prosecutors in May included analyses of only three items, the motion said.

According to the lab's protocols, which were provided in the defense motion, "results for each DNA test" must be included in all reports.

The defense motion seeks all DNA Security documents related to the lacrosse case, including chain-of-custody accountings, internal e-mails, DNA analysis reports and databases, and records of any tests conducted after the lab's May report.

DNA tests conducted by the North Carolina State Bureau of Investigation laboratory in late March did not find evidence of semen, blood or saliva in samples taken from the accuser. DNA Security told a police investigator, Michelle Soucie, that it could perform more sophisticated tests using a technique that isolates Y chromosomes — the male chromosome.

According to Soucie's notes, DNA Security lab director Brian Meehan said he could "possibly adjust prices because they would really like to be involved in [the] case."

Neither Meehan nor Dist. Atty. Mike Nifong could be reached for comment Wednesday night.

Last week, U.S. Rep. Walter B. Jones (R-N.C.) asked the Justice Department to investigate whether Nifong committed "prosecutorial misconduct" and violated the defendants' civil rights.

Nifong, who called the defendants "hooligans," allegedly allowed police to conduct a photo lineup in which the accuser was shown only photos of Duke lacrosse players.

The three accused athletes have said they are not guilty. A trial is scheduled for the spring.

Backers Of Anti-gay Marriage Amendment File Federal Lawsuit (AP)

By Steve Leblanc, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 14, 2006

(AP) - BOSTON-Supporters of an anti-gay marriage measure filed a lawsuit in federal court Wednesday seeking up to $5 million (â‚¬3.8 million) in damages from Massachusetts lawmakers who blocked a final vote on the proposed constitutional amendment last month.

The lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court by the group VoteOnMarriage.org, claims the 109 state lawmakers violated the supporters' rights to free speech and right to petition the government.

The state House and Senate last month chose to end debate before discussing an amendment that would ban gay marriage in the only state that allows it. VoteOnMarriage.org is asking the court to interpret the recess as a vote in favor of the amendment. Many lawmakers said the vote was designed to kill the amendment.

The legislature is scheduled to take up the question again Jan. 2, the last day of the session. Supporters of the question fear lawmakers will again avoid taking a vote, killing the proposed amendment.

Glen Lavy, a lawyer representing the group, says the lawsuit is needed to force lawmakers to follow the constitution. It seeks $500,000 (â‚¬380,000) from the lawmakers for the cost of the group's legal battles and another $5 million (â‚¬3.8 million) in punitive damages. The damages would be split 109 ways and lawmakers would be held personally liable, he said.

"We would like to put an end to the Massachusetts Legislature thumbing its nose at citizen initiatives," Lavy said. "This lawsuit is about holding those legislators responsible for their illegal conduct."

Gary Buseck, legal director of Gay & Lesbian Advocates & Defenders, calls the lawsuit "laughable" and said it was at the "outer limits of plausibility."

It is the second lawsuit designed to force lawmakers to take a vote on the question.

Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and other opponents of gay marriage filed a suit with the state Supreme Judicial Court asking the court to force lawmakers to take a vote on the proposed amendment or, if they fail to act, to put the question on the 2008 ballot anyway. The case is pending.

The Massachusetts Supreme Court ruled in 2003 that the state must allow gay marriage. Massachusetts is the only state to do so, although Connecticut and Vermont allow same-sex civil unions.

ANTITRUST:

Airline Mergers Could Raise Fares In '07 (AP)

By Dave Carpenter

AP, December 14, 2006

CHICAGO (AP) -- A long-anticipated consolidation of U.S. airlines could mean higher fares for travelers as overlapping routes are eliminated, experts said Wednesday as talk of likely deals reverberated throughout the industry.

That's one reason why any such buyouts could draw intensified regulatory scrutiny, along with the potential for increased labor and service disruptions, as some consumer advocates warn.

Don't tell that to Wall Street. Airline stocks surged on news that United and Continental are holding preliminary discussions and after Air Tran launched a hostile takeover bid for Midwest, with other carriers also examining how to merge to keep up with bigger competition.

Numerous regulatory and other obstacles remain before any deal can occur, but industry observers said all the talks and recent airline restructurings have set the stage for big changes in the business next year.

"We're off to the races," said airline expert Terry Trippler, who has been monitoring the industry for 38 years. "2007 is going to be a major year -- we are going to see some major consolidation."

UAL Corp.'s United Airlines and Continental Airlines Inc. declined comment on whether they are talking about teaming up. But a person close to the airlines who asked not to be identified said they have been exploring a possible combination in discussions that stepped up after US Airways Group Inc. made a hostile bid for bankrupt rival Delta Air Lines Inc. last month. The talks were said to be very preliminary, with no deal imminent.

The person did not want to be named because of the sensitive nature of the talks.

Putting together the nation's second- and fifth-largest carriers would produce an airline superpower -- the nation's largest -- merging United's strengths in the Pacific and western U.S. with Continental's successful operations in Latin America and the Atlantic market and its prosperous hub in Newark, N.J., a popular gateway to Europe.

That could enable United, slimmed down from a three-year bankruptcy restructuring that ended in February, and Continental to use their combined clout to reduce operating costs and become more profitable.

Analysts say other potential deal permutations that may be explored -- if they haven't been already -- include AMR Corp.'s American Airlines linking up with Northwest Airlines Corp., and they stress that counterparts routinely talk with one other about consolidation options.

But would a mega-airline be good for consumers? That depends on who's asked.

Most experts agree that less competition would boost fares, but some see boons for passengers, too.

Trippler, with the Web site MyVacationPassport.com, said consumers will benefit in the long run from healthier airlines and, as a result, a much more stable transportation system. He said competition should remain strong and fares shouldn't climb much.

Kevin Mitchell, however, said ticket prices would rise significantly and the public can expect service disruptions, repercussions from labor strife and more job insecurity in the airline industry if the carriers merge. He said that if all the deals in discussion come about, there will effectively be three fewer U.S. network airlines in operation.

"Shareholders, advisers and other firms are the big winners here," said Mitchell, chairman of the Business Travel Coalition, an advocacy group. "I would view it, if I'm a business traveler, on the customer service side as many years of unimaginable pain."

Joe Brancatelli, an independent business travel analyst, said consumers already are losers from merger mania -- with or without deals being consummated.

"So much management time is being consumed by creating or fighting a merger," said Brancatelli, who runs a Web site for business travelers called joesentme.com. "All that time would have otherwise been spent on plugging holes in the already creaky system."

Rep. James Oberstar, D-Minn., who will chair the House Transportation Committee in Congress next year, said he will not hesitate to hold hearings next year to "expose the anti-competitive effects" of airline industry consolidation and to "nudge the Justice Department" to use its power to stop potential acquisitions.

While discount airlines aren't the focus of merger speculation, combining the larger, so-called legacy carriers could provide an opening for budget carriers such as Southwest Airlines Co., JetBlue Airways Corp. and AirTran Holdings Inc. to push their ticket prices higher as well.

Orlando-based AirTran said Wednesday its $290 million offer for rival Midwest Air Group Inc. was rejected but it will continue trying to acquire the Milwaukee-based regional carrier.

Elk Grove Village, Ill.-based United and Continental have many hurdles to clear to make any deal come about.

Regulators could look at the combined airline's added strength in the Northeast as detrimental to competition, with Continental's Newark hub and United's at Washington-Dulles. United already has endured a failed merger with US Airways in 2000 because of regulatory opposition.

United's prickly labor situation also could be problematic after multiple cuts and layoffs in recent years. The carrier's outspoken flight attendants union quickly served notice Wednesday that it has "severe reservations."

"Any type of business combination is historically fraught with difficulties including regulatory problems, huge expenses, corporate governance issues and, most notably, employee relations," said Greg Davidowitch, president of the United branch of the Association of Flight Attendants.

Also, Northwest could block any acquisition of Continental by virtue of the "golden share" it holds in its Houston-based business partner. A 2000 deal between the airlines gave Northwest that power in exchange for letting Continental buy back some of its stock that its code-share ally held.

Nevertheless, United reportedly has for months been studying ways to merge with either Continental or Delta, and the combination of private-equity funding and the willingness of both sides could get a deal done.

The two carriers led a rally in most airline stocks. Shares in UAL jumped $2.01, or 4.6 percent, to close at $45.24, and Continental rose $1.88, or 4.4 percent, to $44.76.

Big Consolidated Airline Inc. (NYT)

By Jeff Bailey

New York Times, December 14, 2006

AirTran Holdings is roughly a tenth the size of its main competitor, Delta Air Lines. So AirTran executives would seem unlikely cheerleaders of a potential merger that would make Delta 60 percent larger.

But the recent $8.5 billion takeover offer for Delta by US Airways has found a fan in Joseph B. Leonard, chief executive at AirTran, which, like Delta, flies routes across the Southeast from its hub in Atlanta.

“I’m rooting for it,” Mr. Leonard said yesterday in an interview, after announcing his own proposed takeover of Midwest Air, an airline based in Oak Creek, Ill., for $290 million.

Mr. Leonard may relish his role as underdog but that is not why he hopes the carriers merge — he just wants to see fewer jets in the sky. After all, US Airways’ proposed takeover would reduce the two airlines’ combined jet fleet about 10 percent.

That, in turn, would allow the merged Delta — and AirTran — to raise fares on many routes, significantly increasing profits.

“It doesn’t take much,” he said.

The prospect of higher profits has stimulated a new round of merger talks in the industry, whose fortunes have started to improve after more than $30 billion in losses over the last five years.

Discussions about a possible deal between United Airlines and Continental Airlines came to light this week. And if one big merger goes through, other airlines will probably feel compelled to pair off as well or wind up at a competitive disadvantage because they have higher costs or smaller route networks.

But less financial misery for airlines often means more bad news for their passengers — since, in this business, misery tends to be a zero-sum game.

Fewer planes would lead, certainly in the short term, to more-crowded flights and higher fares.

Airline mergers are already on the political radar screen. Concerned about rising fares and the potential for reduced air service to small communities, Representative James L. Oberstar, Democrat of Minnesota, the next chairman of the House Committee on Commerce and Transportation, said yesterday that the Justice Department should block any major airline merger.

DOJ_NMG_0106419

If it does not, Mr. Oberstar said, he would call hearings before his committee to consider action to block such mergers (three steps are necessary to approve an airline deal: the Transportation Department must determine that a merger is financially viable, the Federal Aviation Administration must approve a certificate of safety, and the Justice Department must determine that there are no antitrust issues).

Mr. Oberstar said the public could be harmed only by the sort of large mergers contemplated by US Airways and by United and Continental, and that those in turn would lead to other mergers.

"I don't think there's any benefit from mergers except for the benefit of stockholders and airline officials," Mr. Oberstar said. "There is no benefit to the traveling public."

Mr. Oberstar's district is centered on Duluth, considerably north of the headquarters of Northwest Airlines, which are near Minneapolis-St. Paul, but he is sensitive to the desires of his home state's airline to remain independent. Northwest, which has lucrative Asian routes but is operating in bankruptcy, could be vulnerable to a takeover if Delta succumbs to US Airways.

The industry's recent history serves to bolster Mr. Oberstar's argument.

The domestic airlines' fleet shrank about 12 percent from 2000 to 2005, the Transportation Department reported, to 3,938 big jets from 4,462. That, in combination with an improving economy, permitted airlines to raise fares about 15 percent over the last year.

And the smaller fleet will continue to help prop up prices for an industry still heavily in debt and vulnerable to the next economic downturn. The Transportation Department does not expect the fleet to return to its year 2000 size until 2011, as most deliveries of jetliners are scheduled to occur outside the United States.

Airlines have also cut costs and jobs to stay afloat. Big network carriers have cut their combined payrolls to 264,000 workers in September 2006 from about 420,000 in September 2001, a 37 percent cut, according to the Transportation Department. And many of those remaining workers are being paid about one third less.

But whether consumers are always harmed by mergers is debatable. If a high-cost airline is acquired by another carrier, travelers may benefit.

A study conducted by Clifford Winston, an economist at the Brookings Institution, found that travelers would suffer, not surprisingly, if a number of airlines left the business. For example, in the year 2000, travelers would have lost $19.6 billion, attributable to higher air fares and less-frequent service, if Southwest Airlines did not exist.

But he also found that customers would have benefited over all that year, by about $3.6 billion, if US Airways had stopped operating, because its service probably would have been replaced by lower-fare airlines with more-frequent service.

He also found that travelers would have benefited by $3.7 billion if American had left the business, and $2.4 billion if Continental had left.

It was an academic exercise, and one intended to measure the loss of only a single airline at a time, but one that shows that some airlines tend to reduce industry fares while others prop them up.

To be sure, a more recent study would lead to different results, because US Airways and other airlines have revamped in recent years.

"It really matters who you lose and who comes in to take their place," Mr. Winston said.

Any price increases that airlines are able to push through as a result of mergers could also end up being relatively short term. Southwest, AirTran, JetBlue Airways and other low-cost airlines have collectively grown to about 35 percent of the industry from about 10 percent in 1990, said Daniel M. Kasper, a managing director at LECG, a consulting firm.

And those carriers are growing as the bigger, established airlines shrink. If history is any guide, Southwest and the others can be counted on to start flying routes where US Airways or other network carriers reduce service.

"The market is perfectly capable of sorting these things out," Mr. Kasper said.

While some in the industry insist there is too much airline capacity, Mr. Kasper said the problem was that too much of the capacity remained in the hands of older network carriers. More cutbacks by these airlines would help hasten that shift, he added, increasing the number of seats available on low-cost airlines.

Domestic air fares as of last year were roughly the same as in 1988, the Air Transport Association said, and when adjusted for inflation, fares have been falling steadily for decades as bigger and more-efficient airplanes reduced costs and spurred competition.

More recently, consumers have kept fares from rising by using the Internet to shop. Consumers' ability to compare American Airlines' prices, say, with Southwest's has kept fares from rising faster this last year.

In coming days, much of the industry will be waiting to see if US Airways is able to persuade Delta's unsecured creditors to help press its case. Those creditors, whose claims will convert into common stock that controls the company after Delta's exit from bankruptcy, can demand that Delta permit US Airways to inspect its books and otherwise research the proposed takeover.

DOJ_NMG_0106420

Delta's management opposes the deal and plans to file its stand-alone plan in bankruptcy court next week. Delta claims soared about 50 percent after the US Airways offer was made Nov. 15. Delta executives face pressure to present a plan that could justify something close to that higher value.

Just as crucially, Delta management is expected to raise concerns about the US Airways proposal, especially its ability to pass muster with antitrust regulators.

"We are skeptical," Ed Bastian, Delta's chief financial officer, said in an interview.

Mr. Kasper, the consultant, said that regulators would try to determine whether any competition lost because of the merger would be replaced within two years. Delta and US Airways own the two New York shuttle operations to Boston and Washington, and presumably one of them would have to be sold. And US Airways said the two airlines dominate only a relatively small number of their combined markets.

Delta management's success at resisting US Airways "could be the tipping point," that either spurs more deals or ends the industry merger talk, said the chief executive of another big airline, who asked not to be identified because his company could end up in merger negotiations, too.

"There's a chance nothing will get done," he said.

Delta Rally: 'We Are Not For Sale' (AJC)

By Dave Hirschman, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

Atlanta Journal-Constitution, December 14, 2006

A raucous crowd of more than 3,000 Delta Air Lines workers alternately cheered, booed, clapped and hissed Wednesday as they loudly expressed opposition to a takeover bid by rival US Airways.

Delta employee groups used the nearly two-hour rally to bash Tempe, Ariz.-based US Airways and its CEO, Doug Parker, in pointed, personal terms. He was compared to vilified airline raiders Carl Icahn and Frank Lorenzo and even the fictional Gordon Gekko from the movie "Wall Street."

"You have underestimated your opponent!" Delta pilot union chairman Lee Moak thundered at the meeting in a convention hall near the Atlanta airport, which combined the fervor of a tent revival with the pragmatism of a political strategy session.

"Go back to the desert of Arizona. Thousands of loyal Delta employees in this room are telling you that Delta is our company and we are not for sale!"

Georgia's U.S. senators, Saxby Chambliss and Johnny Isakson, lauded the Delta workers and urged them to back management efforts to preserve Delta's history and independence.

Chambliss said he told Parker in a Washington meeting that he and other members of the Georgia delegation stoutly oppose the deal and plan hearings to pressure the Justice Department to reject it as anti-competitive.

"The proposed deal is a bad deal for Delta and we're opposed to it," Chambliss said to a standing ovation. "It's going to lead to additional mergers that aren't good for the passengers you serve."

His argument may have been buttressed by reports Wednesday that United and Continental airlines are talking about a merger. Most analysts say that would be a defensive option to trump the effect of a US Airways-Delta marriage. And AirTran Airways, Atlanta's second-largest carrier behind Delta, said it's pursuing a nearly $290 million buyout of Midwest Airlines despite that carrier's initial rejection.

US Airways announced its unsolicited $8.7 billion Delta bid in November, after being rebuffed in earlier private approaches. Delta executives — who did not attend Wednesday's rally — say they want to finish the carrier's Chapter 11 restructuring as an independent company.

But the airline's creditors have a big say in the outcome. They are analyzing the value and other merits of the US Airways offer and will weigh it against a Delta reorganization plan expected to be filed in bankruptcy court as soon as next week.

Wednesday's quickly organized rally aimed to prove that opposition goes deeper than top management.

Oversized TV screens showed film clips from Delta's humble beginnings as a crop-dusting service, along with commercials through the decades.

U.S. Rep. David Scott (D-Ga.) praised Delta workers for enduring five years of pay cuts, furloughs and adversity capped by the Chapter 11 filing. He lambasted US Airways for terminating its employee pension plans during its own bankruptcy case, then aiming to take over Delta, which has announced a deal to save its main non-pilot pension plan.

"You're writing the greatest recovery story in the history of American business," Scott told the Delta workers.

Scott called US Airways executives "vultures" for attempting to profit from the sacrifices of Delta workers, and said the proposed merger was "anti-competitive and anti-American."

US Airways has said it would adopt the Delta name if the merger went through but hasn't said where the combined company would be based. Many experts consider Tempe the likely choice since Parker and his lieutenants would run the airline.

They previously ran Tempe-based America West Airlines, which merged with the larger US Airways and adopted its name in 2005.

"How can Atlanta be Atlanta without Delta?" said 58-year-old Delta retiree Carol Kirkland, who attended the rally. "Tempe, Arizona? Come on."

Moak recently held a pilot union meeting outside the former US Airways offices in Arlington, Va., to highlight what he believes would be Atlanta's fate if the deal goes forward. He said US Airways plans to expand its Tempe headquarters.

"Is there any real question as to where the corporate headquarters will land?" he said.

Moak also noted that Parker and his team are still at work on integrating America West and US Airways. "If you want to run an airline," he said mockingly, "why don't you start with the one you already have?"

Concern about the loss of Delta's headquarters has given management many local allies. Earlier Wednesday, the board of Central Atlanta Progress, which includes executives from some of Atlanta's top companies, passed a resolution supporting Delta's independence.

Phil Gee, a spokesman for US Airways, said he isn't surprised by the emotional opposition. "It's something we definitely expected to encounter," he said. "Delta people are very passionate. You'd be hard pressed to find employees with more pride for their company than they have."

US Airways contends a merger would be a bold move to create a stronger airline — and one less vulnerable to the financial crises that overtook both US Airways and Delta in recent years.

The United-Continental talks are not new, though they have become more serious since US Airways approached Delta, according to published reports. A deal remains far from certain. One big obstacle: Northwest Airlines may be able to stop it under a 2000 cross-marketing agreement with Continental.

The Wall Street Journal reported that, in addition to talks with Continental, United also has informally pitched itself to Delta as a better merger partner than US Airways if Delta or its creditors conclude a deal is unavoidable.

Kevin Mitchell, chairman of the Business Travel Coalition, said if such a "tsunami" of airline consolidation were to occur, repercussions for fliers would be disastrous, with fares rising as competition waned.

"What's more, these potential transactions represent a near-term fix to the industry's difficulties and do not address systemic profitability problems and root causes," he said.

Airlines are rebounding this year, partly on the wings of cost cuts from layoffs and restructurings. But they still must battle the high cost of fuel. Many analysts believe consolidation would enable carriers to cut overlapping routes and reduce capacity, making it easier to raise fares.

Others note the industry's troubled history with getting cooperation from labor groups, not to mention the difficulties of bringing different fleets, maintenance schedules and cultures under one umbrella. Said veteran airline consultant Mike Boyd: "You're dealing with a lot of emotion here that may not make sense in the light of day."

Utah Officials Express Concern Over Possible Delta Merger (KSL)

KSL-TV Salt Lake City, December 14, 2006

(KSL News) Utah legislators are concerned about the future of Delta Airlines, especially if the company merges with US Airways.

Even though Delta has given no indication of a merger Utah officials are being proactive-- asking the Justice Department now to consider the risks such a move would pose for Utah's economy before approving a merger in the future.

Rep. Greg Curtis (R), Utah Speaker of the House: "We're simply trying to make sure that there's a heightened awareness. Make sure this works within the statutory framework. Not asking for a statutory change."

When US Airways made the offer to Delta last month they assured Governor Huntsman the move would not adversely affect Utah.

Legislators say their request to the Justice Department is just making sure that promise is kept.

Airline Industry Poised For Shake-up? (USAT)

By Dan Reed

USA Today, December 14, 2006

One small takeover bid — and the possibility of a much bigger one — rocked the airline world Wednesday, moving stock prices and fueling speculation about the future shape of the industry.

Midwest Airlines, a small Milwaukee-based carrier highly regarded by Midwesterners for its quality of service, rejected a public offer of $290 million in stock and cash from Orlando-based AirTran, one of the USA's fast-growing low-cost carriers.

DOJ_NMG_0106422

But AirTran CEO Joe Leonard says he won't give up his pursuit, which has involved several previous, private offers that Midwest's board rebuffed.

Meanwhile, continued speculation about a possible merger of United Airlines and Continental Airlines fueled a growing buzz about industry consolidation first prompted by US Airways' Nov. 15 bid to acquire Delta Air Lines out of Chapter 11 bankruptcy.

Adding to industry chatter: the announcement late Wednesday of the sale of Australia's Qantas. Qantas agreed to a sweetened $8.64 billion offer less than 24 hours after rejecting a slightly smaller bid from the same group. The acquiring group, Airline Partners Australia, includes Texas Pacific Group, the U.S. private equity company led by financier David Bonderman. Texas Pacific previously has held large stakes in both Continental Airlines and America West, now part of US Airways, and continues to hold a big stake in Europe's Ryanair.

Neither Continental nor United would confirm that they are in talks. Two industry sources with knowledge of the discussions, being conducted privately, said the merger talks are active. They cautioned that no announcement is imminent and that a merger may never occur.

The airline activity stirred Wall Street. On a day when oil prices inched upward and the Dow Jones industrial average was flat, the Amex Airline index rose almost 3%. United and Continental shares gained the most, 4.7% and 4.4%, respectively. Most other airline stocks also rose, though US Airways' shares fell 0.4%.

Analyst Ray Neidl at Calyon Securities told clients that a United-Continental merger makes sense because their route networks are complementary. But he warned that it "entails addressing a series of operational issues, as well as antitrust concerns."

Also on the merger front: Delta executives, who are resisting the US Airways takeover, told their top creditors that the airline would be worth more than the takeover bid if it's allowed to exit bankruptcy in 2007 as a stand-alone carrier. Delta management estimates the carrier's worth then would be as much as $12 billion, vs. the pending offer of about $8.5 billion.

United They Stand? (CHIT)

By Julie Johnsson, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, December 14, 2006

What the frenzy of airline mergers and reports of new takeover bids might mean for passengers, Chicago and the industry

Once the frenzy has subsided, and all the airline industry consolidation has been digested, Chicago could find itself home to the country's biggest carrier, a supersize United Airlines, or home to none at all.

Passengers could be looking at higher fares or more bargains. They also could be in for a long, confusing period of service upheaval, industry analysts say.

Tens of thousands of workers could be affected as airlines merge, with some getting bigger and others disappearing.

Nothing was for certain Wednesday, except that it had been a remarkable 24 hours for airline takeover action and merger talk, as an industry that has appeared ripe for consolidation for years suddenly began moving toward one of the biggest, and maybe fastest, realignments ever seen in American business.

"This is the big bang," said Kevin Mitchell, chairman of the Business Travel Coalition, a Radnor, Pa.-based advocacy group for corporate buyers of air travel. "Everything could happen from here."

Elk Grove Township-based United was at the center of the action, negotiating a potential merger with Continental Airlines and reportedly looking over Delta Air Lines Inc., the object of an unfriendly offer from US Airways.

Meanwhile, AirTran Airways said Wednesday that it would continue its hostile pursuit of Milwaukee-based Midwest Airlines, a move aimed at shaking Southwest Airlines' lock on low-cost service in the region from its base at Midway Airport.

And Australia's Qantas Airways Ltd. announced that it accepted an $8.7 billion takeover offer from a consortium of private-equity funds, led by Texas Pacific Group and Macquarie Bank Ltd.

Further speculation is that American Airlines is checking out Northwest Airlines, which is in bankruptcy along with Delta. Mindful of the talk, Northwest Chief Executive Douglas Steenland told employees this week that the Minnesota-based carrier intends to emerge from Chapter 11 next year as a stand-alone company.

When the dust settles, analysts think the six major airlines atop the U.S. market could meld into three megacarriers, though there is no guarantee any of the deals will get done.

"This is a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity," said Alan Sbarra, principal with Roach and Sbarra, an airline consulting firm based in the San Francisco area. "I really think that if there's going to be consolidation, this is the time to do it."

Any deals must be approved by federal antitrust regulators, however, and they traditionally have been wary of large-scale consolidation.

DOJ_NMG_0106423

And even if they pass muster, massive airline mergers would be exceptionally difficult to pull off, experts say. To do so, carriers must mesh schedules involving thousands of daily flights around the globe, resolve differing cultures that go back generations and combine workforces the size of a small city.

Most aviation mergers in the U.S. over the past 30 years have faltered, and even airlines that pull off this feat tend to be plagued by service problems for years afterward.

The typical miscues that plague merging employee groups would be greatly amplified if virtually every large American airline is swept up in a dealmaking frenzy, experts say.

"You're essentially putting the whole system in play," said Mitchell. "There would be customer-service disruption for years."

Changing the work habits of huge numbers of frontline employees will run the risk of miscommunication, miscues and other problems.

That's bad news for consumers since the four of the airlines in play—Delta, US Airways, Continental and United—are struggling with service problems. They generated the four worst scores for customer complaints among U.S. carriers during October, according to a recent report by the Bureau of Transportation Statistics.

However, many in aviation remain skeptical that the industry-shattering change under contemplation will materialize.

Delta's management team remains adamantly opposed to US Airways' $8.5 billion bid and, like Northwest, has vowed to emerge from bankruptcy without a merger partner.

"I take Delta at their word," said William Brandt, a Chicago-based restructuring expert. "If they do manage to beat the US Airways bid, and the chances of that happening are 50-50, then Delta will stand alone and not go running to United."

Meanwhile, United and Continental's merger talks, described as preliminary, appear hung up on the issue of which management team would lead the combined company, said a person familiar with the negotiations.

That's a crucial issue that has some civic leaders on edge since it could determine where the airline's headquarters is based. For now, United still plans to move its headquarters to downtown Chicago early next year, said a spokeswoman.

The airline hasn't talked to city officials about if or how consolidation would affect the high-profile move, which United announced this summer in exchange for millions of dollars in federal and state aid.

"It's always a nervous thing, but this city gives them the whole world, and Houston does not," said Paul O'Connor, executive director of World Business Chicago, a non-profit group that promotes economic development in the city.

The two airlines have talked several times about joining forces over the past decade. However, Continental's previous overtures to United and CEO Glenn Tilton faltered after the two disagreed on management control, sources said.

United is the second-largest U.S. carrier, while Continental ranks fifth. Even so, Continental CEO Lawrence Kellner wouldn't be content to play second-fiddle to Tilton, say people who know him.

"Remember, these guys have big egos," said Tom Buffenbarger, international president of the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, which represents ramp workers and gate agents at United and flight attendants at Continental. "Glenn Tilton is an oilman. It would be a battle of Texas titans."

Mergers always generate much anxiety for airline workers, who worry about losing their jobs as well as seniority, which determines the pay and perks they receive.

But there's a silver lining for United workers: Any merger likely would force management to reopen the airline's current, unpopular labor contracts, analysts say. They otherwise wouldn't be subject to revision before late 2009.

While consumer advocates warn that consolidation could lead to higher ticket prices, one of Wednesday's bids could have the opposite effect for Chicago passengers.

Thwarted by Southwest in an earlier attempt to become the largest airline at Midway, AirTran is looking to establish a major hub in Milwaukee through its hostile offer for Midwest Airlines.

The up to $330 million bid, made Oct. 20 and disclosed Wednesday, would give AirTran control of about half of the operations at Milwaukee's Mitchell International Airport. Midwest rejected the offer Dec. 6, but AirTran said it would keep trying.

An increased presence in the Midwest would make AirTran a potent rival to Southwest, capable of drawing bargain-hunting passengers from across the Chicago area. The increased competition should keep prices down, experts say.

"Milwaukee is a perfectly suited alternative to Chicago," said Sbarra, the airline consultant.

Obstacle Looms In United-Continental Deal (WT)

By Sean Lengell

Washington Times, December 14, 2006

Reported talks between Continental and United airlines over a proposed merger may be doomed as the result of an unusual relationship between Continental and a third airline.

DOJ_NMG_0106424

Northwest Airlines holds a special preferred "golden share" of Continental Airlines stock, giving Northwest the right to block Continental from consolidating with another airline.

The alliance dates to late 2000 when Northwest agreed to sell shares of Continental common stock back to Continental after the Justice Department accused Northwest of anti-competitive behavior.

As a condition of the sale, a special class of preferred Continental stock was created and sold to Northwest, giving the airline veto power if Continental attempted to merge with another airline.

Northwest declined to say whether it would consider exercising its veto. But airline analyst Anthony Tangorra said the Eagan, Minn., airline wouldn't hesitate because a Continental-United combination would create the world's largest carrier, dwarfing Northwest.

"Northwest highly values its right to block the acquisition of Continental Airlines," said Mr. Tangorra, chief executive of Latitude Transport Advisory of New York.

Sources who confirmed the United-Continental talks asked not to be identified because the discussions are private. United and Continental officially declined to comment on the talks.

Continental still could proceed with an acquisition, despite objections from Northwest, if the deal doesn't require a vote of Continental stockholders.

Moreover, if Northwest is engaged in a merger of its own, its veto power over Continental would be voided under terms of its 2000 alliance.

"There are a lot of hurdles to this [United-Continental proposal], so it's anything but a done deal," said Ray Neidl, an airline analyst with Calyon Securities.

A Continental-United partnership would make sense because United's strong presence in the Pacific and Western U.S. would complement Continental's presence in the Latin American and trans-Atlantic markets, analysts say.

Just how serious are Continental and United about merging?

"Continental and United have been talking for years," Mr. Tangorra said. "As a matter of fact, every airline has been talking to every airline for years. The moment of those talks have an ebb and flow."

The United-Continental acquisition proposal is one of several for airlines in recent weeks.

US Airways Group Inc. last month proposed an $8 billion takeover of bankrupt Delta Air Lines. Delta has said it has no interest in the offer.

AirTran Holdings Inc. yesterday made a $290 million stock and cash bid for Midwest Air Group Inc., the parent company of Midwest Airlines, an Oak Creek, Wis., carrier with hubs in Milwaukee and Kansas City, Mo.

Australia's Qantas Airways staved off a recent takeover bid led by an investment bank and two private-equity firms.

United also has been reported to be considering an acquisition of Delta.

"The industry is fragmented and primed for consolidation," Mr. Neidl said.

Continental Shares Reach Post-9/11 High (AO)

AP, December 14, 2006

NEW YORK --Shares of Continental Airlines Inc. soared to their highest level since before the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks, as the company talks with United Airlines about a possible combination to create a mega-carrier.

Houston-based Continental's stock jumped $1.82, or 4.2 percent, to $44.70 in midday trading on the New York Stock Exchange. They climbed as high as $46.29 earlier in the session, topping their prior 52-week high of $45.76 set earlier this week. It is the stock's highest level since Aug. 9, 2001, when shares reached $47.10.

Shares of United's parent UAL Corp., meanwhile, surged $2.26, or 5.2 percent, to $45.49 on the Nasdaq. They reached $46.54 earlier in the session, their highest point since they began trading in February following UAL's emergence from Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection. The stock's prior high was $45.20, set earlier this week.

Analysts recommended patience. The carriers are likely watching to see if US Airways Group Inc.'s proposed hostile takeover of Delta Air Lines Inc. goes through, they said.

Prudential analyst Bob McAdoo wrote in a research report that he doubts Continental wants a deal, but it might do one contingent on the Delta/US Airways deal being approved by federal regulators.

He said American Airlines' parent AMR Corp. likely has a similar strategy and could link up with Northwest Airlines Corp.

Calyon Securities analyst Ray Neidl said a United/Continental marriage would make a good fit, bringing together United's strong Pacific network with Continental's Latin American strength and Newark, N.J., hub.

However, any deal involving Continental must account for the so-called "golden share" that Northwest holds in the carrier. Through a special voting series of Continental preferred stock, Northwest can block a merger between Continental and another major carrier.

DOJ_NMG_0106425

Consolidation has long been a hot topic for the airline industry. Goldman Sachs analyst Robert Barry said in a research report that merger activity would be a rising tide that lifts at least most stocks for the industry.

Combinations would allow airlines to reduce available seats, giving them more pricing power to raise fares and boost profits amid high fuel prices.

Such deals, though, would likely face tough federal antitrust scrutiny, analysts say.

Qantas Agrees To A$11.1bn Takeover Offer (FT)

By Sundeep Tucker In Hong Kong And Raphael Minder In Sydney

Financial Times, December 14, 2006

Qantas has agreed to an A$11.1bn (US$8.7bn) takeover offer by a consortium including Australia's Macquarie Bank and Texas Pacific Group, a US buy-out fund.

The airline rejected the consortium's opening offer on Wednesday but early on Thursday it recommended a sweetened A$5.60-a-share offer.

Shares in Qantas jumped nearly 5 per cent to A$5.33 by early Thursday afternoon. The buy-out offer is 29 per cent more than the stock traded at November 21, when Qantas first said it had been approached.

Margaret Jackson, chairman, said Thursday that, subject to receiving an opinion by independent expert Grant Samuel, the non-executive directors unanimously intended to recommend the bid.

The move coincides with upheaval in the airlines industry in the US. Northwest Airlines is expected to use its right to block any proposed merger between Continental and United, derailing attempts to advance talks to create the world's largest carrier.

A Qantas sale would require government approval and must be backed by investors holding more than 90 per cent of the airline's equity. Capital Group of the US is the largest shareholder, with 12.8 per cent.

If endorsed by investors, the agreement would mark one of the biggest aviation deals in history and follows a spate of multi-billion dollar buyouts in Australia this year.

Geoff Dixon, Qantas' chief executive hit out at a warning by Moody's Investor Service Wednesday that it might downgrade its rating on the airline's debt to junk status in the wake of the buyout. "I believe the statement that was made was right out of line," he told reporters. "I do not believe it has any validity at all."

The agreement follows a day of drama in Australia on Wednesday that began with the airline rejecting the consortium's opening offer of A$5.50 a share, which valued Qantas at A$10.9bn.

Qantas's non-executive directors said "the terms of the proposal are not acceptable" as these included "complex conditions" such as a break fee payable to the consortium.

This unexpected rejection sparked a day of talks between Qantas executives and representatives of the consortium. The private equity groups dropped some of their conditions and raised the offer price by 10 cents to A$5.60.

The consortium is understood to have dropped the demand for a break fee, set at A$100m, in theory freeing Qantas to entertain rival buy-out approaches.

Macquarie confirmed a report that the consortium, called Airline Partners Australia, would be majority-Australian owned. Lawmakers have been concerned about the possible buy-out. The airline is subject to ownership restrictions that limit foreigners to a combined 49 per cent stake.

Macquarie said it would own less than 15 per cent, with local rivals Allco Finance Group taking 11 per cent and Allco Equity Partners the biggest single investor with 34 per cent. Offshore investors would hold less than 40 per cent, with neither Texas Pacific nor Canada's Onex holding more than 15 per cent.

Qantas Deal Reflects Private Equity's Wider Horizon (WSJ)

By Henny Sender And Kate Linebaugh

Wall Street Journal, December 14, 2006

The $8.7 billion transaction for Australia's Qantas Airways Ltd. suggests the global deal-making frenzy spawned by private equity may be turning its sights to the recovering airline sector.

The board of Qantas yesterday unanimously approved a sweetened takeover bid by a private-equity consortium being led by Texas Pacific Group and Australia's Allco Equity Partners Ltd. The bid, of 5.60 Australian dollars a share, was increased by 10 Australian cents a share after the board rejected a bid a day earlier. Other terms were also changed.

Qantas shares were up almost 5% to A$5.34 in early afternoon trading on the Australian Stock Exchange. The offer price is 33% higher than the share price when speculation about the deal began on Nov. 6.

Under the terms of the deal, Qantas will be delisted from the Australian exchange -- but retain majority Australian ownership, as required by law, with Allco becoming the company's largest shareholder. Qantas Chief Executive Officer Geoff

Dixon and Chief Financial Officer Peter Gregg will retain their positions, and at least two-thirds of the board will be Australian citizens.

Private equity's increasing role in financial markets comes as airlines world-wide have recovered from their doldrums, and private-equity firms and other private investors have shown increasing interest in an industry famously troublesome for investors. Private-equity firms were significant investors in the recent reorganizations of ATA Holdings Corp. and Aloha Airgroup Inc. in the U.S. Hedge funds participated in the reorganization and merger that created the current US Airways Group Inc. Private-equity and hedge-fund firm Wexford Capital LLC, which partly owns Republic Airways Holdings Inc., based in Indianapolis, last year arranged the purchase of regional jets and landing slots from US Airways for $110 million. (See related article1.)

For Texas Pacific, the Qantas deal represents a return to an area of core competence. The firm's first, iconic deal was the purchase of Continental Airlines out of bankruptcy protection. And while Texas Pacific has a Sydney office, two of its four original partners, co-founder David Bonderman and Rick Schifter, who worked on the original Continental deal, were deeply involved in the negotiations over Qantas.

The Qantas deal marks a change in thinking at Texas Pacific, which until recently was cautious about prospects for the airline sector. For example, when Air Canada was put up for sale in 2004, the firm bid far less than the ultimate buyer, Cerberus Capital Management LP. At the time, the firm said that the kind of profits of a Continental deal were a thing of the past, given the competition from low-cost airlines.

But with the Air Canada deal looking just fine, Texas Pacific is on the prowl once more. In addition to Qantas, it is looking at other airlines, particularly in Asia.

Qantas is the dominant airline in Australia and remains profitable. Early this month, Qantas said it expects annual pretax profit to rise as much as 30%.

"The consortium members have made it clear that to us they recognize the immense value of the Qantas brand and intend to improve and grow the business," Qantas Chairman Margaret Jackson said in a release.

The bidding consortium, called Airline Partners Australia, plans a capital-expenditure program of more than A$10 billion to upgrade the fleet and improve Qantas's premium offering. The group is planning to acquire more than 70 aircraft, raising capacity by 40% and expanding services particularly internationally. Macquarie Bank Ltd., Allco Finance Group and Canada's Onex Corp. are among the buyers.

Australian Prime Minister John Howard said today the government will monitor the takeover bid, but the deal was ultimately a matter for the market. The government plans to review the offer to ensure it meets competition laws and foreign-ownership laws, set as part of the 1995 privatization of the airline, based in Sydney.

Under its structure, the deal adheres to the ownership rules which should help avert a backlash from lawmakers who have voiced concern about the takeover of a national icon. The Australian companies in the consortium will have greater voting rights than the overseas investors. Allco's companies will have 46% voting rights, but only 35% economic interests, while Texas Pacific will have a 25% economic interest, but its voting interest will be less than 15%. Macquarie will have less than a 15% stake.

Qantas Board Accepts Offer Of $8.7 Billion For A Buyout (NYT)

By Tim Johnston

New York Times, December 14, 2006

SYDNEY, Australia, Thursday, Dec. 14 — Qantas Airways, Australia's largest airline, agreed on Thursday to accept a sweetened buyout offer of 11.1 billion Australian dollars ($8.7 billion) from a consortium led by Macquarie Bank and the Texas Pacific Group.

In a statement, the board of Qantas said it would recommend that shareholders allow the company to be taken private. If the deal goes ahead, it will be Australia's biggest takeover, and would be the latest move in a global revival in airline stocks, which have languished since Sept. 11, 2001.

"The directors believe this offer allows Qantas shareholders to realize significant value for their shares that has not been fully recognized in the public market," the chairman, Margaret Jackson, said Wednesday.

The bid values the company at 5.60 Australian dollars a share, substantially more than its closing price on Wednesday of 5.09 Australian dollars and analysts' prebid valuations of 4.10 to 4.60 Australian dollars.

The consortium — Airline Partners Australia — includes Texas Pacific, Macquarie Bank, Allco Equity Partners and the Allco Finance Group of Australia, and Onex, the Canadian leveraged buyout company.

The group also brings together an array of aviation talent, including David Bonderman of Texas Pacific; Rod Eddington of Allco Finance, the former chief executive of British Airways; and David Turnbull of Allco Finance, formerly of Cathay Pacific.

Few analysts expect investors to block the deal.

DOJ_NMG_0106427

The board had rejected an offer of 5.50 Australian dollars a share on Wednesday. In addition to the increased offer, the bidders agreed to drop their demand for a 1 percent breakup fee.

Matt Crowe, an analyst with J. P. Morgan in Sydney, said he believed that it was not just the price that swayed the board's decision.

"Qantas management have been frustrated for some time by the progress of their cost-reduction program," Mr. Crowe said. "It is harder to make difficult cost reductions that might cause disruption in the short term. Going private will make that easier."

Within the consortium, a complex division of the shareholdings is intended to satisfy the Australian government's requirement that no more than 49 percent of the company is foreign-owned.

Onex and Texas Pacific will hold less than 40 percent of the airline, with Allco Equity Partners expected to hold about 34 percent; the Allco Finance Group, 11 percent; and Macquarie, less than 15 percent.

The arrangement is also unlikely to jeopardize Qantas's participation in bilateral air services agreements — the arrangements between countries that stipulate which airline is allowed to fly what routes and at what capacity — that require that participating airlines be "substantially" domestically owned.

"If this acquisition is successful, Qantas will remain a majority Australian-owned, Australia-based airline," Ms. Jackson said.

Qantas's chief executive, Geoff Dixon, will stay on. Peter Harbison of the Center for Asia Pacific Aviation in Sydney, said that although the airline was already one of the world's most profitable, Mr. Dixon was preparing for a time of less government protection and was betting that the new ownership would give Qantas easier access to capital to continue its expansion beyond Australia into the growth areas of Asia.

Alltel Agrees To Sell 4 Markets (AP)

AP, December 14, 2006

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. (AP) -- Wireless carrier Alltel Corp. said Wednesday it agreed to sell four Minnesota markets to Rural Cellular Corp., in order to meet divestiture requirements established by the U.S. Department of Justice.

Financial terms weren't disclosed.

In October, the company received approval from the Justice Department for its $1.1 billion acquisition of Midwest Wireless on the condition that the combined company sell some assets in markets where they both operate.

The Minnesota markets that will be sold to Rural Cellular have been managed by a trustee by the Department of Justice since October.

Rural Cellular said it plans to use cash on hand to finance the purchase, which is expected to close in the first quarter of 2007.

Shares of Alltel closed up 10 cents at $58.16 on the New York Stock Exchange, while shares of Rural Cellular closed up 7 cents at $12.68 on the Nasdaq.

State Paper Firm Indicted On Charges Of Price Fixing (MJS)

By Joel Dresang

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, December 14, 2006

The U.S. Justice Department announced an indictment Wednesday against a Wisconsin-based paper company in an investigation of price fixing for magazine paper.

Justice officials said a federal grand jury in Connecticut indicted Stora Enso North America Corp. on charges of conspiring to set prices in consultation with competitors.

The company is the North American subsidiary of the Finnish paper company that bought out Wisconsin Rapids-based Consolidated Papers Inc. in 2000. Stora Enso North America has kept its headquarters in Wisconsin Rapids and employs about 2,700 workers in Wisconsin at mills in Biron, Kimberly, Niagara, Stevens Point, Whiting and Wisconsin Rapids.

According to Justice Department officials, the indictment claims that Stora Enso met with competitors and agreed to increase prices for coated publication papers used in magazines and high-volume catalogs. The indictment contends that Stora Enso sold paper "at collusive and non-competitive prices" from August 2002 to June 2003.

Executives for Stora Enso in Wisconsin Rapids did not return calls late Wednesday. Tim Laatsch, a company spokesman, told the Associated Press that he would not comment because he had not read the indictment.

Last month, parent Stora Enso Oyj reported that the European Commission had closed its investigation of a suspected publication paper cartel.

The U.S. charges against Stora Enso carry a fine of up to $10 million, which could be increased to twice the gain derived from the alleged crime or twice the loss suffered by the alleged victims, if either of those amounts is greater.

Wis. Firm Accused Of Price-fixing Magazine Paper Prices (AP)

By Stephen Singer

AP, December 14, 2006

HARTFORD, Conn. - A federal grand jury on Wednesday indicted a paper products company in a price-fixing conspiracy designed to drive up the sale of paper used to print magazines and catalogues.

Stora Enso North America Corp., based in Wisconsin Rapids, Wis., is accused of conspiring to inflate the prices from August 2002 through June 2003, the U.S. Department of Justice said in a statement.

The paper is primarily used to print magazines, news weeklies and high-volume catalogues. The company agreed to the scheme in a meeting with an unidentified competitor, according to the indictment.

"The price of coated paper used in magazines affects nearly every American," said Thomas O. Barnett, assistant attorney general in charge of the Justice Department's antitrust division.

Stora Enso spokesman Tim Laatsch said he has not read the indictment and would not comment.

Stora Enso is a U.S.-based subsidiary of Stora Enso Oyj of Helsinki, Finland, the second-largest magazine paper producer in the world. Its paper sales are marketed to publishers, retailers, catalog producers, commercial printers and merchants.

Stora Enso has sales offices in Connecticut, Georgia and other states. The conspiracy charged in the indictment, which was handed up in Hartford, was carried out in Connecticut and elsewhere, the Justice Department said.

Violations occurring before June 22, 2004, carry a maximum fine of $10 million, which may be increased.

Stora Enso's stock closed at $15.95, unchanged, on the New York Stock Exchange Wednesday.

Citigroup To Buy Grupo Cuscatlan, U.K.'s Quilter (WSJ)

By David Enrich

Wall Street Journal, December 14, 2006

Citigroup Inc. agreed to buy a Central American banking company in a $1.51 billion cash-and-stock deal that marks the latest in a series of recent overseas acquisitions.

Citigroup said it is buying the subsidiaries of Grupo Cuscatlan from Corporacion UBC Internacional SA, a commercial- and corporate-banking group that does business in El Salvador, Guatemala, Costa Rica, Honduras and Panama. Citigroup also is acquiring the group's pension and insurance operations in El Salvador.

Citigroup, after a yearlong deal-making hiatus imposed by the Federal Reserve, has been on a small shopping spree lately. The company also announced yesterday that it has agreed to buy Quilter, a Morgan Stanley wealth-management unit in the United Kingdom. Terms weren't disclosed.

The Central American deal, coming the day before top Citigroup executives host their annual investor day at their Park Avenue headquarters in New York, is Citigroup's second recent deal in the region and its fifth international deal this fall.

In October, Citigroup bought Grupo Financiero Uno, which it described as Central America's No. 1 credit-card issuer. The bank didn't disclose the terms of that deal. That month, Citigroup also agreed to buy a 20% stake in a big Turkish bank, Akbank TAS. In November, Citigroup led a group that agreed to buy about 86% of Guangdong Development Bank, a southern Chinese lender.

The moves illustrate a bet by Chief Executive Charles Prince that fast-growing overseas markets hold greater potential for the world's biggest bank in market value than the U.S. But it isn't clear the deals will quickly jump-start Citigroup's sluggish revenue streams, a source of angst among many Citigroup investors.

The Grupo Cuscatlan deal "is another significant step in expanding Citigroup's businesses in Latin America," Mr. Prince said in a statement. Coupled with the pending Grupo Uno deal, "these transactions quickly and significantly strengthen our distribution capabilities and product offerings to serve retail and corporate clients in Central America."

Citigroup said Grupo Cuscatlan has $5.4 billion in assets, including $3.5 billion in loans and $3.4 billion in deposits.

Hearst Expects To Close Daily Breeze Purchase This Week (AP)

AP, December 14, 2006

Torrance, Calif. (AP) -- Hearst Corp. expects to complete its purchase of the Daily Breeze on Friday as part of a deal to resell the newspaper to MediaNews Group Inc., according to a court document filed by the two newspaper operators.

The document was filed Wednesday in a pending federal antitrust case involving Denver-based MediaNews and New York-based Hearst, owner of the San Francisco Chronicle, over their plans to consolidate some of the business operations of their San Francisco Bay area newspapers.

A San Francisco investor is trying to block the deal, claiming such cooperation violates antitrust laws.

DOJ_NMG_0106429

The two companies also said they had finished negotiations in their swap deal. Under the agreement, Hearst will purchase the Torrance-based Breeze from The Copley Press Inc. and then sell it to MediaNews along with two other publications, the Monterey County (Calif.) Herald and the St. Paul (Minn.) Pioneer Press.

San Diego-based Copley, whose flagship paper is the San Diego Union-Tribune, cited competitive pressures when it indicated in June it wanted to sell its Copley Los Angeles Newspapers. Those papers include the Breeze, the Palos Verdes Peninsula News and The Beach Reporter.

EU's Efforts Stymied? (WSJ)

By KENNETH MAXWELL And SANTIAGO PEREZ

Wall Street Journal, December 14, 2006

MILAN -- Autostrade SpA of Italy and Abertis Infraestructuras SA of Spain halted an agreement to merge and create the world's largest toll-road operator, citing blocks imposed by Italy's government and transportation regulator.

The companies said they remain convinced that a deal should be done, and said they hope to be back with a fresh plan at some point in the future. The companies struck a cash-and-shares deal to merge in April that would have resulted in a company with a market capitalization of €25 billion ($33.2 billion).

As time to secure the deal before a year-end deadline on the original agreement all but ran out, Autostrade and Abertis said in a joint statement that they "acknowledged the impossibility of carrying out the merger."

The failed merger highlights the fact that cross-border European mergers and acquisitions, agreed or hostile, stir up as much of a hornet's nest as ever, despite the European Union's best efforts to promote the notion of a single marketplace.

The companies made it clear that the project isn't dead and buried. "The companies hope that future conditions will allow the plan to be viewed in a different light and with this in mind aim to jointly proceed with initiatives and dialogue at institutional level," they said.

Speaking at a shareholders meeting in Rome, Autostrade Chairman Gian Maria Gros-Pietro made sure to point out that the door to a merger remains open. "We're prepared to discuss Abertis with the government," he said. "If we have a settled [operating] framework, we'll see if a deal's possible."

Abertis Chief Executive Salvador Alemany has said he remains willing to continue talks with Italian regulators. Italian Infrastructure Minister Antonio Di Pietro completed the circle by saying he is also open to more talks on the tie-up.

Investors reacted cautiously, sending Abertis shares higher on hopes for an end to wrangling in Italy for the time being, while Autostrade's stock slipped as the likelihood of a deal, which would be transformational for the company, receded. Abertis's stock price rose 2.6% to €22.80 yesterday in Madrid, while in Milan trading, Autostrade fell 1.5% to €21.80.

In a private note to clients, Lehman Brothers said the halt was more of an "arrivederci" than a farewell. "Both Autostrade and Abertis are convinced they'll resume the merger, which they've stopped for the time being for external reasons," the bank wrote. "There's no need to rush on this one," it added.

People familiar with the situation said the companies' commitment to the deal burns on.

"They've been explicitly vague on the future because they really don't know how long this could take," one person said. "But there are no chances of tangible advances until the Italian government outlines a new regulatory framework. The Italian government has the last word," the person said.

Unable to proceed with the merger for the time being, Autostrade yesterday scrapped a plan to propose a €2.1 billion dividend payout to Autostrade shareholders. The payout was conceived as a means to equalize the valuations of the two companies, along with an agreed swap ratio of 1.05 Abertis shares for every Autostrade share.

Since the merger announcement, the Italian government and transportation regulator have raised one objection after another. Imposing a variety of legal obstacles, the government has sought to wring maximum investment guarantees from the merger partners as a means to boost Italy's transportation system and economic growth without tapping the nation's already-stretched budget.

From the start, the industrial and financial logic of the merger won praise from investors and analysts alike in the unglamorous but highly profitable sector.

The logic of a deal remains compelling for Autostrade, Italy's main roads operator, and Abertis, which is also prominent in other infrastructure sectors. A merger would allow them to pool their global expertise and have greater financial power to target ripening markets in the U.S. and Eastern Europe, and help Abertis secure a key extension of the average lifetime of its licenses to operate highways.

The companies had expected to get full clearance for the transaction before the shareholders meeting scheduled for yesterday to vote on the special dividend payment lined up as part of the merger.

Instead, the Italian government intensified efforts to block the transaction during recent months, seeking to modify license terms for the toll roads operated by Autostrade and threatening to launch lawsuits on grounds that Autostrade allegedly failed to honor investment commitments.

The European Union, which gave the green light to the merger plan, has objected to Italy's efforts to derail the proposed transaction. Yesterday, the European Commission said it might continue its investigations into whether the Italian government has broken antitrust laws and rules ensuring the free movement of capital, even though the merger has been suspended.

The halt represents the second time in the past two years that a Spanish company has been forced to pull takeover plans in Italy because of hurdles imposed in Rome.

Last year, banking giant Banco Bilbao Vizcaya Argentaria SA lost out on buying Banca Nazionale del Lavoro SpA, with BBVA complaining about regulatory interference as Antonio Fazio, who at the time was the Bank of Italy's governor, was widely perceived to strongly back Italian bidders.

Intelligence Chairman Botches Islam Facts (HC)

By Michelle Mittelstadt, Houston Chronicle Washington Bureau

Houston Chronicle, December 14, 2006

Reyes' fumbled answers about terrorists raise questions about his fitness to serve

WASHINGTON — It's hardly the way Texan Silvestre Reyes wanted to ascend to the chairmanship of the influential House Intelligence Committee.

But the world of bloggers buzzed and critics flapped Tuesday about a botched pop quiz that raised questions about the El Paso Democrat's understanding of the al-Qaida terrorist network and other Islamist extremists.

Reyes, who takes the helm of the committee in January and has served on the panel since 2001, didn't know that al-Qaida was a Sunni organization, and couldn't pin down Hezbollah's Shiite affiliations, during an interview last week with Congressional Quarterly's national security editor.

The differences between the Sunni and Shiites are more than semantics. Islam's 1,400-year-old rift is playing out in deadly fashion across Iraq, where ordinary citizens are caught in a crossfire between insurgents, terrorists and militias motivated by politics and religion.

Conservative radio commentator Rush Limbaugh said Tuesday that Reyes' lapse was proof of the Democrats' inattention to national security.

"Do you think the Democrats are concerned about al-Qaida and Hezbollah?" he said, contending that Democrats care more about investigating President Bush and his anti-terrorism policies than going after terrorists.

Reyes declined an interview request Tuesday. In a statement Monday, he said he was "acutely aware of al-Qaida's desire to harm Americans. The Intelligence Committee will keep its eye on the ball, and focus on the pressing security and intelligence issues facing us."

The former Vietnam combat veteran has traveled to Iraq five times and to Afghanistan three times. He also recently toured Lebanon and Israel.

Some experts suggested that Reyes is just one example of a U.S. policy establishment that has paid little attention to the tricky nuances of politics, religion and sectarian differences that have riven the Middle East.

"When it comes to someone in a position of staff responsibility ... it's a little unnerving to discover that they don't know much about the subject," said Loch Johnson, a University of Georgia professor and former congressional aide.

Danielle Pletka, a Middle East and terrorism expert at the conservative American Enterprise Institute, was shocked by Reyes' lack of knowledge.

"If you don't really care enough about the challenge of Islamic extremism and terrorism to learn the basics, then perhaps when offered a plum position, you should say no," she said. "That goes against the grain in a town that likes titles, but it is the honorable course."

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, who tapped Reyes after passing over two more senior Intelligence Committee Democrats with whom she had differences, stands by her pick.

San Bernardino Gang Raid Nets Cash, 45 Suspects (LAT)

By Maeve Reston, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0106431

The arrests cap a seven-month operation in which 35 pounds of meth and 56 guns were seized. The goal is to dismantle the organization, the DEA says.

San Bernardino police and federal officials on Tuesday confiscated $500,000 in cash and arrested 45 alleged gang members believed to be major suppliers of methamphetamine in San Bernardino and the surrounding area, authorities announced.

The bust was the culmination of a seven-month investigation by San Bernardino police and the Los Angeles field office of the Drug Enforcement Administration.

Over the course of the investigation, officers confiscated $820,000 in cash, 56 guns, 41 vehicles and 35 pounds of methamphetamine — the primary drug distributed by the group, federal agents said.

During the seven months, officials arrested 119 people, including five men believed to be top Mexican Mafia associates in San Bernardino, police officials said.

Crime has emerged as a major political issue in San Bernardino in recent years, as the number of murders and violent crimes has increased after a lull in the late 1990s.

It was the central issue in the mayor's campaign this year, and city residents recently approved a sales tax increase to generate revenue for more officers and crime-prevention programs.

San Bernardino police requested the assistance of the DEA to deal with the surge in methamphetamine and weapons trafficking by gangs in the city.

"When you take this much drugs, this much money and this many guns off the street, it's going to have an impact on crime," said Lt. Mark Garcia, a spokesman for the San Bernardino Police Department.

Special Agent Sarah Pullen, a spokeswoman for the DEA, said the drug seizures and arrests Tuesday morning involved 400 officers who served 43 simultaneous search warrants in Riverside and San Bernardino counties, including five at the reservation of the San Manuel Band of Mission Indians in Highland.

She said those arrested ranged from the "shot-callers" to street-level dealers and muscle.

"The goal of this investigation was to dismantle this organization," said Pullen, who said authorities could not provide details about who was part of the organization or how they operated.

"We are hopeful that over the next few months that basically the entire organization operating out here will be pretty much gone."

The San Bernardino County district attorney's office is expected to file weapons, drug and probation charges against many of the alleged gang members as early as today, Pullen said.

Suspected Leaders Of Major Drug Ring Jailed (ADS)

Arizona Daily Star, December 14, 2006

An international drug-trafficking organization that brought violence and thousands of pounds of marijuana into Southern Arizona has been busted, according to court documents made public Wednesday.

The organization, led by Carlos Molinares-Nuñez for the last five years, has been linked to homicides both in Mexico and the United States that appear to be drug-related, court documents state.

The Molinares-Nuñez drug operation is also responsible for moving thousands of pounds of marijuana into Southern Arizona during a three-year period in which it was being closely monitored by the Drug Enforcement Administration, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, the FBI and the Bisbee Police Department, records show.

An indictment filed in federal court in November was unsealed Wednesday, detailing the intricacies of the ring, which has at least 20 employees.

Only three people, including Molinares-Nuñez, were named in the indictment. The other two are considered to be his top co-conspirators — Luis Alfonso Carillo-Landavazo and Luis Carlos Quijada-Soto, according to a memorandum filed in U.S. District Court.

The memo details how Molinares-Nuñez set up a command center in his home in Naco, Sonora, where, using high-tech equipment, he monitored law enforcement radio frequencies, including those of federal agents in the United States.

"On numerous occasions, agents were frustrated in their enforcement efforts due to active physical and electronic counter-surveillance techniques, which were routinely performed by members" of the drug gang, court documents state.

Agents were not only frustrated by those barriers but also with the fights that the organization would put up any time law enforcement caught them transporting marijuana into the country.

Many tons of marijuana would be transported at one time in modified vehicles that would enter the country by driving in between designated ports of entry to avoid law officers, the memo said.

DOJ_NMG_0106432

The drivers were told to evade officers if detected, which resulted in a number of high-speed pursuits as they attempted to return to Mexico.

In one incident near Naco, Ariz., a vehicle became disabled, and the smugglers had to make their way back to Mexico on foot, documents show.

After their escape, they fired across the border with semi- automatic guns.

In another incident detailed in court records, an agent working the case got into a shootout when members of the drug organization confronted the agent at his home.

On Saturday, Molinares-Nuñez — a Mexican national who is a lawful permanent resident — was arrested in Tucson while he was staying with his wife's relatives, his attorney, Walter Nash, said Wednesday.

At the time, he had $4,600 in U.S. currency, a concealed handcuff key and cocaine.

Carillo-Landavazo — who according to court documents was an upper-level manager in charge of the distribution of marijuana from Mexico to Tucson and Phoenix — was arrested on Monday after he was seen leaving a residence linked to the drug gang. He had a border-crossing card, which has been rescinded.

Quijada-Soto, who was also arrested Monday, was responsible for obtaining the vehicles used by the ring and securing drug stash houses in Tucson, court documents state.

He was arrested at the Douglas port of entry while trying to enter the United States.

All three men remained in custody Wednesday at a federal detention center, Nash said.

A hearing will be held at 10:30 a.m. Wednesday to determine if they will be held without bond.

Molinares-Nuñez was indicted on two charges — continuing a criminal enterprise and conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute marijuana — and is facing a 20-year mandatory minimum sentence.

His co-defendants, who were both indicted on the conspiracy charge only, are facing at least 10 years.

17 Arrested In North Country Drug Sweep (AP)

AP, December 13, 2006

PLATTSBURGH, N.Y. (AP) _ A drug bust in the North Country netted 17 arrests Wednesday.

Most of the accused live in and around Plattsburgh and were suspected of dealing marijuana, heroin, methamphetamines, cocaine and crack.

The bust was the work of the Adirondack Drug Task Force, which includes State Police, Plattsburgh Police, the Clinton County Sheriff's Department, the U.S. Border Patrol and the federal Drug Enforcement Administration.

The arrests came after months of investigation and surveillance, DEA Agent James Farnsworth said.

It's becoming more common for people from the New York City area to move to the North Country to sell drugs because they can fetch a higher price in the smaller market, Farnsworth said.

UPDATED: S. Texas Drug Bust Is Huge (SEN)

San Antonio Express, December 14, 2006

If there were any doubts, federal authorities say, a kilo of cocaine that agents found in the underwear of 81-year-old Josefina Campos solidified a case targeting a large smuggling ring centered in San Antonio and Floresville.

Campos' arrest Nov. 28 is but a piece of a puzzle that became more complete Wednesday as officials announced they had smashed a drug-smuggling cell that netted seizures of more than 210 kilograms of cocaine and $4.5 million in cash.

A federal indictment unsealed Wednesday in San Antonio — the fruits of an operation that began in May 2005 — names Campos and 37 other people on charges of conspiracy to commit drug trafficking, conspiracy to launder more than $5 million and related charges.

Officials said at a news briefing that the cocaine was found on Campos when she and her daughter, Yolanda Benavidez, 59, crossed back from Mexico at Eagle Pass. Besides those women, the probe snared an elementary school teacher, a registered nurse, a postal employee and an alleged member of the Mara Salvatrucha, or MS-13, gang.

"As a prosecutor, you think you've seen it all, and then something like this (cocaine concealed in underwear) happens," said U.S. Attorney Johnny Sutton, whose San Antonio-based federal district stretches from Waco south to Eagle Pass and west to El Paso. "It just goes to show you that there's people who will go into this business to make money and sell this poison in the community. We are going to go after these folks no matter what their age."

Express-News Extra

·The Indictment: Details on the charges

The ring is accused of transporting the cocaine primarily to the Ohio cities of Cleveland and Youngstown, while some loads of the drug hit the streets of San Antonio, Austin, Houston and other Texas cities, according to officials and court records.

Most of the drugs were smuggled across the Mexico border at Eagle Pass-Piedras Negras, according to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration.

"Over the past several days, 29 of the 38 suspects have been arrested in six Texas cities, effectively dismantling a major cocaine organization that was based in San Antonio," said Joe Arabit, assistant special agent in charge of the DEA in San Antonio.

"The roles of those arrested ranged from the (alleged) leader, Jorge Euresti, to many of his distributors, transporters and facilitators whose purpose was to store cash and drugs for this organization."

The case also was unusual given the manner in which much of the alleged drug proceeds were smuggled back to Mexico.

Members of the DEA Task Force and the High Intensity Drug Trafficking Area task force made several seizures that included large amounts of cash, wrapped in plastic, hidden in large boxes of laundry detergent and buckets of construction joint compound.

The largest single seizure was $1.1 million on Aug. 25, 2005, in San Antonio, followed by $647,131 intercepted on Sept. 8, 2005, in Columbus.

The main targets of the drug probe included Euresti, 27, and Suzel Mireles, 30, both of San Antonio, who have been arrested, and Sergio Javier Garza, 33, of Floresville, who's not in custody.

The trio are alleged to have coordinated cocaine trafficking activities; Campos and Benavidez are accused of coordinating money laundering from Eagle Pass.

The probe also netted Joette Natasha Barnes, 25, of League City, a fourth-grade special education teacher for the Galveston Independent School District who lived in San Antonio from 2000 to 2004. Also arrested were postal employee Jonah Davidson, 30, of Tyler; Joy Zwerneman, 38, a registered nurse from San Antonio; and Homero Rodriguez, 28; of Houston, alleged to be linked to the MS-13 gang, officials said.

Other key suspects include San Antonio residents Quincy Dupree Todd, 28; Henry Earl Todd, 35; and brothers Manuel Martinez Zertuche, 65, and Rene Martinez Zertuche, 59, both formerly of Floresville, officials said. The Martinezes were among eight suspects who still were at large Wednesday. A ninth person named in the indictment was expected to surrender today.

Besides the criminal charges, the government also seeks a judgment against the defendants for almost $5.4 million. gcontreras@express-news.net

More Details Behind International Drug Bust In SA (WOAI)

WOAI-TV, December 13, 2006

A major cocaine ring is in shambles after a major bust. 29 people have been arrested, including a 4th grade school teacher. Nine suspects are still on the loose.

The DEA says the drugs came from Piedras Negras, Mexico, then moved right across the border to Eagle Pass and then brought to San Antonio and Houston.

More than 200 kilos of cocaine were seized over the past year and a half, but more importantly is the fact that the organization is out of commission.

"I'm sure that they will feel it, because we seized $4.5 million in cash. Anytime you deprive them of their revenue, they feel it", said DEA Agent Joe Arabit.

Agents say the ring was working for the Arturo Beltran drug cartel in Mexico, and has been in operation since at least 2003. Investigators say the group moved between 200 to 400 kilos of cocaine a month from across the border into Texas, and then north as far as Cleveland, Ohio.

The DEA busted Jorge Uresti at his San Antonio home on the northwest side Tuesday. Investigators say he ran operations for the cartel out of that house. Neighbors who lived near Uresti say the bust wasn't a big shock.

Nine suspects are still at large, including Manuel and Rene Zertuche, who are believed to have run the ring's operations out of Houston. Investigators are asking anybody with information to call the DEA's office.

Ten Houses Seized In Massive Drug Sweep (UL)

The Union Leader, December 14, 2006

CONCORD – Six people have been arrested and ten “mini-mansions” seized in southern New Hampshire after a joint state-federal drug investigation.

An estimated 6,000 marijuana plants were confiscated with a possible value of $24 million.

DOJ_NMG_0106434

The operation was conducted by New Hampshire State Police, the federal Drug Enforcement Administration and the United States Attorney.

Law enforcement authorities say that they may not have identified all the properties involved in this massive drug ring. They are asking people across the state to pay close attention to their neighbors – or nearby empty homes.

Police said recent raids in Hooksett and Epsom (see links below) were linked to this statewide enforcement effort.

Ten homes were seized by authorities as part of this drug sweep.

6,000 Pot Plants Seized At 10 Homes (UL)

Union Leader, December 14, 2006

Concord – Using upscale, mostly suburban "McMansions" as a front, a drug ring converted the pricey properties into marijuana labs where more than 6,000 plants, worth about $24 million on the street, were seized by police in coordinated raids yesterday.

Ten houses, from Derry to Andover -- most costing between $300,000 and $400,000 each -- were confiscated and six people were taken into custody during "Operation Green Thumb," the name given the multi-agency probe launched after investigators stumbled upon two similar pot-growing operations in Hooksett and Epsom this fall.

State Attorney General Kelly A. Ayotte said the joint federal, state and local law enforcement effort disrupted "what has to be the largest seizure of marijuana in this state's history."

"It will have a significant impact on the illegal drug trade not only in this state ... but certainly throughout New England," she added.

New Hampshire State Police officials said the investigation continues and acknowledged more houses may be operating undetected. They urged the public to be aware of homes where buyers never moved in or suspicious activity occurs at night. They also set up a toll-free tip line, 1-800-NAB-DOPE (1-800-622-3673).

State Police Col. Frederick H. Booth said investigators were surprised by the sophisticated nature of the operation and the residential homes used to grow the plants from seedlings to harvest.

"It's not the type of houses you would typically look at and say 'That's a drug house,'" he said of the fairly new homes on suburban lots with sweeping lawns and stands of trees.

Armed with federal search warrants, nearly 200 law enforcement officers carried out simultaneous raids at homes in Concord, Derry, Pembroke, Andover, Chester, Weare, Hopkinton, Londonderry and Canterbury, starting about 9 a.m. yesterday, said State Police Maj. David Kelley.

Six individuals were taken into custody and are expected to be arraigned in U.S. District Court in Concord today, said Thomas P. Colantuono, U.S. Attorney for New Hampshire.

Their names and charges against them were not available yesterday, Colantuono said, noting investigators still were collecting evidence and preparing complaints during yesterday's mid-afternoon press conference.

While people lived in some of the houses, most were unoccupied, police said. Those arrested are "not necessarily the (home) owners," Kelley said.

The alleged drug growers bypassed electric meters and apparently used electricians to install their own meters capable of supporting the extensive lighting and ventilation systems needed to grow the plants, which ranged from several hundred to 1,500 in a single home.

"This outrageous behavior not only was criminal, it was calculated and sneaky and without regard to anyone's safety," said June Stansbury, special agent-in-charge of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency's New England Division.

?Marijuana raids shatter quiet in Chester neighborhoods

?Locations of the ten 'mini-mansions'

Both underground and above-ground methods of bypassing electric meters were used, posing a public safety hazard, particularly with live electricity coursing through damp ground surrounding the homes, investigators said.

Large supplies of fertilizer, chemicals and other growing materials increased the danger, they said.

Police first discovered the pot-growing operation when an underground electrical bypass used in a Hooksett home caught fire Oct. 14.

Firefighters found about 700 plants in a basement greenhouse. About two weeks later, a blown transformer supplying power to an Epsom home led authorities to nearly 1,400 infant marijuana plants.

Since then, the State Police Narcotics and Investigations Unit, DEA, state Attorney General's Drug Task Force and numerous local police agencies began investigating indoor marijuana-growing operations across the state and identified the 10 houses raided yesterday, Kelley said.

Investigators have heard similar pot-growing operations are "rampant" in Canada, Colantuono said.

DOJ_NMG_0106435

"We are going to very aggressively target this and stop this from gaining a foothold here in New Hampshire," he added.

Booth said the alleged drug-growing ring is a "wake-up call" not only to law enforcement, but also the banking industry and Realtors who deal with home sales and the nurseries that sell fertilizers and other materials needed to grow plants on such a massive scale.

Police gave the following addresses and owners of houses seized yesterday:

21 Penacook St., Chester, Hai Bui; 10 Partridge Lane, Chester, Dung Nguyen; 22 O'Neil Drive, Andover, Hong Bach Nguyen; 345 Intervale Road, Canterbury, Thuy Anh Nguyen; 8 Gulf Road, Derry, Hung Tran; 7 Danbury Court, Londonderry, Da Vav Ha; 62 Graham Road, Concord, Michelle Nguyen; 542 Rebecca Way, Pembroke, Cong Nguyen; 1191 Maple St., Hopkinton, Nu Thi Tran; and 1070 River Road, Weare, Robert Nguyen.

Mark J. Furtado, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement's resident agent in charge for New Hampshire, said his agents are investigating where the homeowners came from and how they obtained their equipment.

Colantuono said his office also is exploring whether the 10 houses seized, which have a total purchase price of $3.9 million, are subject to forfeiture under federal drug laws.

Pot Bust Nabs Six, 6,000 Plants Seized (AP)

AP, December 14, 2006

CONCORD, N.H. - A multi-agency investigation of marijuana growing operations resulted in six arrests Wednesday and the seizure of 10 homes, at least 6,000 marijuana plants and growing materials.

For the past two months, the New Hampshire State Police Narcotics and Investigations Unit, assisted by the United States Drug Enforcement Agency, the New Hampshire Attorney General's Drug Task Force, the U.S. Attorney's office in New Hampshire and numerous local police agencies have been investigating residential marijuana growing operations throughout the state.

As a result of recent marijuana seizures in Hooksett and Epsom, investigators developed information that led to the identification of 10 other residences in Concord, Derry, Pembroke, Andover, Chester, Weare, Hopkinton, Londonderry, and Canterbury that were suspected of housing large-scale marijuana grow operations.

The house-based operations also involve the theft of large amounts electricity "by bypassing the electric meter at the residences, utilizing both underground and above-ground methods," police said in a news release. In Hooksett, the underground electrical bypass caused the residence to catch fire and the rerouting of power caused pole transformers to explode, police said.

(CBS4) NEW HAMPSHIRE A multi-agency investigation of marijuana growing operations resulted in six arrests Wednesday and the seizure of 10 homes, at least 6,000 marijuana plants and growing materials worth around $24 million dollars.

For the past two months, the New Hampshire State Police Narcotics and Investigations Unit, assisted by the United States Drug Enforcement Agency, the New Hampshire Attorney General's Drug Task Force, the U.S. Attorney's office in New Hampshire and numerous local police agencies have been investigating residential marijuana growing operations throughout the state.

Police said the 10 homes were purchased with the sole intent of growing marijuana. Outside they look like ordinary suburban southern New Hampshire homes, but inside they're sophisticated drug labs.

As a result of recent marijuana seizures in Hooksett and Epsom, investigators developed information that led to the identification of 10 other residences in Concord, Derry, Pembroke, Andover, Chester, Weare, Hopkinton, Londonderry, and Canterbury that were suspected of housing large-scale marijuana grow operations.

Police Chief's Son Sentenced For Drug Conviction (AP)

AP, December 13, 2006

ALBANY, N.Y. -- The son of Miami Police Chief John Timoney was sentenced Wednesday to 18 months in federal prison for trying to buy 400 pounds of marijuana from an undercover agent in 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0106436

Sean Timoney pleaded guilty in December 2005 to giving an undercover Drug Enforcement Administration agent a gym bag filled with about $455,000 in cash as partial payment for what he and a partner believed would be the delivery of 400 pounds of marijuana.

Timoney, 26, had faced a maximum of 40 years in prison and a $2 million fine after pleading guilty to conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute marijuana.

After his release from prison, Timoney will be supervised for four years and required to enter a drug treatment program.

Timoney and Jae Seu, 24, of Glenside, Pa., were arrested the night of Nov. 1 in a Spring Valley, N.Y., hotel room. Seu pleaded guilty to the marijuana conspiracy charge in February and was sentenced to 37 months in prison on July 27.

Chief Timoney is one of South Florida's most prominent law enforcement officials. He rose through the ranks of the New York Police Department to become a chief and first deputy commissioner. He later became chief of police in Philadelphia before moving to Miami. He was in court Wednesday, but did not comment.

Isle Teacher Free On Bond In Drug Case (GCDN)

Galveston County Daily News, December 14, 2006

GALVESTON — A Galveston school teacher was freed on bond Wednesday when officials released information about the multimillion-dollar cocaine and money-laundering ring in which she is accused of taking a part.

Galveston Police Department vice/narcotics officer Joey Quiroga pulled Joette Natasha Barnes, 25, out of class last week and arrested her. U.S. marshals then took her to San Antonio.

There, she faces federal charges of conspiracy to possess more than 5 kilograms of cocaine with intent to deliver; aiding and abetting the possession of cocaine with intent to deliver; and conspiracy to commit money laundering.

The federal indictment under which Barnes was arrested had been sealed. Federal officials unsealed the indictment Wednesday morning.

Barnes, who lived in San Antonio from 2000 to 2004, is one of 38 people charged in what the federal agents called a drug ring.

The alleged operation brought cocaine from Mexico into Texas, where it reportedly was distributed at various spots throughout the state and part of Ohio.

"Of course, a big part of these operations is getting the cash back across the border," said Johnny Sutton, U.S. attorney for the Western District of Texas.

Barnes' charges pertain to allegations she was holding money that came from cocaine sales.

"We believe she was a facilitator," said Joe Arabit, assistant special agent in charge for the Drug Enforcement Administration's San Antonio office. "Not to minimize it, but that was the role of several people in this operation — to hold drug proceeds for other defendants."

Agents have arrested 29 of the 38 suspects in the case, and Arabit said more arrests were likely. Agents also seized $4.5 million and 214 kilograms of cocaine. They allege $39,000 came from Barnes' League City apartment,

The cocaine carries a wholesale value of nearly $4 million, Arabit said.

Area narcotics investigators said that much cocaine could retail for $10 million to $20 million, depending on how it was processed and how much was "cut," or diluted with other substances.

Sutton said investigators were surprised by the ages of the people suspected in the cocaine ring. At 25, Barnes is one of the youngest defendants in the group.

"A lot of times, the people running these are younger, in their 20s, but we had a lot of middle-aged people and even some in their 50s and 60s," the prosecutor said.

The oldest of the group was Josefina Campos, 82, arrested Nov. 28 on the Texas-Mexico border by officials who allege they found a package containing a kilogram of cocaine concealed in her underwear.

Arabit and Sutton both called the law-enforcement operation that led to the arrests "a major success." It started in May 2005 and involved DEA agents, as well as DEA and High Intensity Drug Trafficking Area task-force members, who come from nearly 20 different law-enforcement agencies, in all.

While Barnes was free, she was not back in the classroom. Galveston Independent School District Superintendent Lynne Cleveland told The Daily News last week that Barnes would likely be terminated, due to the severity of the charges.

Her arrest interrupted Barnes' third year of teaching fourth-grade special education at Scott Elementary School.

Alleged Drug Ring Busted In Texas (WT?UPI)

The Washington Times/UPI, December 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0106437

Law-enforcement authorities have broken up a Texas-based ring that allegedly smuggled 400-pound quantities of cocaine into Ohio and Tennessee from Mexico.

A federal indictment unsealed Wednesday charges 38 people -- including a Galveston, Texas, school teacher -- with drug-trafficking conspiracy and money-laundering conspiracy, the Express-News of San Antonio reported.

Most of the 38 were arrested in the past two weeks, and some have already been released on bond, court records show.

The ring is accused of transporting cocaine to Ohio and Tennessee, among other states, after storing it in San Antonio between Jan. 1, 2004, and Dec. 6 of this year.

The drugs were often smuggled in large boxes of powdered detergent or construction joint compound, affidavits show.

Feds Seize $1 Million In Pickup Truck Stopped In Alabama On I-10 (AP)

AP, December 14, 2006

Federal agents confiscated $1 million in cash concealed in a pickup truck stopped for speeding by Alabama state troopers on Interstate 10, authorities said.

Tom Wade, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's agent in Mobile, said the stacks of $20 bills packed in a concealed compartment were turned over to the U.S. Marshals Service. He said cash can be confiscated if investigators believe it was associated with criminal activity, but that $1 million is a "significant" seizure for such a traffic stop.

The truck driver, whose name was not released, was not charged or taken into custody. A trooper confiscated the cash, handed the driver a printed receipt and called the DEA, troopers said. Wade said Wednesday the DEA is investigating where the driver began his trip and his final destination.

Officials said the driver could claim the cash and try to get it back through the courts, but that is rare in such seizure cases and it will likely be distributed to state and federal agencies. The $1 million seizure was first reported Wednesday by the Press-Register.

Alabama Department of Public Safety spokeswoman Martha Earnhardt said the driver was alone in a 2006 Ford F-350, registered in Washington state and headed west on I-10 about 3:15 p.m. Sunday, when he was pulled over and issued a warning for speeding.

Working on a "saturation patrol" designed to investigate beyond an initial traffic stop, Earnhardt said the trooper brought out a drug-sniffing dog and a search revealed the hidden cash.

Temple Black of New Orleans, a spokesman for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, said there was a concern that the driver had a false passport, but that turned out not to be the case and he was released.

Wade said authorities usually find no more than $100,000 in similar DEA seizure cases.

Investigators often find that drugs are moved east on I-10 and cash from drug sales is transferred back west along the interstate, Wade said.

"Just the fact of life is that the source of a lot of our drugs is Mexico," Wade said. "Drug dealers want to get their money back to the source.

"Someone coming from Washington state is kind of an anomaly around here. I rarely see license plates from that part of the country."

Lucky Break Leads To Gun Theft Arrest (AJC)

A lucky traffic stop by a Snellville police officer led to the arrest of two teens accused of stealing dozens of guns from a Lilburn pawn shop, police said Wednesday.

Federal agents and local police arrested two Duluth teenagers late Tuesday night, Lilburn police said in a news release. Dwayne Allen Hickman, 17, and Jimar Shane O'Riley, 17, were charged with one count of armed robbery, with other state charges pending. Police said they could be charged as adults.

In the Dec. 6 armed robbery, the two fled with 53 guns. But more than half of the guns stolen from the Mr. Pawn store in Lilburn remain unaccounted for after the arrests.

Police believe they entered the Mr. Pawn store on Lawrenceville Highway wearing masks with guns drawn and emptied the store's gun cabinet into a bag. Initial reports indicated that 55 guns were stolen, including a pump-action shotgun and an AR-15 assault rifle — the civilian semi-automatic version of a military M-16.

Police said Wednesday that 53 guns had been stolen.

Lilburn Police called in the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms to help investigate, but police caught a quick break in their investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0106438

Tuesday afternoon, Snellville Police officer Greg Perry stopped a car near Ga. 124 and Ronald Reagan Parkway for improperly tinted windows, Snellville Police Chief Roy Whitehead said.

"The driver of the vehicle became inordinately nervous," Whitehead said. He had no valid driver's license and was going to jail, Whitehead said.

Perry searched the car and found a gun that had been registered as stolen five days earlier from Mr. Pawn, Whitehead said.

The arrest led police to Hickman and O'Riley.

Snellville police had been concerned when they heard about the pawn shop theft. A group appeared to have been casing the city's sole pawn shop shortly before the Lilburn robbery, Whitehead said.

Whitehead attributed the arrest to diligent police training, but conceded, "When you consider how many cars are driving down the street ... we got lucky."

Police obtained search warrants for an address at the Palisades Club apartment complex near Duluth. Police also set up a false meeting with the two to buy guns, said Lilburn police spokesman, Sgt. Tyler Thomas.

"These weapons were being sold in the $200 to $300 range on the streets," Thomas said.

ATF agents, Gwinnett County's SWAT team, Snellville and Lilburn police officers met the two. The initial investigation points to a possible gang connection in this case, Thomas said.

The teens had 20 of the stolen weapons and a stolen vehicle, Thomas said. Two more guns were found at the apartment and a third was found in a different vehicle.

But that leaves 29 weapons unaccounted for, not counting the guns used in the robbery, Thomas said. Police recovered the shotgun, but not the rifle among the stolen weapons, he said.

"Our initial investigation indicates that at least some of those guns may have been sold," he said. "We might be able to track them down. We're pleased that we've been able to take a good chunk of those guns off the street."

Senator Undergoing Brain Surgery, Sources Say (CNN)

CNN, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Sen. Tim Johnson of South Dakota was undergoing brain surgery early Thursday at George Washington University Hospital after suffering stroke-like symptoms, two Democratic sources familiar with his condition told CNN.

Johnson, 59, was taken to the hospital Wednesday morning after he appeared to suffer stroke-like symptoms, although a spokeswoman for the senator said subsequent evaluation showed he did not suffer a stroke or a heart attack.

Staffers told CNN Johnson was conscious when he was transported to the hospital.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nevada, spent time at the hospital out of concern for Johnson, Reid's spokesman said.

Johnson spokeswoman Julianne Fisher said the senator was in the Capitol on Wednesday morning conducting a conference call with South Dakota reporters when "his speech pattern slipped off." (Listen to Johnson's difficulty speaking during a WNAX radio interview -- MP3, 749 kb)

Fisher said the senator was able to walk back to his office in the Hart Senate Office Building, then began having problems with his right arm. He thought he was all right, she said, and went to his desk, but came out a few minutes later and "it was apparent he needed help."

Staffers put him on a couch in the office and called the Capitol doctor, she said. He was taken to the hospital shortly afterward. His wife, in the office to have lunch with him, rode with him, Fisher said.

"It transpired very fast," she said, adding the senator's staff was shaken by the incident.

But, she said of the hospital, "we keep reminding ourselves, this is where they take Dick Cheney."

Should Johnson not be able to complete his term, which ends in 2008, South Dakota Gov. Mike Rounds, a Republican, could appoint his replacement, which could shift the balance of power in the Senate.

South Dakota Secretary of State Chris Nelson said the appointment would fill the vacancy until a general election could be held in November 2008. There are no restrictions on who the governor can appoint, beyond meeting the legal requirements for Senate membership, he said.

Although the issue of incapacitation is not spelled out in state law, Nelson said he believes there would be "precedent at the federal level."

DOJ_NMG_0106439

South Dakota has not faced the replacement of an elected office holder "in recent history."

Rounds issued a statement saying his prayers were with Johnson and his family. "We are hopeful of good news for our friend and colleague," the governor said.

Johnson battled prostate cancer in 2004, and after surgery, tests showed he no longer had the disease, according to his Web site.

Democratic Sen. Johnson In Hospital (WP)

By Charles Babington And Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, December 14, 2006

Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) was hospitalized yesterday after falling ill at the Capitol, introducing a note of uncertainty over control of the Senate just weeks before Democrats are to take over with a one-vote margin.

Johnson, 59, was taken to George Washington University Hospital shortly after noon, where he underwent "a comprehensive evaluation by the stroke team," his office said. Aides later said he had not suffered a stroke or heart attack, but they offered no further comment.

The two-term senator's illness -- which sent Senate Democratic leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) rushing to the hospital to check on Johnson -- underscored the fragility of Democrats' hold on the next Senate, which they won by the narrowest of margins in the Nov. 7 elections. Should Johnson be unable to complete his term, South Dakota's Republican governor, Michael Rounds, would name a replacement for the next two years.

With Johnson in office, Democrats would hold a 51-to-49 edge in the Senate that convenes Jan. 4 as part of the 110th Congress. (The two independents have said they will caucus with the Democrats.) But if he is to leave office before then and Rounds replaces him with a Republican, the GOP would control the chamber.

In a 50-50 Senate, Vice President Cheney could break tie votes in the GOP's favor. But a Senate that becomes evenly split after it is in session would not necessarily fall to Republicans, Senate historians said. Rules and precedents could leave a party in charge of the chamber even after its membership falls below that of the other party.

"It's what happens in January that counts," said Senate associate historian Donald A. Ritchie, referring to when party leaders hash out rules governing the chamber's organization.

Rounds's office declined to comment on the situation yesterday except for a statement from the governor, which offered prayers for Johnson and hope for "good news for our friend and colleague."

Johnson spokesman Noah Pinegar said the senator "became disoriented" during a late-morning conference call with reporters, placed from the Capitol's Senate recording studio. "He had difficulty completing a response to a question," Pinegar said, so aides ended the call and walked with him back to Hart Senate Office Building.

When they arrived, Pinegar said, Johnson "wasn't himself." A team from the Capitol physician's office quickly arrived and sent the senator to the hospital by ambulance. Johnson's wife, Barbara, was with him at the hospital as tests were being conducted last night, Pinegar said.

Reid spent much of the afternoon and evening with Johnson's family at the hospital, said spokesman Jim Manley. He would not comment on Johnson's condition.

The Sioux Falls Argus Leader's Web site said that Rep. Stephanie Herseth (D-S.D.) asked constituents to pray for Johnson and that she said she thought Johnson had suffered a severe stroke. But that was before Johnson's staff had ruled out a stroke.

The only time that partisan control of the Senate changed in mid-session, historians say, was in 2001. Republicans began the year controlling the 50-50 chamber with Cheney's tie-breaking vote. But Democrats, mindful of the recent sudden death of Sen. Paul Coverdell (R-Ga.), were aware they could be a heartbeat away from the majority.

In order to adopt new rules organizing the Senate, the two parties must reach nearly unanimous agreement. Democrats in 2001 blocked the naming of committee chairmen and members, demanding concessions before agreeing to the rules. Among those concessions: Should the numerical advantage change, all committee assignments and chairmanships would be nullified, and new organization would have to be submitted.

That's what happened, not because of a death but because disgruntled moderate Republican Sen. James M. Jeffords (Vt.) decided to caucus with the Democrats, giving them a 51-49 edge and the powers of the majority. Senate Republican sources said yesterday that their party is likely to press for similar concessions when negotiating the operating rules for the next Congress. But even if Johnson were incapacitated, Democratic aides say, they would resist.

A different scenario unfolded in 1954, after the deaths and replacements of several senators over two years. Republicans remained the majority party even though Democrats eventually outnumbered them, 48 to 47, with one independent. Democratic leader Lyndon B. Johnson did not challenge the GOP's control, in part, historians said, because the independent, Wayne L.

DOJ_NMG_0106440

Morse of Oregon, warned that he would caucus with the Republicans if need be. That would have led to a 48-48 chamber, and Vice President Richard M. Nixon would have broken the tie in Republicans' favor.

Tim Johnson has a quiet demeanor and low profile in Washington, but he won two impressive Senate victories. As a House member in 1996, he ousted GOP Sen. Larry Pressler, then chairman of the Commerce Committee.

Six years later, Johnson managed a 524-vote win over Republican challenger John Thune. Thune returned two years later to defeat Thomas A. Daschle, the Senate Democratic leader, in a costly, closely watched election.

Thune had attacked Johnson for voting against the Persian Gulf War resolution in January 1991. When Congress in 2002 debated authorizing Bush to invade Iraq, Johnson announced he would vote aye.

In a floor speech, he said: "There is a strong possibility that I may be voting to send my own son into combat, and that gives me special empathy for the families of other American service men and women whose own sons and daughters may also be sent to Iraq. Nevertheless, I am willing to cast this vote -- one of the most important in my career both as a senator and certainly as a father -- because I recognize the threat that Saddam Hussein represents to world peace."

The senator's son, Staff Sgt. Brooks Johnson, was stationed in Afghanistan and Iraq before becoming an Army recruiter in Illinois.

Given Johnson's narrow reelection win over Thune, and South Dakota's GOP tilt -- Bush carried the state by 22 percentage points in 2004 -- Republicans consider Johnson one of their top targets in the 2008 Senate elections.

The leading candidate to oppose him is Rounds, who was reelected to a second term last month. Johnson had previously committed to seeking a third term. Should he not run, Democrats probably would turn first to Herseth, who easily won reelection last month.

Sen. Johnson Falls Ill, Is Hospitalized (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, December 14, 2006

Sen. Tim Johnson, South Dakota Democrat, was taken to George Washington University Hospital yesterday for an undisclosed condition, just a few weeks before his party was scheduled to take control of the upper chamber of Congress.

Spokeswoman Julianne Fisher said her boss was hospitalized with an undiagnosed condition but added that Mr. Johnson did not suffer a stroke or heart attack. She said Mr. Johnson was undergoing more tests at George Washington last night and that no official comment on his condition would be released until today.

A statement issued by his office earlier in the afternoon said the 59-year-old senator was "suffering from a possible stroke" and was "undergoing a comprehensive evaluation by the stroke team."

During a phone call with reporters yesterday, Mr. Johnson became disoriented, stuttering in response to a question. He appeared to recover, asking whether there were any additional questions and then signing off.

According to his office, the Capitol physician examined the senator and advised that he be sent to a hospital.

"Senator Johnson is a dear friend to me and to all of us here in the Senate," said incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat. "Every member of the United States Senate sends our best to him and to his family at this difficult time, and we wish him a full recovery."

Miss Fisher said Mr. Reid was at George Washington to check on Mr. Johnson.

The White House also wished Mr. Johnson a speedy recovery.

"Our thoughts and prayers are with Senator Johnson and his family," spokesman Alex Conant said.

The hospitalization touched off speculation about control of the upper chamber of Congress. If for any reason Mr. Johnson is unable to continue serving, South Dakota Gov. Michael Rounds, a Republican, would appoint a replacement to fill out the term until the 2008 election. A Republican appointee would give the party majority status in the Senate.

Last month, Democrats won control of the chamber but only narrowly after Sen. George Allen, Virginia Republican, conceded to his Democratic opponent, James H. Webb Jr. Before his concession, it appeared that Republicans might hold on their majority with a 50-50 tie with Vice President Dick Cheney casting tie-breaking votes. With the Allen loss, Democrats were given a 51-49 majority, with two members of their caucus being independents.

South Dakota Secretary of State Chris Nelson said yesterday that no special restrictions on such an appointment are in place and that a replacement does not have to be from the same political party.

Mr. Johnson, who won re-election in 2002 by 524 votes, is a conservative Democrat and is wary that Senate Democrats are considerably more liberal than his home-state voters. Sen. John Thune, who lost that 2002 race to Mr. Johnson, in 2004 beat incumbent Democratic leader Tom Daschle.

Democratic Sen. Johnson Undergoes Surgery (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) was undergoing surgery early today after becoming ill Wednesday at the Capitol, raising concern among Democrats about their slim new majority in the Senate.

Johnson, a centrist elected to the Senate 10 years ago, became disoriented during a midday conference call with reporters. He was taken to George Washington University Hospital, where he was evaluated for a "possible stroke," a statement from his office said.

The hospital would provide no details on his condition or the reason for the surgery.

A spokeswoman for the senator said Wednesday afternoon that doctors had found no evidence that Johnson, who turns 60 in two weeks, had suffered either a stroke or a heart attack.

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada issued a statement wishing Johnson "a full recovery."

If Johnson is not able to serve when Congress convenes in January, the Senate — which Democrats narrowly captured in November's election, 51 to 49 — could revert to GOP control.

Under South Dakota law, Gov. Michael Rounds, a Republican, would appoint a replacement, presumably from his own party — giving each party 50 seats. Because an evenly divided Senate would give the tiebreaking vote to Vice President Dick Cheney, Republicans would control the chamber.

Johnson's term is up in 2008.

Sen. Johnson Undergoing Evaluation For Possible Stroke (CQ)

By Martin Kady II

Congressional Quarterly, December 14, 2006

Sen. Tim Johnson suffered a possible stroke early Wednesday and was taken to George Washington University Hospital Center. The severity of his condition was unclear, but his office released a statement confirming that he was “undergoing a comprehensive evaluation” by a stroke team.

An aide said Johnson, D-S.D., who will turn 60 in two weeks, is in “good hands.” But the aide said no other information would be released until a full determination of his condition can be made.

If the stroke is serious and Johnson is incapacitated, an interim replacement would have to appointed by South Dakota Republican Gov. Mike Rounds until a special election could be held to elect a permanent replacement.

Rounds’ decision could effectively shift control of the Senate in the 110th Congress from the Democrats to a 50-50 balance between the parties if he were to appoint a Republican in place of Johnson, who chairs the Senate Ethics Committee. A 50-50 split would effectively give control of the chamber to Republicans, since Vice President Dick Cheney would be in a position to cast tie-breaking votes.

Johnson is a cancer survivor, having undergone successful surgery for prostate cancer in 2004.

Aides to incoming Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., declined to comment on Johnson’s condition, saying they wanted to avoid “speculation” about his condition.

“We are being cautious,” said Reid spokesman Jim Manley.

Johnson Hospitalized; Condition Unclear (AL)

Argus Leader.com, December 14, 2006

Sen. Tim Johnson, South Dakota’s senior lawmaker and influential member of the U.S. Senate, remained hospitalized early today after suffering stroke-like symptoms, a sudden illness that could potentially change the balance of power in Washington.

Johnson, 59, was rushed to George Washington University Hospital Wednesday after he became disoriented during a late-morning conference call with reporters.

He stuttered in response to a question, appeared to recover, but then complained of not feeling well after walking back to his office.

A Capitol physician examined Johnson and sent him to the hospital, spokeswoman Julianne Fisher said.

Word of Johnson’s problems spread fast across South Dakota.

DOJ_NMG_0106442

Fisher said Wednesday evening that Johnson had not experienced a stroke or heart attack. But a team of stroke specialists evaluated him and doctors continued tests late in the day, said Admiral John Eisold, attending physician of the United States Capitol.

As of late Wednesday, doctors had not released an official diagnosis.

A Capitol Police black Suburban pulled up in the driveway to the emergency room during the afternoon. Several television cameras were also set up outside the hospital's Ronald Reagan Institute of Emergency Medicine.

In Sioux Falls, Rep. Stephanie Herseth announced at an afternoon meeting that Sen. Johnson had been taken to a hospital.

In a shaking voice, she called on South Dakotans for their prayers. At the time, Herseth said she believed the senator had suffered a severe stroke.

Sioux Falls Mayor Dave Munson, who was at the Sioux Falls water meeting, said "I'm really saddened by this. Our prayers go out to the senator and his family. This has really taken me by surprise."

Gov. Mike Rounds said "our prayers are with Tim, Barbara and their family."

"We are hopeful of good news for our friend and colleague," Rounds said.

Sen. John Thune and his wife Kimberley said: "Our prayers are with Senator Johnson and his family during this difficult time. We encourage all South Dakotans to keep him and his family in their thoughts and prayers."

The White House also issued a statement wishing him a speedy recovery.

"Our thoughts and prayers are with Senator Johnson and his family," said White House spokesman Alex Conant.

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada was by Johnson's side at the hospital, a visible sign of Johnson's stature at a time when Democrats hold a razor-thin margin.

After the Nov. 7 election, Democrats earned a 51-to-49 edge in the Senate, which convenes Jan. 4.

But if Johnson's illness proves severe enough that he must leave office, Rounds would appoint a replacement, and if he named a Republican, it would leave a 50-50 tie. Republican Vice President Dick Cheney would cast the tie-breaking votes, shifting power in the Senate back to the GOP.

Rounds did not comment on the matter, but he does have a history to suggest he might make such a move. In 2002, after Democratic state Sen. Dick Hagen of Pine Ridge died, Rounds appointed a Republican to replace him.

Johnson's wife Barbara was with her husband all afternoon, Fisher said. She had been at the Capitol to attend a luncheon with him and was there when he became ill. The couple's sons were flying into Washington, Fisher said.

Back in Sioux Falls, some residents expressed disbelief. All hoped for the best.

"I think he provides a moderate balance politically to the state," said Mike Crane of Sioux Falls. "I think he has the best interest of the citizenry at heart."

Johnson Illness Imperils Democrats' Senate Control (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck And Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The sudden illness that sent Democratic Sen. Tim Johnson to the hospital also stunned the Capitol as it underscored his party's tenuous hold on control of the Senate in the new Congress.

The South Dakota lawmaker was admitted to George Washington University Hospital after becoming disoriented yesterday, just weeks before Democrats are to take control of the Senate by a two-vote margin following the midterm elections.

If Mr. Johnson is unable to continue to serve, South Dakota Republican Gov. Mike Rounds would be able to appoint his successor until 2009 and put the Senate in a 50-50 tie. That would allow Vice President Dick Cheney to break ties on behalf of Republicans, helping give committee chairmanships to Republicans and boost President Bush's policies at least in the Senate. Democrats will control the House by a 31-vote margin.

As Mr. Johnson's family gathered at the hospital last night, his office wasn't making public details of his condition. In late afternoon, a brief statement said he had suffered a "possible stroke" and was being evaluated by a stroke team.

Later, a spokeswoman for Mr. Johnson said he hadn't suffered a stroke or a heart attack. "He continues to undergo testing and procedures" at the hospital, the spokeswoman said in an email. "We expect to have more information in the morning."

Mr. Johnson, 59 years old, became disoriented during a conference call with reporters at about 11:45 a.m. and stuttered while answering a question. After the call, he walked to the subway in the basement of the Capitol, rode to the Hart Senate Office Building and went to his office, a spokesman said.

There, Mr. Johnson soon collapsed and aides called the Capitol physician, who examined him and told him to go to the hospital. "I think we caught it early," the spokesman said.

A former House member, Mr. Johnson hails from the party's moderate wing and operated for years in the shadow of fellow Democrat and former Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle. Mr. Johnson was one of a handful of Democrats to back President Bush's tax cuts in 2001, and to vote to confirm Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito in 2006. He won his Senate seat in 1996 and was re-elected by just 524 votes in 2002.

Mr. Johnson won over Republican ranchers in his state by standing up to the meat-packing industry. He was treated for prostate cancer in 2004, and was later declared cancer-free.

Only once in Senate history has partisan control of the chamber flipped between elections. That was in 2001, when James Jeffords, a Vermont Republican, changed to an independent and caucused with Democrats. That gave Democrats a slim majority until they lost it in the 2002 election.

Johnson's Hospitalization Might Put Senate Divide In Play (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, December 14, 2006

Democratic Sen. Tim Johnson of South Dakota was hospitalized Wednesday with an undisclosed ailment that could affect which party controls the Senate next year.

Johnson, 59, was taken to the George Washington University Hospital at the recommendation of the Capitol physician after he had difficulty talking during a call with reporters and complained of not feeling well.

Julianne Fisher, a Johnson spokeswoman, said the senator "is still undergoing testing and procedures."

A shaken Rep. Stephanie Herseth, D-S.D., told a group in Sioux Falls that she believed her colleague suffered a severe stroke, the Argus Leader in Sioux Falls, S.D. reported.

Johnson's illness has national ramifications because of the narrow political divide in the Senate that convenes Jan. 4. The November election gave Democrats a 51-49 edge. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut and Bernie Sanders of Vermont were elected as independents but have said they will vote with Democrats.

If Johnson were unable to complete the remaining two years of his term, South Dakota Gov. Mike Rounds, a Republican, could appoint a replacement, presumably another Republican. That would deadlock the Senate at 50-50 with Vice President Cheney, a Republican, holding the tie-breaking vote.

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., was at the hospital with Johnson on Wednesday evening, Reid spokesman Jim Manley said. In a statement, Reid wished his "dear friend" a "full recovery."

Political scientist David Brady of Stanford University's Hoover Institution said history is filled with examples of lawmakers remaining in office no matter how severe their disabilities.

Brady recalled Sen. Clair Engle of California, unable to speak because of a brain tumor, casting an "aye" vote for the 1964 Civil Rights Act by pointing to his eye. More recently, 100-year-old Strom Thurmond completed his last term as a South Carolina senator while living at Walter Reed Army Hospital.

There is no legal provision for declaring a member of Congress too infirm to serve, Brady said.

"The Constitution also does not provide an effective way for filling temporary vacancies that occur when members are incapacitated," said a May 2003 report by a government panel convened to determine how Congress would continue in the wake of a terrorist attack.

Johnson, who survived a bout of prostate cancer, won a second term in the Senate in 2002 over Republican John Thune by 524 votes. Two years later, Thune became Johnson's junior colleague by beating then-Senate Democratic leader Tom Daschle.

Thune issued a statement saying his prayers are with Johnson and his family.

Democratic Senator Suffers Stroke (FT)

By Edward Luce In Washington

Financial Times, December 14, 2006

The Democratic party's newly won majority in the Senate looked to be potentially vulnerable on Wednesday night following the admission into hospital of Tim Johnson, the Democratic Senator for South Dakota, after suffering a "possible stroke".

As the FT went to press, Mr Johnson, who is 59, was undergoing a "comprehensive evaluation by the stroke team" at the George Washington University Hospital in the capital, said his office in a statement. They added that it was not life-threatening. But it was too early to tell the extent of Mr Johnson's impairment.

DOJ_NMG_0106444

Under the US constitution, the governor of the senator's state appoints a replacement if the incumbent is incapacitated or dies. Mike Rounds, the governor of South Dakota, who is a Republican would be likely to appoint a Republican were Mr Johnson's stroke to prove serious or fatal, who would hold the post until the next election in November 2008.

This would undo the 51-49 majority that the Democrats won last month after George Allen, the Republican senator for Virginia, conceded defeat to Jim Webb in the state's razor tight election. Since the Senate would then be split evenly at 50-50, Dick Cheney, the vice-president would cast the deciding vote for the Republicans.

The last time the Senate changed hands under unusual circumstances was in 2001 when Jim Jeffords, the liberal Republican senator for Vermont, switched his support to the Democratic Party thus depriving the Republicans of their 51-49 majority. It was reversed the following year in the 2002 mid-term congressional elections, when Republicans regained control.

On Wednesday night Harry Reid, who is set to become the Senate Democratic majority leader in January, and who suffered a mild stroke last year, said: "Every member of the United States Senate sends our best to him and to his family at this difficult time, and we wish him a full recovery."

Any loss of Democratic control of the Senate would be less serious to the opposition party's agenda than loss of control of the House of Representatives, which operates under stricter conditions of party discipline and where the Democrats last month won a comfortable majority.

Political analysts say the real majority number in the Senate is now sixty since that is the minimum vote required to impose cloture on a filibustered debate and move to a vote. The Democrats in both houses have promised to usher in an era of greater bipartisan cooperation after several years of bitter partisanship.

Sen. Johnson Suffers Possible Stroke (AP)

By Mary Clare Jalonick

AP, December 14, 2006

Democratic Sen. Tim Johnson of South Dakota suffered a possible stroke Wednesday and was taken to a Washington hospital, weeks before his party was to take control of the Senate by a one-vote margin.

Democrats won a 51-49 majority in the November election. South Dakota's governor, who would appoint any temporary replacement, is a Republican.

Johnson, who will 60 on Dec. 28, became disoriented during a conference call with reporters at midday Wednesday, stuttering in response to a question. He appeared to recover and asked if there were any additional questions, then ended the call.

Spokeswoman Julianne Fisher said he walked back to his Capitol office after the call but appeared to not be feeling well. The Capitol physician came to his office and examined him, and it was decided he should go to the hospital.

He was taken by ambulance to George Washington University Hospital around noon, Fisher said.

"It was caught very early," she said.

Johnson's office released a statement saying he had suffered a possible stroke.

"At this stage, he is undergoing a comprehensive evaluation by the stroke team," the statement read.

The White House issued a statement wishing him a speedy recovery.

"Our thoughts and prayers are with Senator Johnson and his family," said spokesman Alex Conant.

If the two-term senator must be replaced, South Dakota Gov. Mike Rounds would make the appointment. If the Senate is split 50-50, the vice president breaks ties. That is Republican Dick Cheney at present.

Johnson is up for re-election in 2008.

South Dakota Secretary of State Chris Nelson said there are no special restrictions on such an appointment by the governor and a replacement would not have to be from the same political party.

Johnson, a centrist Democrat, was first elected to the Senate in 1996 and has been one of the more reserved members of the chamber, rarely taking center stage at news conferences.

He served in the House for 10 years from 1987 to 1997. His focus has been on committee assignments important to his state's interests — Indian Affairs and Energy and Natural Resources — as well as a spot on Appropriations. The latter allows him to direct funds to South Dakota.

Johnson narrowly defeated Republican John Thune in his 2002 re-election bid. Thune defeated Democratic Sen. Tom Daschle two years later.

Thune issued a statement saying his prayers were with Johnson and his family. Rounds also issued a statement, saying he was hoping for good news.

Johnson has worked as a lawyer and county prosecutor and served several years in the 1970s and 1980s in the South Dakota state Legislature.

DOJ_NMG_0106445

Both Johnson and his wife have battled cancer.

The senator underwent prostate cancer treatment in 2004, and subsequent tests have shown him to be clear of the disease. Barb Johnson is a breast cancer survivor.

The couple have two sons and a daughter: Brooks, who served in the U.S. Army in Bosnia, Kosovo, South Korea, Afghanistan and Iraq; Brendan, a Sioux Falls lawyer, and Kelsey, who works in Washington.

In response to one reporter's question on the Wednesday conference call, Johnson said he was most looking forward to spending the holidays with his family and grandchildren.

Johnson is the second senator to become ill after the Nov. 7 election. Wyoming Sen. Craig Thomas, a Republican, was diagnosed with leukemia on Election Day. He is back at work.

Senator Is Hospitalized, Prompting Talk Of Stroke (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 13 — Senator Tim Johnson, a Democrat from South Dakota, was hospitalized on Wednesday after what his office at first called a "possible stroke," leading to concern among Democrats that their new one-vote majority in the Senate could be in danger.

By the end of the day, after what his office called "a comprehensive evaluation by the stroke team" at George Washington University Hospital here, a spokeswoman for Mr. Johnson said he had not suffered a stroke or a heart attack. The spokeswoman, Julianne Fisher, gave no further details about Mr. Johnson's condition.

His office said Mr. Johnson, who will turn 60 on Dec. 28, became disoriented during a conference call with reporters. He stuttered, then seemed to recover before asking if there were more questions and ending the call.

He walked back to his office, where he was examined by the Capitol physician, who decided Mr. Johnson should go to the hospital. He was taken to the hospital by ambulance around noon.

On Capitol Hill, the news highlighted the fragility of the Democrats' new majority in the Senate. If Mr. Johnson's health problems prevent him from serving, his replacement would be named by Gov. Mike Rounds of South Dakota, a Republican. Assuming that Mr. Rounds named a Republican, the 51-49 Democratic majority in the new Senate would become a 50-50 split. Vice President Dick Cheney would break the tie, effectively giving Republicans control of the chamber.

Senator Harry Reid, the Democratic leader, rushed to the hospital Wednesday afternoon, his spokesman said, but it was not clear whether Mr. Reid had been able to visit Mr. Johnson. Mr. Reid's office issued a statement calling Mr. Johnson "a dear friend to me and to all of us here in the Senate" and saying, "Every member of the United States Senate sends our best to him and to his family at this difficult time, and we wish him a full recovery."

In Pierre, South Dakota's capital, Mr. Rounds issued a statement, saying: "Our prayers are with Tim, Barbara and their family. We are hopeful of good news for our friend and colleague."

Prostate cancer was diagnosed in Mr. Johnson in 2004, but his official Web site says that "all tests now show him clear of the disease."

An unassuming fourth-generation South Dakotan, Mr. Johnson was first elected to the Senate in 1996, after serving 10 years in the House, where he had replaced Tom Daschle, a fellow Democrat who ran for the Senate and ultimately became the majority leader.

Mr. Johnson faced a tough race in 2002 against John Thune, a Republican. With the state suffering billions of dollars in losses from a severe drought, Mr. Johnson and Mr. Daschle promised $5 billion in drought relief, and Mr. Johnson won narrowly after President Bush visited the state for Mr. Thune and declined to announce that he would support that relief. (Mr. Thune went on to beat Mr. Daschle in 2004.)

Mr. Johnson is up for re-election in 2008. His oldest son, Brooks, served in Afghanistan and is serving in Iraq.

He is the second senator known to become ill since the November elections. Senator Craig Thomas of Wyoming, a Republican, is being treated for leukemia, but has been at work.

According to information from the Senate historian cited on CQ.com, at least nine senators have taken extended absences from the Senate for health reasons since 1942. Robert F. Wagner, Democrat of New York, was unable to attend any sessions of the 80th or 81st Congress from 1947 to 1949 because of a heart ailment. Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., Democrat of Delaware, missed about seven months in 1988 after surgery for a brain aneurysm. And David Pryor, Democrat of Arkansas, suffered a heart attack in April 1991 and returned to the Senate in September that year.

S.D. Senator's Illness Sets Off Speculation On Capitol Hill (CHIT)

By Christi Parsons

DOJ_NMG_0106446

Chicago Tribune, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Sen. Tim Johnson was taken by ambulance to a local hospital Wednesday after becoming disoriented during a news conference, his staff said.

He underwent surgery several hours later, The Associated Press reported. There was no word on the nature of his surgery, which lasted past midnight, or on his condition.

The 59-year-old Johnson (D-S.D.) was doing a telephone conference with reporters around midday when he began to stammer. He recovered, ended the news conference and walked back to his Senate office, where the Capitol physician examined him, his staff said.

He was taken to George Washington University Hospital about noon and was examined late in the afternoon by what aides called a "stroke team." But in the evening, the senator's spokeswoman said Johnson, in his second term, had not suffered a stroke or heart attack.

The first reports of Johnson's possible stroke, and the possible vacancy his illness could create, sent attorneys all over Capitol Hill to their law books to figure out what rules for filling the seat would apply. A vacancy could affect the expected change of control of the Senate to Democratic leadership in January.

South Dakota law dictates that the governor—Republican Mike Rounds—would appoint a replacement if either of the state's senators left office, and the governor would not have to appoint a Democrat if Johnson could not serve. The appointed senator would serve until the 2008 election.

Rounds said in a statement, "We are hopeful of good news for our friend and colleague."

The White House issued a statement wishing Johnson a speedy recovery.

Democrats and their independent ally are set to hold the slimmest of majorities, 51-49, in the new Senate. Vice President Dick Cheney would have the tie-breaking vote in the event the Senate were split evenly.

Many members of Congress have stayed in office in spite of fragile health, including the late Sen. Strom Thurmond, a South Carolina Republican who held office beyond his 100th birthday. Rep. Lane Evans (D-Ill.) has suffered from Parkinson's disease for years and went for several months this year without casting a vote. He is set to retire when the new Congress is sworn in.

Government Seeks New Ruling In Cheney Case (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press

AP, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration asked an appeals court Wednesday to overrule a federal judge and allow the White House to keep secret any records of visitors to Vice President Cheney's residence and office.

To make the visitor records public would be an "unprecedented intrusion into the daily operations of the vice presidency," the Justice Department argued in a 57-page brief to the U.S. Court of Appeals in the District of Columbia.

The government was responding to an October order, by U.S. District Judge Ricardo M. Urbina, to release two years of White House visitor logs to The Washington Post. The newspaper, researching the access lobbyists and others had on the White House, sought Secret Service records for anyone visiting Cheney, his legal counsel, chief spokesman and other top aides and advisers.

In his ruling, Urbina questioned the government's primary argument against releasing the records — that the logs are protected by Cheney's right to executive privilege.

The government's response Wednesday was twofold, focusing largely on the ownership of the records.

Attorneys for the Justice Department called Urbina's decision "flatly inconsistent" with his ruling's acknowledgment that the Secret Service had only limited and temporary control over the visitor logs. Since the records are ultimately controlled by the vice president's office, the Secret Service is not authorized to release them, the government said.

Moreover, Congress has excluded presidential and vice presidential records from the public's reach — making the visitor logs untouchable, the government said.

"There is thus no dispute that, for example, appointment calendars maintained by the office of the vice president, revealing the identities of visitors and the time of their visits, would not be subject to disclosure," the Justice Department said in its response.

An attorney for The Washington Post said he had not seen the government's response and declined to comment.

A lawsuit over similar records revealed in September that Republican activists Grover Norquist and Ralph Reed — key figures in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal — landed more than 100 meetings inside the Bush White House.

Bond Will Be Top Republican On Senate Intelligence Committee (MCT)

DOJ_NMG_0106447

By Matt Stearns

McClatchy Newspapers, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON - Missouri Sen. Christopher "Kit" Bond will become the top Republican on the Senate Intelligence Committee.

Incoming Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., announced Wednesday evening that Bond, who has served on the intelligence committee since 2003, will be vice chairman. West Virginia Sen. John Rockefeller will become chairman when Democrats take over Congress in January.

Elected in 1986, Bond made his reputation in the Senate as an ardent watchdog for Missouri's interests. But in the last few years he's gained an increasingly high profile on intelligence issues.

Earlier this year, outgoing Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist assigned Bond to lead Senate Republican communications efforts in the war on terror.

As bipartisan comity on the intelligence committee deteriorated over the war in Iraq, Bond frequently became the GOP's sound-bite bad cop, accusing Democrats of excessive partisanship, while outgoing chairman Pat Roberts of Kansas took a more reserved approach.

Despite that partisan edge, Bond pledged bipartisan cooperation no less than three times in a written statement issued late Wednesday.

"I look forward to working with Chairman Rockefeller to advance our national security interests by strengthening the intelligence community," Bond said in the statement.

The selection of Bond as vice chair indicates that Republican leaders want a tough voice to counter Democrats. The intelligence committee must complete three reports on intelligence leading up to the war in Iraq, including a potentially explosive one comparing prewar statements of government officials to the intelligence available at the time.

Bond, 67, also is writing a book, due out next year, on the threat of Islamic terrorism in Indonesia.

He has defended the Bush administration's warrantless surveillance program and was one of only nine senators - including Roberts - to vote against a Senate measure banning the use of torture in interrogations of terrorism suspects and establishing rules for their interrogation.

"We cannot outline in advance what the terrorists are going to be subjected to because that becomes the first chapter in the al-Qaida operations manual," Bond said on "Newshour" on PBS.

Bond also led GOP efforts to discredit Joseph Wilson, a critic of the war in Iraq. Wilson accused the Bush administration of exposing his wife, Valerie Plame, as a CIA officer in retaliation for Wilson's criticism. A lengthy investigation led to the indictment of Scooter Libby, Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff. Libby is awaiting trial.

Bond accused Wilson of "perpetrating a hoax on the American people," saying Wilson overstated his findings on a mission to Africa to figure out whether Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein was trying to obtain weapons of mass destruction.

Bond's son, U.S. Marine Corps Lt. Sam Bond, like his father a Princeton graduate, served as an intelligence officer in Iraq and may be redeployed.

House Chair-To-Be Reyes Fails Pop Quiz

A pop quiz about national and international intelligence was given by a reporter with Congressional Quarterly to Rep. Silvestre Reyes, and that reporter said the soon-to-be chair of the House Intelligence Committee quite simply flunked.

Tuesday KFOX had a chance to catch up with Reyes, and asked him about the pop quiz.

"It's unfortunate that there has been so much attention that has been paid to it," said Reyes, a Democrat representing El Paso.

Reyes said he actually does know the answers to the questions.

"I certainly know Hezbollah because I am one of the few members of Congress that has actually been through a Hezbollah checkpoint, on the road from Damascus to Beirut," said Reyes.

The reporter who quizzed Reyes is concerned with the chairman-to-be.

"How is the chairman of the House Intelligence Committee going to ask intelligent questions of the CIA and the Pentagon spy agencies if he doesn't know what to ask?"

But local experts have taken to the congressman's defense.

"It would be ridiculous to believe that our Congressman Silvestre Reyes is not qualified for this position," said Dr. John Bretting, an associate professor at UTEP.

Bretting said Reyes is not the only one who has been taken by a reporter's pop quiz, even U.S. presidents have.

DOJ_NMG_0106448

"Ketchup is a vegetable, facts are a dumb thing, and trees pollute. These are all things that he said, that are on the public record. Does that mean that President Reagan wasn't playing with a full deck? No shape, manner, or form," said Bretting.

While this quiz may look bad for Reyes, Bretting said that doesn't take away from his abilities.

"In the United States Congress, Congressman Reyes is one of the five or six most knowledgeable congresspersons when it comes to national security," said Bretting.

Pelosi's Intelligence Man (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 14, 2006

As Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi's choice to be the next Chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, Texas Democrat Silvestre Reyes will share responsibility for the budgets and oversight of U.S. spy agencies, as well as receive regular briefings on classified intelligence. But it appears he first needs a remedial course on America's terrorist enemies.

In an interview with Congressional Quarterly, Mr. Reyes was unable to answer basic questions about the sectarian nature of both al Qaeda and Hezbollah. "Predominantly -- probably Shiite," he responded when asked about the strain of Islam that animates al Qaeda. The truth is that al Qaeda is composed of Sunni extremists who slaughter Iraqi Shiites on a daily basis. And when CQ's reporter turned to Hezbollah, Mr. Reyes said, "Why do you ask me these questions at five o'clock?" Perhaps because he's only had 23 years since the Iranian-backed Shiite terror group blew up the Beirut Marine barracks to figure that one out.

It's not as if House Democrats didn't have a qualified candidate for the Intelligence Committee chair. That would be California's Jane Harman, who served with distinction as ranking Member in the current Congress. But Ms. Pelosi thought Ms. Harman was too hawkish and not partisan enough in opposing Bush Administration policy.

So she floated the name of Florida's Alcee Hastings for the chairmanship, though a Democratic Congress had voted to impeach him as a federal judge. When that choice came under post-election criticism, Ms. Pelosi tried to mollify the Black Caucus for dumping Mr. Hastings by picking someone from the Hispanic Caucus, the untutored Mr. Reyes.

So it appears America will fight the next two years of the war on terror with an important Congressional post occupied by a man who has no grasp at all of the dynamics of the conflicts in Iraq, Lebanon and the broader Middle East. This isn't an auspicious start by Democrats who hoped to campaign in 2008 having established some credibility on national security.

Judge Chastises FEMA As Botching Katrina Housing Program (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 13 (AP) — A federal judge on Wednesday called the Bush administration's handling of a Hurricane Katrina housing program "a legal disaster" and ordered officials to explain a computer system that cannot count evacuees with precision or explain why they were denied aid.

The judge, Richard J. Leon of Federal District Court, ruled last month that the Federal Emergency Management Agency had violated evacuees' constitutional rights by eliminating their housing payments without notice. On Wednesday, he admonished the government for not moving fast enough to restart the program for 3,600 to 5,500 storm victims.

"Let me make this clear," Judge Leon told Michael Sitcov, a lawyer for the government. "Tell FEMA that I'm expecting them to get going on this. Like, immediately."

Judge Leon ruled that the agency last spring and summer had mishandled the transition from a short-term housing program to a longer-term program. Instead of explaining why financing was being cut, the agency provided only computer-generated and sometimes conflicting program codes, Judge Leon said.

He ordered agency officials to explain those decisions so that thousands of evacuees could understand the reasoning and decide whether to appeal.

"I'm not looking for a doctoral dissertation," Judge Leon said. "I'm looking for a couple of paragraphs in plain English."

Mr. Sitcov said that FEMA's computer system could not do what the judge wanted. The eight-year-old system is set up only to produce program codes, he said. Mr. Sitcov also said the program was unable to determine for certain how many evacuees in Texas were covered by Judge Leon's order or how many people had appealed the denial of their aid.

"It's not as adept at doing these kinds of machinations," said Mr. Sitcov, who said the best estimate of evacuees covered by the order was 5,479.

Judge Leon appeared bewildered, and ordered agency officials to testify Monday about the program. He said 10 employees, working overtime and on weekends, could translate program codes into 5,000 understandable letters in two weeks, nearly the amount of time that has passed since his initial ruling.

DOJ_NMG_0106449

“This is a legal disaster,” Judge Leon said. “People’s rights are being denied. I don’t want us to get so mired in the minutiae and the law while, in the meantime, people who need help are not getting help.”

The agency has appealed Judge Leon’s initial order and is hoping a higher court will block its enforcement until the appeal plays out. That ruling will probably not come before next week, and Judge Leon said he wanted the agency to start working on the problem immediately.

“Two weeks have been lost, and I don’t want another day to be lost,” he said. “We’ve got to get moving.”

Mr. Sitcov said the agency could not comply with the order to restart the housing program because the agreements to reimburse Texas cities for rental payments had expired. Judge Leon said he was sure local governments would be willing to make those same agreements again and said he might order Texas officials to testify Monday.

Judge Leon also scheduled a telephone conference for Friday between FEMA and the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now, which brought the lawsuit on behalf of hurricane victims.

Judge Tells FEMA To 'Get Going' On Aid (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, December 13, 2006

A federal judge yesterday called the Bush administration's handling of a Hurricane Katrina housing program "a legal disaster" and ordered officials to explain a computer system that can neither precisely count evacuees nor provide reasons they were denied aid.

U.S. District Judge Richard J. Leon, who ruled last month that the Federal Emergency Management Agency had violated evacuees' constitutional rights by eliminating their housing payments without sufficient notice, admonished the government for not moving fast enough to restart the program for between 3,600 and 5,500 storm victims.

"Let me make this clear," Leon told government attorney Michael Sitcov. "Tell FEMA that I'm expecting them to get going on this. Like, immediately."

Leon ruled that FEMA mishandled the transition from a short-term housing program to a longer-term program this spring and summer. Instead of explaining why funding was being cut, FEMA provided only computer-generated and sometimes conflicting program codes, Leon said.

The judge ordered FEMA to explain those decisions so thousands of evacuees can understand the reasoning and decide whether to appeal.

"I'm not looking for a doctoral dissertation," Leon said. "I'm looking for a couple of paragraphs in plain English."

Sitcov said FEMA's eight-year-old computer system is set up only to produce program codes. The program also cannot say how many evacuees in Texas were covered by Leon's order or how many people appealed the denial of aid, Sitcov said.

"It's not as adept at doing these kinds of machinations," said Sitcov, who said the best estimate of evacuees covered by the order was 5,479.

Leon appeared bewildered and ordered FEMA officials to testify Monday. He said he did not understand why the letters could not be written by hand. He said 10 employees, working overtime and on weekends, could translate program codes into 5,000 understandable letters in two weeks -- the amount of time since his ruling.

"This is a legal disaster. People's rights are being denied," Leon said. "I don't want us to get so mired in the minutiae and the law while, in the meantime, people who need help are not getting help."

FEMA has appealed Leon's order and is hoping a higher court will block its enforcement until the appeal plays out. That ruling is unlikely before next week. Leon said he wants the agency to start working on the problem immediately.

"Two weeks have been lost, and I don't want another day to be lost," Leon said. "We've got to get moving."

Sitcov said FEMA could not restart the housing program because the agreements to reimburse Texas cities for rental payments have expired. Leon said he was sure local governments would be willing to make those same agreements again and said he might order Texas officials to testify Monday.

Leon also scheduled a telephone conference tomorrow between FEMA and the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now, which brought the lawsuit on behalf of hurricane victims.

Sunrise And Sunset (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, December 14, 2006

Baton Rouge, La.

They look for all the world like internment camps. The long rows of identical white trailers sit on flat, grim, barren expanses of land that are enclosed by metal fences. Armed guards are stationed at the entrances around the clock.

More than a year after the catastrophe of Hurricane Katrina, thousands of the poorest victims from New Orleans are still living in these trailer parks run by the Federal Emergency Management Agency. They have ironic names, like Mount Olive Gardens and Renaissance Village. A more accurate name would be Camp Depression, after the state of mind of most of the residents.

The "parks" are nothing more than vast, dusty, gravel-strewn lots filled with trailers that were designed to be hitched to cars for brief vacations or weekend getaways. The trailers, about 200 square feet each, were never meant to serve as homes for entire families. But in these FEMA parks, it's common for families of five or six, or even more, to be jammed into one trailer.

I stood outside a trailer at the Mount Olive encampment on Monday afternoon, talking with Geraldine Craig and her 21-year-old daughter, Danielle Craig. The women, who have been unable to find jobs, seemed baffled and depleted by their long ordeal. As we talked, Danielle's 2-year-old son, Javonta, scampered around in the dust and gravel.

Danielle's daughter, Miracle, was 5 months old when Katrina struck. The baby was ill and receiving oxygen when it became clear that the family had to evacuate. "The doctors were taking care of her and she couldn't hardly breathe," Danielle said. "After we left we ended up in a shelter, and I said that my baby needed oxygen but they told us we had to wait.

"They finally sent us to a medical building and they put her on oxygen for about two hours, but the doctor said there was nothing wrong with her."

Like so many thousands of others left destitute and all but despondent by Katrina, the family moved on — to Texas, back to Louisiana, eventually to Baton Rouge. It was too much for Miracle, who never got the proper medical treatment. She died last March. Her heart disease wasn't accurately diagnosed until an autopsy was performed.

"I felt like it was my fault," said Danielle. "I'm still depressed."

When I asked if she'd been treated for depression, she shook her head.

"That baby was one of the many victims of the storm who were never officially counted as such," said Dr. Irwin Redlener, president of the Children's Health Fund, which has been providing medical and mental health services to children in the FEMA parks.

Dr. Redlener, a professor at Columbia University and the author of "Americans at Risk: Why We Are Not Prepared for Megadisasters and What We Can Do," said he was outraged that so many thousands of the poorest victims of Hurricane Katrina are still stuck in limbo — unable to find jobs or permanent housing, denied adequate medical and educational services and with no idea when, or if, they will be able to return to New Orleans.

"The recovery of this catastrophe in the gulf has been as badly mangled by the government as the initial response," he said. "Fifteen months have gone by and you still have these thousands of people who in essence are either American refugees living in other states who have no idea what's going to happen to them, or they are living in these trailer camps, or in isolated trailers on their old property, which has been destroyed. They're just waiting for something to happen. And the wait is interminable."

Geraldine Craig said: "We just recently went down to New Orleans and they got nothing going yet, not in our neighborhood. So we're going to be here for a while."

The residents of Mount Olive Gardens and the even larger trailer camp at Renaissance Village in nearby Baker, La., face challenges that seem almost insurmountable. Even minimum-wage jobs are very difficult to find and difficult to get to because there is little public transportation. Many of the residents are elderly, or disabled, or illiterate. Some are mentally handicapped.

These are encampments of profound stress and sadness.

As I was telling Geraldine and Danielle Craig goodbye, and wishing them the best for the coming holidays, Danielle shyly handed me a photograph of her daughter. At the top was written, "Miracle Breyonne Craig." At the bottom: "Sunrise: 3-19-05. Sunset: 3-10-06."

USGS Scientists Object To Stricter Review Rules (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, December 14, 2006

A new Bush administration policy for reviewing scientific documents before publication has angered some U.S. Geological Survey scientists, who say the elaborate internal review of their work may impede them from conveying information to the public.

The new requirements, which were unveiled in July but are still being put into practice, call for staff scientists to submit all reports and prepared talks to managers to determine whether they meet the agency's scientific standards. They also require researchers to alert the agency press office of any work involving "potential high visibility products or policy-sensitive issues."

P. Patrick Leahy, USGS associate director for geology, said the agency spent more than two years drafting the rules to ensure all of it scientists are subject to the same sort of rigorous scientific review before they send their work to be published.

"What we're doing is ensuring the scientific excellence of USGS products," Leahy said in an interview. "Peer review has been the stock and trade of this organization for years and years. How we do that has been different depending on what part of the organization you were in. . . . What we want to do is [have] our scientists working together in concert with one another."

But James Estes, a marine biologist who has worked for more than 30 years at the USGS's Western Ecological Research Center in Santa Cruz, Calif., said that although he has not encountered problems in the past, he and his colleagues fear their work may be stifled.

"I feel as though we've got someone looking over our shoulder at every damn thing we do. And to me that's a very scary thing," Estes said, adding that it will be a cumbersome procedure. "There's been no effort yet other than to intimidate everybody, but to me it's censorship. . . . I think they're afraid of science. Our findings on ecology could be embarrassing to the administration."

Leahy acknowledged that some agency scientists are resistant to the idea, though USGS officials see it as a helpful reform.

"It's the old thing, in concept it makes a great deal of sense," he said. "In practice, if you have a change to what you've been doing for a long time, you're not happy with it."

Under the policy, a USGS employee must submit any scientific document for a peer review that may involve scientists either inside or outside the agency. A supervisor oversees the process, making sure the reviewers are qualified and looking at how the scientist in question responded to any criticism raised by the reviewers.

Rama Kotra, a senior scientist in Leahy's office, said the review might take just one week for a simple document, but in the case of a complex scientific study "it would take much longer than that," possibly six months.

USGS spokeswoman Barbara Wainman said that the press office would not be conducting the peer reviews and that political appointees would not be involved, because the agency director is the only USGS person appointed by the president.

USGS researchers have tangled with Bush officials over administration policies. In 2002, the agency published a study suggesting that energy exploration on Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Refuge could hurt a Porcupine caribou herd; a week later the agency issued a report saying drilling would not damage the herd.

The controversy over the peer review process surfaced a day after the Union of Concerned Scientists announced that 10,600 scientists have signed a statement complaining that the Bush administration has undermined the "scientific integrity" of federal policymaking. Michael Halpern, the group's outreach coordinator for scientific integrity, said USGS scientists at this week's annual meeting of the American Geophysical Union in San Francisco had approached him to complain about the new peer-review rules.

"They perceive it as another hoop to jump through in order to get scientific documents approved," Halpern said, adding that the policy may not be a problem if officials make sure it's a "valid review process."

"USGS always puts together policy-neutral scientific documents. That's why their reputation is impeccable."

Lawmakers Say Coast Guard Withheld Warning Of Flaws In Cutter Design (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 13 — The Coast Guard withheld from Congress warnings raised more than two years ago by its chief engineer about structural design flaws in its new National Security Cutter, a $564 million ship now near completion in Mississippi, Democrats and Republicans said in interviews this week.

The lack of full disclosure about that and other problems in the Coast Guard's $24 billion modernization effort, known as Deepwater, has created a credibility gap that some members of Congress say now jeopardizes the endeavor.

"The Coast Guard clearly does not understand that transparency and accountability are essential to a program of this magnitude," said Senator Olympia J. Snowe, Republican of Maine, the chairwoman of the Senate panel that oversees the service's operations.

Ms. Snowe and other Congressional leaders said they were unaware until this past week that the Coast Guard's chief engineer, Rear Adm. Erroll Brown, had written in March 2004 to the Coast Guard official in charge of the Deepwater program, Rear Adm. Patrick M. Stillman, to warn him that the design for the National Security Cutter had "significant flaws" and that construction should not begin until they were addressed.

"Importantly, several of these problems compromise the safety and viability of the hull, possibly resulting in structural failure," said the letter, a copy of which was posted on The New York Times Web site last Saturday as part of reporting on the Deepwater project.

Admiral Stillman, who has since resigned, declined to comment.

DOJ_NMG_0106452

Representative Harold Rogers, Republican of Kentucky, who heads the House panel that oversees the Coast Guard budget, said the lack of full disclosure was distressing.

"Withholding information leads to poor decisions for the nation, as we are witnessing now with this cutter modernization initiative," Mr. Rogers said. Coast Guard officials said Wednesday that they have tried to keep Congress fully informed about progress on the Deepwater project, which is replacing or rebuilding almost all of the service's ships, planes and helicopters. "The Coast Guard takes very seriously its obligation to keep its authorizers and appropriators informed," a spokesman, Cmdr. Jeffrey Carter, said.

Representative Bob Filner, Democrat of California, said the shortcomings in the Deepwater program are so severe that the contract should be terminated. Two military contractors, Lockheed Martin and Northrop Grumman, were hired in 2002 to design the ships, build them and oversee most of the other project details.

"This has now threatened our national security," said Mr. Filner, the ranking Democrat on the House panel that oversees the Coast Guard. "After four years and billions of dollars, we have nothing to show for it."

A spokeswoman for Lockheed and Northrop declined to comment.

The uproar over the National Security Cutter follows the suspension of two earlier projects under the Deepwater modernization: a plan to renovate 49 of the Coast Guard's 110-foot patrol boats, and construction of a new class of ship called the Fast Response Cutter.

Details about the problems with the two earlier programs had been provided to Congress, but the leaders of the subcommittees that oversee the Coast Guard budget and operations said they should have also been informed, more than a year ago, that the design questions extended to the National Security Cutter.

Construction of the first new National Security Cutter, a 425-foot vessel slated to be the flagship of the Coast Guard fleet, started in September 2004, before most of the issues identified by Admiral Brown were addressed, Coast Guard engineers said in interviews this month. The admiral has since retired.

Unless structural modifications are made, the ship will be susceptible to buckling of its superstructure, premature cracks in its hull and decks, and, in an extreme case, the possible failure of the hull girder, which is a ship's backbone, said Chris Cleary, a senior naval architect at the Coast Guard.

An independent analysis by Navy engineers early this year has confirmed that the ship, as designed, may be susceptible to premature fatigue cracking, although top Coast Guard officials said they had been assured that the problems would not present a safety hazard for the ship, which is to start sailing next year.

Coast Guard officials in the last year did tell some Congressional committees that the service was addressing contractual issues with Northrop that might require additional work to the first ship, staff members on the House and Senate committees said.

During a June 2006 hearing on the Deepwater program, the Coast Guard commandant, Adm. Thad Allen, briefly mentioned the difficulties, telling a House panel that "there are some technical issues associated with the construction that we will address in subsequent hulls."

The Coast Guard intends to reinforce the first two versions of the National Security Cutter and to change the design of the remaining six versions, a plan it notified Congress of last week. The service has not disclosed how much the repairs to the first two ships will cost or who will be responsible for the bill.

Coast Guard leaders said in interviews that any new class of ship has design challenges that must be resolved. Given that the start of the National Security Cutter construction had already been planned in 2004 — and that any delays would add to the ship's cost — they decided to allow the first ship to be built, while continuing to investigate their engineers' reports of design flaws.

Ships That Don't Dare To Sail (NYT)

The New York Times, December 14, 2006

The Coast Guard, supposedly our first line of defense against water-borne terrorists and drug smugglers, has been staggered by a shipbuilding scandal of enormous proportions. A long-term modernization program to replace nearly all of the Coast Guard's ships, planes and helicopters — begun four years ago in the wake of 9/11 — is foundering while its projected costs are skyrocketing. In Iraq, lax government oversight and incompetence or profiteering by contractors have disabled reconstruction efforts. Now the same disease is undermining our coastal defenses.

The Coast Guard fiasco was laid out in depressing detail by Eric Lipton in The Times last Saturday, and in a similar article in The Washington Post. The misjudgments and slipshod work would be grist for slapstick comedy if the consequences, in cost and weakened defenses, were not so serious.

As described by Mr. Lipton, the estimated costs of the project, known as Deepwater, have ballooned from $17 billion when it started in 2002 to $24 billion today. The plans call for 91 new ships, 124 small boats, 195 new or rebuilt helicopters and 49 unmanned aerial vehicles. But don't count on any of the new vehicles working.

The initial venture — converting the Coast Guard's rusting patrol boats into bigger, more versatile cutters — has been canceled because hull cracks and engine failures made the first eight ships unseaworthy. Plans for a new class of ships with an innovative hull design were halted after the design was found to be flawed. And even the radios placed in small open boats proved faulty; they shorted out because they had not been made waterproof.

In the latest chapter in this disgraceful performance, Mr. Lipton reports in today's paper that the Coast Guard did not inform Congress that it was warned two years ago by its chief engineer that a proposed National Security Cutter, meant to be the flagship of its fleet, had "significant flaws" in its structural design and should not be started until the problems were addressed. The Coast Guard began construction anyway. It plans to reinforce the first two versions that are being built and change the design on the remaining six.

How could this happen? Mostly because the Coast Guard, in an astonishing abdication of responsibility, gave two large military contractors, Lockheed Martin and Northrop Grumman, near total freedom to plan, supervise and deliver the new ships and helicopters. In some cases, the contractors made boneheaded decisions, as when their shipyard partner ignored warnings by Coast Guard engineers that the converted patrol boats might buckle under the extra weight. In other cases, they might have put their own interests ahead of the nation's, as when they adopted a risky hull material that had never been tried on a large American military ship but was pushed by Northrop, which had just opened a new plant to manufacture the hulls.

No wonder the contractors are ducking for cover as the scandal reverberates, and are leaving all comment to the hapless Coast Guard. The Coast Guard seems, belatedly, to be moving in the right direction by giving its own engineers more supervisory power over the work and creating a division to oversee procurement and maintenance of ships and planes. Even so, the new Congress and the Department of Homeland Security, which is responsible for the Coast Guard, will need to keep a sharp eye on the Coast Guard's performance. The industrial contractors have proved they were not up to the job.

Fannie Correction: 'What If?' (WP)

By David S. Hilzenrath

The Washington Post, December 14, 2006

Three years ago, Fannie Mae assured lawmakers that it had the required capital to cope with a broad variety of business setbacks.

Since 1992, "Fannie Mae has met or exceeded our capital requirements in every year," Franklin D. Raines, then its chief executive, testified in September 2003. "Indeed, we are one of the best-capitalized financial institutions in the world, when compared to the risk of our business."

As it turns out, the assurance was false.

Last week, when the giant mortgage funding company corrected years of flawed financial reports, the new numbers showed that it fell short of a key capital requirement by billions of dollars in 2002 and 2003.

Had it been apparent at the time, the $7.3 billion shortfall at the end of 2002 could have put Fannie Mae on a different trajectory. Regulators might have intervened -- as they did later, when accounting problems came to light. Wall Street might have reevaluated Fannie Mae's vaunted management, not to mention the value of its stock. And Fannie Mae might have been forced to raise additional capital or liquidate investments, sacrificing profits.

Instead, based on Fannie Mae's financial reports, the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, which monitors Fannie Mae's financial safety and soundness, gave the company a passing grade.

"Fannie Mae's core capital of $28.079 billion exceeded the minimum capital requirement by $877 million," the agency said in early 2003.

The accounting correction Fannie Mae filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission last week offers an alternative version of history, inviting investors to roll back the tape and play it forward again without the illusions. Like all adventures in time travel, it's a matter of conjecture. The very act of traveling back in time equipped with better information might have altered the reality.

Ed Groshans, a stock analyst at Fox-Pitt, Kelton, speculated that Fannie Mae would not have allowed itself to be declared undercapitalized. If Fannie Mae executives had been forced to keep their books properly, they would have taken steps to avert a shortfall, Groshans said.

One option would have been to reduce Fannie Mae's investment portfolio, a major source of profit. In that case, investors could have seen Fannie Mae's earnings "come down fairly significantly," Groshans said. "People would have been a little bit concerned as to what was going on internally," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0106454

A Fannie Mae spokesman declined to comment.

Chartered by the federal government, Fannie Mae plays a major role in the nation's housing finance system. It buys mortgages from lenders and helps lenders replenish their funds by packaging mortgages into securities for sale to investors.

Unlike some other companies caught up in accounting scandals, Fannie Mae never defaulted on its obligations. What's more, the government uses two standards to determine whether the company is adequately capitalized. Fannie Mae is required to meet both tests, and while it failed one of them, the restatement shows that it passed the other.

The test Fannie Mae failed is meant to protect "against broad categories of business risk," according to the OFHEO.

Although the company fell short, the restatement showed that Fannie Mae's financial condition improved significantly based on another measure. Total stockholders' equity rose by $15.6 billion, to $31.9 billion, as of the end of 2002 and by $9.9 billion, to $32.3 billion, as of the end of 2003. There were two main reasons. First, when it corrected its accounting, Fannie Mae showed increases in the value of financial instruments known as derivatives that were previously obscured. Second, in the restatement, Fannie Mae recorded gains on mortgage-related investments that would not have shown up unless it sold the assets.

The SEC earlier this year accused Fannie Mae of fraud. Without admitting or denying wrongdoing, the company paid a $400 million settlement. Raines and other executives who presided over the problems were replaced.

Fannie Mae still faces litigation from shareholders, and the OFHEO has threatened to sue former executives to recoup some of their compensation.

Fannie Mae's accounting corrections, which involved a multitude of additions to and subtractions from profits it had previously claimed, had the net effect of reducing the company's past earnings by $6.3 billion.

Of all the numbers Fannie Mae corrected, the capital cushion is one of the most consequential. It is meant to assure that the company can withstand a sharp financial reversal. Some policymakers fear that if Fannie Mae became insolvent, it could send shock waves through the financial system and trigger a taxpayer bailout. Raines's 2003 testimony about the company's capital position served as a counterpoint to such warnings. It came as lawmakers were considering stepping up regulation of Fannie Mae and its rival Freddie Mac.

That debate will continue when the new Congress convenes next year, lawmakers say.

520 Breaks For Select Companies Added To Tax Bill (WP)

By Joe Stephens

The Washington Post, December 14, 2006

A huge tax bill that Congress passed last week contained a little-noticed gift for select corporations -- tens of millions of dollars in breaks on import tariffs.

Early Saturday morning, in the frantic final hours of the 109th Congress, lawmakers rolled 520 tariff suspensions into the must-pass bill. The provisions will reduce or eliminate taxes on imported products as varied as shoes, camcorders and boiled oysters.

While such suspensions have been around for decades, the flurry of provisions pushed this Congress to a record of nearly 800 for the year. Corporate lobbyists often craft such suspensions to apply to just one product imported by just one company. Many of those companies and their executives have given millions of dollars to political campaigns.

This week, leaders from both parties called for changes in the system.

"This is just good old-fashioned pork," said Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.), vice chairman of the House Republican Conference for the 109th Congress. Kingston described the suspensions as a stealthy version of the congressional earmark -- a term for a measure that directs the government to spend public money on behalf of a particular special interest.

"A lot of members of Congress are just clueless as to what is going on," Kingston said. "You can spend money away or you can tax-credit it away. Either way, somebody else is going to pick up the difference."

Congressional sponsors of the suspensions say they are trying to lower consumer prices and create jobs by cutting costs for retailers and U.S. manufacturers. They say that they generally drop the legislation if trade officials find a U.S. competitor that objects.

Few, if any, of the arcanely worded tariff provisions identify the company that initiated the measure. Some provisions do not identify the product as well, referring instead to strings of numbers keyed to tariff tables as big as telephone directories.

Under informal congressional guidelines, individual tariff suspensions are supposed to cost no more than $500,000 a year in lost taxes. But a Washington Post investigation, published in September, found that the authors of a number of the provisions managed to quietly file multiple measures aimed at a single product. That strategy can allow individual importers to pocket millions of dollars in tax savings.

DOJ_NMG_0106455

Rep. Sander M. Levin (D-Mich.), who is expected to chair the House Ways and Means subcommittee on trade next year, said yesterday that he favors including in the suspension measures the names of the companies that would benefit. He also wants to close loopholes that allow companies to evade the $500,000 cap.

"The old days of lack of transparency, I think those days have to end," Levin said. "These are supposed to be small items. . . . I am in favor of keeping it small and making it totally open."

Altogether, the suspensions passed this year could cost the Treasury hundreds of millions of dollars in lost revenue. The previous Congress approved about 440 new and extended suspensions, at an estimated cost of $172 million.

Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), outgoing chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, described the suspensions as good for American businesses. In a statement, Grassley stressed that the provisions had been reviewed by the Commerce Department, customs officials and the U.S. International Trade Commission. His panel had sought industry comment on the proposed suspensions, had posted them on its Web site, and ultimately rejected almost a third, he said.

Nonetheless, Grassley added: "Further reforms are necessary to make the process even more transparent and streamlined. If the new leadership decides to undertake a miscellaneous tariff bill, I'll push for further reforms."

Kingston said Congress should have a chance to vote on individual tariff suspensions. Under the current system, lawmakers must vote for or against hundreds of unrelated suspensions at a time. Kingston said that he ultimately voted for last week's huge tax-and-trade package because it contained many legitimate provisions important to the country.

"Members don't read these bills because they become so voluminous at the last minute," Kingston said. "They are always attached to something we all want."

Steve Ellis of Taxpayers for Common Sense complained that while the 109th Congress failed to take up many important issues, it still managed to pass hundreds of special-interest tariff suspensions. "If you are the right person, you can get something done," Ellis said. "It's one of those really insidious types of problems that will take a lot of work, and a lot of embarrassment for Congress, to try to change. And trust me, members of Congress don't embarrass easily."

In the recent election season, Dennis Spivack tried. A Democratic challenger to Rep. Michael N. Castle (R-Del.), Spivack attacked Castle for sponsoring 29 suspensions in the past two years. Spivack charged that the suspensions would harm small businesses and working families.

"Why did Mike Castle ask the United States Congress to selectively drop import taxes on [a] particular item? Who does this benefit?" Spivack asked in one campaign news release.

Castle's campaign responded that the suspensions helped keep manufacturing jobs in the United States. Spivack lost the election.

Rural Schools' Budgets Face The Chopping Block (USAT)

By Greg Toppo

USA Today, December 14, 2006

Rural school districts in 42 states could be forced to cut their budgets or close down altogether in coming months, advocates say, because Congress left Washington last week without renewing a little-known authorization for districts with large tracts of national forest land.

The Secure Rural Schools and Community Act subsidizes about 4,400 small school districts. Congress first approved it in 2000 to make up for declining revenue in timber-producing areas and to guarantee districts a steady income. The law was up for renewal this year, but lawmakers left Washington on Saturday without approving it, leaving many districts scrambling to replace funding that, in a few cases, amounts to more than half of their budgets.

School advocates say it would cost about $430 million to extend the law for one year. Unlike many funding bills, the forest schools act is not part of a continuing resolution and would likely have to be approved on its own.

Dan Whiting, spokesman for Sen. Larry Craig, R-Idaho, says Craig supports the legislation but is not sure where he'd find the money to fund it. "The bottom line is, budgets are a lot tighter than they were in 2000, and trying to find a half a billion dollars is no easy task," he says.

Bob Douglas, president of the National Forest Counties and Schools Coalition, says as many as 100 school districts in California face budget cuts. A few could face bankruptcy or state receivership.

"Their budgets will be essentially upside down," says Douglas, superintendent in Tehama County, Calif.

Mary Genasci, superintendent of Sierra County, Calif., schools, agrees. "We will basically be laying off half of our staff — we stand a very good chance of totally closing our doors."

Genasci's district of 540 students lies north of Lake Tahoe. About 75% of it sits on federal land, most of it national forest. She stands to lose about $1.2 million of a $6 million budget and says she may have to send out layoff notices as early as mid-March.

DOJ_NMG_0106456

"The magnitude of this is incomprehensible to me," she says. "I cannot get my head around this."

Rural superintendents this month are planning a lobbying blitz as members of Congress head home to their districts. It's expected to extend into January and February, when lawmakers return to Washington for the start of the 110th Congress.

Whiting says Craig will keep trying to find ways to fund the law, but adds, "Oftentimes it takes a crisis to spur Congress into action."

Democrats Plan To Tighten Reins On Iraq Spending (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 13 — Frustrated by the Bush administration's piecemeal financing of the Iraq war, Democrats are planning to assert more control over the billions of dollars a month being spent on the conflict when they take charge of Congress in January.

In interviews, the incoming Democratic chairmen of the House and Senate Budget Committees said they would demand a better accounting of the war's cost and move toward integrating the spending into the regular federal budget, a signal of their intention to use the Congressional power of the purse more assertively to influence the White House's management of the war.

The lawmakers, Senator Kent Conrad of North Dakota and Representative John M. Spratt Jr. of South Carolina, said the administration's approach of paying for extended military operations and related activities through a series of emergency requests had inhibited Congressional scrutiny of the spending and obscured the true price of the war.

"They have been playing hide-the-ball," Mr. Conrad said, "and that does not serve the Congress well nor the country well, and we are not going to continue that practice."

Mr. Spratt, who along with Mr. Conrad is examining how the Democratic Congress should funnel the war spending requests through the House and Senate, said, "We need to have a better breakout of the costs — period." He is planning hearings for early next year on the subject even as the White House readies a new request for $120 billion or more to pay for the war through Sept. 30, in addition to the more than $70 billion in emergency appropriations already spent this year.

Since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, spending on the military outside of the regular budget process, primarily for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, has totaled more than $400 billion. For the 12 months ended Sept. 30, spending on the Iraq war alone ran at an average rate of $8 billion a month, according to a study by the Congressional Research Service.

Congressional control over the money for the war is one of the most powerful weapons Democrats will have in trying to influence administration policy toward Iraq. They can use both the budget and subsequent spending bills to impose restrictions on how the money is spent and demand more information from the White House.

While the leadership has repeatedly said it will not cut off money for military operations, senior Democratic officials said lawmakers were considering whether to add conditions to spending bills to force the administration to meet certain standards for progress or change in Iraq. Democrats have also said they intend to investigate spending and suspicions of corruption, waste and abuse in Iraq contracting.

Since the beginning of the war, the White House has said that costs should be considered outside the routine federal budget because they are unpredictable and military demands can change quickly. Republicans have also said that wars have traditionally been treated as emergency spending, but the costs of the extended Vietnam War, for instance, were eventually absorbed into the normal budget.

But Mr. Bush has decided not to include the costs of the war in the budget request he sends to Congress each February. The Republican Congress has acceded to his request that money be appropriated for the conflict on an expedited, as-needed basis that sidesteps much of the process by which the House and Senate normally debate spending priorities.

But the newly completed report of the Iraq Study Group stated that the "costs for the war in Iraq should be included in the president's annual budget request," beginning with the budget to be submitted early next year.

In addition, a little noticed provision added to a defense policy measure signed into law by Mr. Bush in October directed him to include in his budget a request for appropriations for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, an estimate of all money expected to be required for the year, and a detailed justification of the request.

"The law requires that it be done," Mr. Conrad said, adding that he had told the incoming defense secretary, Robert M. Gates, that the administration must change its budgeting strategy.

But Sean Kevelighan, a spokesman for the Office of Management and Budget, said the administration's view was that Congress could not "bind how the president wants to put together the budget," though he said the administration was trying to provide more information for Congress and moving toward a more regular budget plan.

"It is obviously difficult to predict the cost of the war 12 to 18 months out," Mr. Kevelighan said. "But our goal is to provide more information to the American people as to how much, for what and when."

DOJ_NMG_0106457

Both Republicans and Democrats have objected to the administration's refusal to add the war costs to the budget, particularly when the conflict has lasted almost four years. "It is hard to comprehend with an ongoing event like the war that there wouldn't be something on it in the budget," said Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader.

In June, the Senate overwhelmingly approved a proposal by Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, to require the president to spell out the expected war costs in his annual spending plan. At the time, some lawmakers expected that the provision would be eliminated from the final measure, but it survived and could be held up by Democrats as evidence that the administration was ignoring the law if it failed to comply.

Lawmakers have several objections to treating the war spending as a continuous emergency, which typically sends the request straight to the Appropriations Committee and bypasses the more policy-oriented Armed Services Committees. Mr. Spratt said he believed that the policy panels tended to give such requests a "closer scrub" than the appropriations panels.

Others say the emergency measures, known as supplemental appropriation requests, can become vehicles for lawmakers to win speedy approval of their own, unrelated pet projects. Members of Congress say the Pentagon has also increasingly seen the war measures as a route to winning financing for projects that should be subject to normal review. And there are complaints that the administration's approach masks the true cost of the war by not providing a clear bottom line number and by not calculating such related expenses as increased veterans care and military equipment.

"We are now going on four years into this war and they are still funding it with these patchwork supplementals without oversight and without accountability," Mr. Conrad said, "and that just has to stop."

But adding the war costs to the annual budget could carry risks for Democrats who want to write a spending plan that meets their priorities but eliminates the deficit in five years or so. Adding the war spending at the same time Democrats want to enforce "pay as you go" budget rules would require some of that spending to be made up by reductions elsewhere.

And if Mr. Bush's budget does not contain the spending and the Congressional plan does, the president's blueprint could look better by comparison when it comes to deficit reduction. In addition, budget writers do not want Pentagon spending inflated by the war to become a permanent new floor for the military budget.

Democrats, The Deficit, And All They Want To Achieve (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON

Lower interest rates on student loans. More special forces for the military. Expanded prescription drug benefits for senior citizens. Greater federal support for renewable energy and alternative fuels.

Congressional Democrats have a long list of priorities they'd like to enact when they assume the power of the majority in January. After all, they've been wandering in the political wilderness for 12 years. They've had lots of time to scribble down stuff under the heading "to do."

But faced with record federal deficits and the expense of the war in Iraq, Democrats have also vowed to be more fiscally responsible than their Republican predecessors. Handling this impending collision could be one of the first big tests for the party's House and Senate leadership teams.

"Maybe [incoming Speaker of the House Nancy] Pelosi can really curb the tendency of Democrats to spend money, but there is a lot of pent-up desire," said Ron Haskins, codirector of the Brookings Institution's Center on Children and Families, at a recent seminar.

As yet, Democrats have hung no price tag on their forthcoming agenda. Many of the high-priority items they have pledged to enact in the first 100 hours of the new Congress, such as an increase in the minimum wage, wouldn't cost Washington lots of money.

In addition, incoming Speaker Pelosi said in a statement last month that the party is committed to "no new deficit spending." She said Democrats intend to restore pay-as-you-go rules, which require increases in the federal budget to be offset by either tax hikes or cuts in spending elsewhere.

It is true that the expansive list of party action items, as contained in the House Democrats' 31-page document, "A New Direction for America," is something of a catchall. For instance, will Congress really get around to voting to make college tuition tax-deductible for students studying math, science, technology, and engineering, as the document vows?

But some of the prospective legislative changes at the very top of the Democratic list would be undeniably expensive. Depending on how eligibility is structured, reductions in student loan interest rates could cost $10 to $50 billion over the next five years. Doubling special forces could cost $25 billion over five years.

DOJ_NMG_0106458

Then there is the Alternative Minimum Tax (AMT), which has long been criticized by Democrats and Republicans alike. Designed to apply only to the wealthy, the tax now affects many who would call themselves middle class. Raising the income level at which a taxpayer is subject to the AMT could cost at least $40 billion a year.

And Democrats may want to expand federal health spending. The most common suggestion in this area is closing the "doughnut hole" in Medicare's prescription drug benefit, under which beneficiaries receive help for their first $2,250 of purchases in a year, then must buy prescriptions entirely on their own until their annual spending total hits $5,100.

The reason the doughnut hole exists in the first place was to pare the program's predicted cost. Its elimination would probably cost an estimated $5 billion annually.

"If you do make the prescription drug benefit more generous that could get very, very expensive, and there's no obvious way to pay for that," says Bob Bixby, director of The Concord Coalition, a budget watchdog group.

However, Mr. Bixby says he is encouraged by some budget actions Democrats have vowed to take. This week party leaders vowed to enforce a moratorium on the special-interest spending provisions known as "earmarks" until lobbying reforms can be enacted. And the incoming chairmen of the House and Senate Appropriations Committees have jointly said they will extend current funding levels for much federal spending until the 2008 fiscal year begins next Oct. 1.

The just-adjourned Congress only completed work on two of the 11 spending bills for fiscal 2007. As a short-term fix they extended current funding levels until Feb. 15, 2007.

Prolonging the life of this continuing resolution is the moral equivalent of a budget freeze, notes Bixby. "That was an encouraging sign," he says, "because they are doing a long-term continuing resolution at a lower level than many rank-and-file Democrats would like."

Of course, a year is a long time in terms of a Congressional budget. And after Democrats assume power, pressure may build from members used to minority status to reinsert treasured earmarks into spending bills.

Emergency spending legislation, such as that which has been used so far to fund much of the Iraq war, can be particularly attractive to lawmakers who want to get earmarks through as quickly as possible.

"The job of a budget watchdog is never done," sighs Bixby.

Senator Wants Universal Health Care Plan (AP)

By Matthew Daly

AP, December 14, 2006

Several business and labor leaders on Wednesday hailed a proposal to provide health care coverage to all Americans through a pool of private insurance plans.

A dozen years after Congress rejected a Clinton administration plan for universal health care, Oregon Sen. Ron Wyden offered a plan he said would provide affordable, private health care coverage for all Americans, except those covered through Medicare or the military.

"Employer-based coverage is melting away like a Popsicle on the sidewalk in August," Wyden said.

Wyden, a Democrat and a member of the Senate Finance health care subcommittee, said his plan would "guarantee health coverage for every American that is at least as good as members of Congress receive and can never be taken away."

The plan, dubbed the "Healthy Americans Act," would provide universal coverage for no more money than the country spends on health insurance today, Wyden said.

Wyden, a veteran of the 1990s health care battle, drew support from groups that have frequently opposed each other, including Andy Stern, international president of the Service Employees International Union, and Safeway Inc. CEO Steve Burd.

Stern called employer-based health coverage a relic of an industrial economy that is long gone, and said U.S. companies "cannot compete in a global economy when we put the price of health care on the cost of our products, and our competitor nations do not."

Stern said the health care system had failed to create jobs while adding to trade deficits and holding wages stagnant. For the nation's 46 million uninsured, "it is a failed moral policy as well," Stern said.

Burd said his California-based grocery chain had saved millions in health care costs by emphasizing preventative care and offering discounts for nonsmokers and others with lower health risks.

Left unchecked, health care costs will soon surpass net income for many companies, Burd said, calling Wyden's proposal a bold plan to restart a national dialogue on health care.

"Working together, business, labor, government, consumer groups and health care providers can collectively solve this problem," he said.

Wyden's plan is an outgrowth of work by the Citizens' Health Care Working Group, a 14-member panel that held meetings in 36 states and heard from 28,000 people about how to overhaul the nation's health care system.

DOJ_NMG_0106459

The group, created in 2003 by legislation sponsored by Wyden and Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, recommended that the government take steps to guarantee that all Americans have basic health insurance coverage by 2012.

Wyden said his new plan would allow workers to carry their health insurance from job to job without penalty. More efficient administration and more promotion of competition for health care plans, he said, would allow greater coverage while costing no more than the government is paying today for health insurance coverage.

The plan would require that employers "cash out" their existing health plans by terminating coverage and paying the amount saved directly to workers as increased wages. Workers then would be required to buy health insurance from a large pool of private plans.

After two years, companies would no longer have to pay the higher wages. Instead, Wyden said, they would pay into an insurance pool, based on annual revenues and the number of full-time workers.

At Wyden's request, the Lewin Group, a Virginia-based health care consulting firm, reviewed the plan. The consultant said the plan would reduce health spending by private employers by nearly three-quarters and save $1.4 trillion in total national health care spending over the next decade.

Increases in premium payments for individuals and families would be offset by higher wages and subsidies provided under the plan, the report said. As an example, Wyden cited a worker who earned $60,000 last year, and received about $12,000 worth of health care coverage.

The worker's health insurance would be terminated but his salary would increase to $72,000, which would cover his health care coverage. The plan would bar workers from buying a "bare-bones" health package and pocketing the savings, Wyden said.

Health Care For All Proposed (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-zaldivar

The Los Angeles Times, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — A prominent Democratic senator unveiled an ambitious proposal today to provide health insurance for all Americans, while reining in rapid healthcare inflation that threatens benefits for millions of workers and their families.

The plan by Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.) comes a month after the health insurance industry offered its own comprehensive proposal and signals a growing willingness by politicians to tackle a subject that has been off limits since the mid-1990s collapse of then-President Bill Clinton's sweeping health reform package.

Considered liberal on social issues and moderate on economic policy, Wyden combined elements of reforms that have been proposed by Democrats and Republicans.

His plan would guarantee coverage for all, including nearly 47 million uninsured, a Democratic objective. But it would also limit employers' exposure to relentless cost increases and encourage workers to shop for cost-effective insurance plans — ideas that have Republican support.

"I think the country wants healthcare fixed," Wyden said at a briefing for reporters earlier this week. "It's possible to get good quality, affordable, universal private health coverage that can never be taken away for the amount of money that is spent today."

Wyden is a member of two Senate panels that are heavily involved in healthcare, the Finance and Budget committees.

Americans spend more than $2 trillion a year on healthcare, more on a per-person basis than any other country. But the returns on that investment are uneven, with many insured patients getting less than optimal care and millions of workers unable to afford health coverage, which costs about $12,000 to $13,000 a year for a family plan.

Employers have traditionally provided coverage for workers and their families. Although most workers are still insured through their jobs, corporate leaders are increasingly questioning whether the system can be sustained in an era of global competition.

Wyden's plan would require employers to continue contributing toward the cost of health coverage, but it would get them out of the business of directly providing insurance and limit their exposure to double-digit annual inflation.

In the first two years of the plan, employers who now provide coverage would be required to directly pay workers what they were spending on insurance. Thereafter, most companies would pay the government a healthcare contribution that resembles a payroll tax.

Using the money from their employer, individuals would be required to purchase a private insurance policy through a purchasing pool in their state. Benefits would be keyed to the Blue Cross Blue Shield Standard Plan available to federal workers. Workers would not have to pay higher income taxes because of the employer contribution.

The uninsured would also have to buy coverage, but premiums for the poor would be fully subsidized by the government. Middle-class families with incomes up to $80,000 for a family of four would be eligible for help on a sliding scale.

DOJ_NMG_0106460

Premiums from individuals and contributions from employers would be collected by the government through the tax system and distributed to insurers. Once enrolled, individuals would be covered until retirement. Seniors in the Medicare program would not have to make any changes.

An economic analysis of the plan by the Lewin Group consulting firm found it could be paid for with a little less than what the nation now spends on healthcare. In theory, the plan would hold down healthcare inflation because individuals would have to pay more out of their own pockets for plans with lavish benefits.

Wyden's proposal — spelled out in a 166-page bill that he plans to introduce soon — is complex and such changes are not likely to be easily enacted. Most experts believe major healthcare reform will only be possible if a presidential candidate is elected with a mandate to tackle the problem. Nonetheless, Wyden won compliments for taking on a tough issue.

"We are very supportive of the goals Sen. Wyden has established," said Ron Pollack, executive director of Families USA, a liberal advocacy group that will play a key role on health policy in the Democratic-led Congress. But he called the plan "a first step" and "a work in progress."

At the Committee for Economic Development, an organization of CEOs from major companies, senior economist Joseph Minarik said Wyden's plan sounds like "a first or second cousin" to ideas the organization is considering in formulating its own proposal that will be announced next year.

"The story overall is that people are beginning to come to the conclusion that the employer-based health insurance system is very vulnerable," Minarik said.

Political Groups To Pay Campaign Fines (AP)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, December 14, 2006

Swift Boat Veterans for Truth and MoveOn.org Voter Fund, two outside groups that played key roles in the 2004 presidential election, reached an agreement with the Federal Election Commission to pay nearly $450,000 for various violations.

The groups, along with the League of Conservation Voters, settled charges that they failed "to register and file disclosure reports as federal political committees and accepted contributions in violation of federal limits and source prohibitions," the FEC said in a statement Wednesday.

The commission approved the three settlements on a vote of 6-0.

The FEC's unanimous decision to approve the agreements goes to the heart of campaign tactics that reached full bloom in the 2004 campaign. At issue was the emergence of nonprofit political groups, called 527s based on the section of the Internal Revenue Service code that governs their activities, operating as independent campaigns attacking Democratic nominee Sen. John Kerry or President Bush.

The group listed as Swift Boat Veterans and POWs for Truth will pay $299,500. In the 2004 campaign, the group spent $20.4 million criticizing Kerry's military record in Vietnam. Much of the group's claims about Kerry's service were never substantiated.

MoveOn.org Voter Fund will pay $150,000. The liberal organization challenged President Bush on various issues in the campaign. The group spent $14.6 million on television ads attacking Bush's record.

The League of Conservation Voters will pay $180,000. The group ran ads against Bush and other federal candidates, criticizing their stands on environmental issues.

The civil penalties were the first of this magnitude since the Supreme Court upheld most of the campaign finance law passed by Congress in 2002 that barred political parties from raising unlimited amounts of money from corporations, unions and wealthy individuals.

The FEC concluded that the three 527 organizations violated campaign finance laws because they expressly stated their desire to influence the presidential election in their fundraising, their public statements or their advertisements. Such activity, the FEC said, could only be conducted by political committee registered with the FEC that abide by contribution limits and public disclosure requirements.

Commission Chairman Michael Toner said the penalties send a "strong message" and set "important touchstones for the future."

"This will have significant implications for the 2008 presidential race," he said. "527 organizations are on clear notice about what their legal obligations are."

But campaign finance watchdog groups said the FEC's actions were "too little, too late," in the words of Paul Ryan of the Campaign Legal Center.

The center and other organizations like it have been calling on the FEC to adopt specific regulations governing 527 groups. The FEC in 2004 refused to enact such rules, arguing that it would deal with the groups on a case-by-case basis. Several other complaints involving 527 groups are pending before FEC.

MoveOn.org shut down its Voter Fund organization in 2004, and drove its campaign activity through its political action committee, which raised more than $27 million in the 2006 election cycle.

"We welcome the FEC clamping down on pop-up 527s, set up just to influence elections and funded only by big money, since that would almost certainly put Swift Boat Veterans and similar groups out of business," said Wes Boyd, a co-founder of MoveOn.org.

Lawyers for the Swift Boat Veterans told the FEC that they acted with "good-faith belief" that their communications were not affected by the campaign finance law. They argued that by not adopting specific rules in 2004, the FEC had left the law murky.

"It is far better to end this legal confrontation now rather than continue a costly battle against government bureaucrats in an area where the law is unconscionably vague," retired Rear Adm. Roy Hoffmann, founder of the Swift Boat Veterans, said in a statement.

Groups Penalized For Breaking Campaign Finance Laws In 2004 Election (USAT)

By Fredreka Schouten

USA Today, December 14, 2006

WASHINGTON — Three independent political groups paid six-figure settlements to resolve charges that they broke campaign-finance laws in the 2004 presidential election, the Federal Election Commission said Wednesday.

The action is the first clampdown on outside political groups, FEC Chairman Michael Toner said, and could diminish the role of such organizations.

Swift Boat Veterans and POWs for Truth paid $299,500 in penalties; the MoveOn.org Voter Fund paid $150,000; and the League of Conservation Voters 527 and 527 II paid $180,000.

The groups stepped over the line by either raising funds or by paying for activities that called for the election or defeat of the presidential contenders, Toner said.

These so-called 527 groups, named for the section of the tax code that governs their activity, emerged as players in the 2004 race between President Bush and Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass. The veterans group, for instance, ran ads attacking Kerry's Vietnam record.

"We would not see independent spending on the same scale in 2008 as we did in 2004" if the FEC action survives legal challenges, said Richard Hasen of Loyola Law School in Los Angeles.

Altogether, "527" groups spent $426 million in 2004 on federal elections, and nearly four times as much cash aided Democrats, according to the non-partisan Campaign Finance Institute.

Under federal law, the organizations are allowed to raise and spend nearly unlimited amounts of money as long as they do not advocate for candidates or coordinate activities with them.

The 527 groups' activity bloomed after new campaign-finance laws in 2002 that prohibited large, unregulated donations.

The groups say they acted in good faith. "The law is unconscionably vague," Swift Boat Veterans' founder Roy Hoffmann said.

Watchdog groups said rules or new laws are needed. The settlements are "too little, too late," said Democracy 21's Fred Wertheimer and Campaign Legal Center's Gerry Hebert.

FEC Fines 3 '527' Groups For Use Of Large Donations In '04 (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 14, 2006

The Federal Election Commission yesterday slapped heavy fines on three independent fundraising groups it said had illegally injected tens of millions of dollars into the 2004 presidential campaign, concluding unanimously that the funds were drawn from large donors and corporations in violation of election laws.

The fines, which totaled $629,500, targeted two Democrat-leaning groups and one Republican-leaning group. They raised new questions about the viability of using such "527" organizations as an indirect conduit for big-money donations meant to promote or undermine federal candidates.

The use of 527 groups by big donors exploded in 2004, two years after a new campaign finance law shut off other venues. More than $950 million was funneled through the groups in the 2004 and 2006 elections, much of it from wealthy donors and corporations otherwise barred from having such a large financial impact.

FEC Vice Chairman Robert D. Lenhard said in a statement that the fines -- levied against Swiftboat Veterans and POWs for Truth, MoveOn.org's Voter Fund, and a League of Conservation Voters fund -- demonstrated that the commission is prepared "to regulate election activity more aggressively than it has in the past."

But prominent election lawyers said the FEC's decision to fine the three groups was unlikely to slow such funding in the 2008 election. Although the fines imposed yesterday add new uncertainty for large donors, the underlying FEC rules remain so murky that the strength of the precedent is unclear, the lawyers said.

"There is no clear standard," said Jan Baran, a former general counsel of the Republican National Committee, whose law firm represents a 527 group still being investigated by the agency.

"The law is clearly not settled," agreed League of Conservation Voters President Gene Karpinski in a statement.

Other campaign finance lawyers said even the risk of fines may not deter the wealthiest donors, who would be dunned long after the donations had been spent and elections decided. They said the ruling may encourage large donors to use other sorts of tax-exempt advocacy groups notsubject to FEC regulation in the past.

The FEC is under pressure from a federal judge to prove that it is effectively regulating 527 groups -- named for the chapter in the IRS code governing them -- and the big-money donors they represent. The agency announced this summer that it would intervene against them on an ad hoc basis rather than prescribe clear new rules of conduct. But a federal court, acting in a lawsuit brought by two congressmen, told the FEC to show by the end of January that it is taking meaningful action.

These fines do not meet the test, said Fred Wertheimer, the head of Democracy 21, a nonprofit group that has complaints pending at the FEC over spending by eight 527 groups in the past two federal election cycles. "We feel it is too little, too late," Wertheimer said, noting that by not making the rules clearer before the 2004 election, the FEC left the door open to huge spending that his group contends was illegal.

He said the fines were not so large in comparison with the groups' total fundraising efforts, raising the possibility that they would see it simply as a "cost of doing business."

Officials at each of the groups denied acting in bad faith and initially contended they were not under the FEC's jurisdiction. That would have meant they were exempt from federal campaign laws limiting donations from a single individual to $5,000 annually, and from a ban on corporate political donations.

The FEC disagreed, citing public statements and fundraising solicitations that openly described the groups' desire to defeat or oppose one of the presidential nominees. It also said the groups spent their money on ads that expressly advocated an election outcome.

The case against the Swiftboat group -- which financed attention-getting ads accusing Democratic presidential nominee John F. Kerry of lying about his Vietnam War record, without substantiating its claims -- involved what the FEC termed the group's illegal collection of more than $12.5 million in personal contributions above the $5,000 annual limit, and $715,050 in prohibited corporate contributions.

The group raised a total of $25 million for the 2004 campaign, and the FEC fine of $299,500 amounted to 1 percent of its revenue.

Retired Rear Adm. Roy Hoffmann, the group's founder, said, "It is far better to end this legal confrontation now rather than continue a costly battle against government bureaucrats in an area where the law is unconscionably vague." He said the group has ceased political activity for now but may register with the FEC in the future to "re-engage in voter education."

The MoveOn.org Voter Fund raised $21 million to spend against President Bush in 2004, including more than $2.5 million from investor George Soros. It was fined $150,000. MoveOn official Wes Boyd welcomed the decision, saying that "if this means that the FEC is really pushing big money out of elections, it's good for democracy." The group said it halted its collection of funds from large donors after the 2004 election.

Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.), a co-sponsor of the 2002 campaign reform law, said the FEC fine levied against the Swiftboat group "means little" because it was so late. He added that if the FEC does not write new regulations, "then Congress or the courts will have to force the FEC to act."

Mutual-Fund Group Balances Its Political Books (WP)

By Judy Sarasohn

The Washington Post, December 14, 2006

What a difference a midterm election makes -- or so it seems at some firms and trade groups scurrying to bolster their bipartisan credentials. But the folks at the Investment Company Institute, the trade association for the mutual fund industry, say their recent Democratic hire just maintains the status quo.

DOJ_NMG_0106463

ICI snagged James R. Hart, a 30-year veteran of the Hill and most recently chief of staff to Rep. Carolyn McCarthy (D-N.Y.). He's the group's new political affairs officer and will also be involved in lobbying. He succeeds Democrat Vivian Lausevic, who moved over to the American Gas Association.

The hiring of Hart raised some eyebrows, because the ICI in 2003 was subject to some mighty political pressure from Rep. Michael G. Oxley (R-Ohio), chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, to replace Democrat Julie Domenick, then executive vice president, with a Republican.

ICI never ousted Domenick, though it did hire Daniel F. C. Crowley, earlier general counsel to House speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.), as chief government affairs officer. Domenick eventually left to join a Republican-led firm, but the ICI has been a client of hers since 2004 and remains so, now that she recently opened her own shop, Multiple Strategies.

Crowley said in an interview yesterday that the government affairs office is bipartisan: three Republicans and three Democrats. He said ICI had started talking to Hart before the election.

"My role is not to support the majority," Crowley said, "but to be able to put together a majority of support for our issues -- and bipartisanship is a requirement."Limits to Divine Intervention

Law firms and lobby shops like to sign up big names from the administration and Capitol Hill. The higher up, the more access and influence one at least appears to have. There is a problem: Such higher-ups are barred by ethics rules from lobbying or contacting former colleagues for a year.

Robert C. Divine has left his job as U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services chief counsel-- he also served as acting director and acting deputy director -- and rejoined Baker, Donelson, Bearman, Caldwell & Berkowitz law firm, but he foresees no problem with the ban. Divine said the one-year "cooling off period" doesn't apply to him because he voluntarily avoided the salary levels that triggers it. He is still covered by restrictions on matters he was directly involved in and confidential information.

"I am truly grateful for the unexpected opportunity to serve among the impressive men and women in USCIS and related agencies. But immigration law is what I did for 18 years before I entered government," he said in a statement. "I could not afford to leave government and then be unable to work for a year."

Divine, who is leading the firm's immigration group, said in an interview that his decision cost him $5,000 to $10,000 a year. The trigger amount for an administration official, he said, was $142,898, as of January 2006.
